Why do we have the new covenant scriptures? This is a legitimate question as was the one asked by the apostle, “Wherefore then serveth the law?” The writings of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, constitute the written testimony related to our Lord. These are not biographies at all although some biographical features are found in them. The writers had a definite purpose in giving their accounts. They were selective of the mass of material available. One of them wrote, “There are also many other things which Jesus did; were every one of them to be written, I suppose that the world itself could not contain the books that would be written” (John 21:25). It is obvious that their treatment was not exhaustive. John said, “Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book, but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name.” These records point men to Jesus as the source of life.

The book of Acts is the story of the struggle of the message of Jesus to free itself from narrowness, bigotry and prejudice. It is the dramatic account of how the story of the cross overcame the limitations of class and race. It ends with the messenger in prison and the message liberated. The envoy in chains was “preaching the kingdom of God and teaching about the Lord Jesus Christ quite openly and unhindered.”

The purpose of the apostolic letters was not to formulate a pattern for our pattern is a person. Peter wrote to the Christian slaves, “For to this end you have been called, because Christ also suffered for you, leaving you an example, that you should follow in his steps” (1 Peter 2:21). The context shows that the purpose of Christ was not to bring a new religion or a systematic theology to mankind, but to develop a character in harmony with the divine nature—a character which would spontaneously react to every external situation and do so in harmony with God’s design. Since the pattern is a person and the law is love, when the saints exemplified the proper character they were commended and when they did not they were reprimanded, rebuked and encouraged to alter their conduct in conformity to his life. The purpose of the letters was to call men back to the pattern of the divine nature as exemplified in Christ Jesus.

Take the first letter addressed to the Corinthians as an example. They were divided over men who had special gifts and over the special gifts which men had. Paul did not lay down the law to them. Instead, he showed that to boast of men was inconsistent with their call.

“Consider your call, brethren” (1 Cor. 1:26). The source of life is not in our association with each other. “He is the source of your life in Christ Jesus, whom God made our wisdom, our righteousness and sanctification and redemption; therefore, as it is written, ‘Let him who boasts, boast of the Lord’” (1. Cor. 1:30). Division among brethren is an exhibition of the lower nature. “Can you not see that while there is jealousy and strife among you, you are living on the purely human level of your lower nature?” (3:3).

“There can be no other foundation (for Christian unity) beyond that which is already laid; I mean Jesus Christ himself” (3:11). It is important to catch the significance of this statement in its context. The letter is not the pattern of unity at all. It does not propose to specify a foundation upon which Christians can unite. The foundation has already been laid. No one, not even an apostle, can lay another foundation than Jesus Christ himself. Men who belong to Christ should not divide over anything which belongs to all of them. “For though everything belongs to you— Paul, Apollos and Cephas, the world, life, and death, the present and the future, all of them belong to you— yet you belong to Christ, and Christ to God” (3:22, 23).

As men divide over gifted men only when they forget their allegiance to Jesus, so they divide over the gifts men have only when they forget the principle of love for each other. The answer to the problem of division over men is to reaffirm Jesus as the center of our life. The solution to the problem of division over gifts is to re-establish love as the only true absolute in the Christian frame of behavior. “The higher gifts are those you should aim at. And now I will show you the best way of all.” That way is the way of love. “You are, I know, eager for gifts of the Spirit; then aspire above all to excel in those which build up the church” (14:12). Regardless of what gift a man possesses he cannot build up the church without love.

Look at the other problems in Corinth. The man who used his father’s wife for fleshly gratification violated every principle of love and enthroned lust. It held dominion over him. He did not love his father, the woman, himself, or the community of saints. Notice in 1 Thessalonians 4:2-9 how closely associated is the subject of love for the brotherhood and illicit relationship with the wife of another. “No man must do his brother wrong in this matter, or invade his rights” (verse 6). In Corinth, a Greek city, the apostle makes a strange allusion in dealing with the fornicator. He refers to a Jewish festival, the Passover, and does so for one purpose— to introduce our true pattern. “For indeed our Passover has begun; the sacrifice is offered— Christ himself.”

Those who haled their brethren into court before heathen judges disregarded the real law, the only law of the Christian, love for the brethren. Christians do not go to law for the law has come to them. Paul reasons that it would have been far better to suffer harm from and be defrauded by a brother, than to retaliate in a way that shamed the brotherhood and brought it into disrepute. “Indeed, you already fall below your standard in going to law with one another at all. Why not rather suffer injury? Why not rather let yourself be robbed? So far from this, you actually injure and rob— injure and rob your brothers!” What was the standard below which they fell? It was not a law at all, but a person. “It is better to suffer for well-doing, if such should be the will of God, than for doing wrong. For Christ also died for our sins once and for all. He, the just, suffered for the unjust, to bring us to God” (1 Peter 3:17, 18).

I would that time and space permitted an analysis of every part of the Corinthian letter, and each of the other letters, from this standpoint. Paul writes about an escaped slave and sends him back, “no longer as a slave, but as more than a slave— as a dear brother, very dear indeed to me and how much dearer to you, both as a man and as a Christian” (verse 16). He is not hesitant about returning Onesimus to Philemon because, “My prayer is that your fellowship with us in our common faith may deepen the understanding of all the blessings that our union with Christ brings us” (verse 6). To the community at Philippi he exhorts, “Let your bearing toward one another arise out of your life in Christ Jesus. For the divine nature was his from the first” (2:5, 6). To the Ephesian community he writes about the follies of paganism, “But that is not how you learned Christ. For were you not told of him, were you not as Christians taught the truth as it is in Jesus?” (4:20, 21).

It is apparent to the thinking reader that the apostles nowhere set up technical legal procedures for handling the various problems which were presented unto them. We are living proof that they did not. Do we not all love the Lord? Are we not all in Christ Jesus? Why are we divided? The answer is simply that we have regarded the new covenant scriptures as a legalistic framework and we have read into these letters our own interpretations. Every law needs an interpreter, or interpreting body, to apply it to specific cases and instances. The Constitution of the United States has its Supreme Court and the decisions of this august body become the official interpretation of the written code, whether popular or not. Because the interpretation is official that interpretation actually becomes the law of the land.

If we look upon the new covenant scriptures as a code of laws we must have an official interpreter, for no law can be adapted to cases which come before it unless someone rules upon the applicability of the law and the degree of culpability involved in the alleged infraction. This is what has happened. Each party has made its interpretation official and regards it as infallible. The party interpretation has become the will of God. Partisan traditions are accepted as precedents by which to judge contemporary problems. Thus division is multiplied and strife increased.

It will be asked if the “law of love” has no interpreter. Indeed it does and the interpreter is our pattern. He interpreted by action. “It is by this that we know what love is: that Christ laid down his life for us. And we in turn are bound to lay down our lives for our brothers” (1 John 3:16). “The love I speak of is not our love for God, but the love he showed to us in sending his Son as the remedy for the defilement of our sins. If God thus loved us, dear friends, we in turn are bound to love one another” (1 John 4:10, 11).

If Jesus is the interpreter who is the judge? I answer that there is both an immediate and an ultimate judge. The immediate judge is the conscience. The final judge is God who gave us both conscience and Christ. No man must ever be forced to act contrary to conscience. “This is how we may know that we belong to the realm of truth, and convince ourselves in his sight that even if our conscience condemns us, God is greater than our conscience and knows all. Dear friends, if our conscience does not condemn us, then we can approach God with confidence and obtain from him whatever we ask, because we are keeping his commandments and doing what he approves. This is his command: to give our allegiance to his Son Jesus Christ and love one another as he commanded” (1 John 3:19-23). It is for this reason that “Those of us who have a robust conscience must accept as our own burden the tender scruples of weaker men, and not consider ourselves” (Rom. 15:1).

If in our approach to an understanding of God’s will the conscience is to be a monitor I must respect its decisions even if I do not agree with them. I do not concur in all of the decrees handed down by the Supreme Court but I respect them as a citizen of the United States. Respect for a present judicial decision does not mean that I may not labor for a reversal of it within the framework provided by the Constitution. I must defend the right of brethren to examine the scriptures for themselves and this includes a recognition that they may form certain conclusions which my own conscience cannot accept as correct. Within the framework of love I can work for an amended decision, or even for a reversal of the current one, based upon new evidence. But I have no right to deny the citizenship of those who differ any more than I have a right to affirm that members of the Supreme Court cannot be Americans if their interpretation of the Constitution differs from my own understanding of that august document.

I need not be concerned about the ultimate triumph of truth. It is not necessary that I attempt to coerce or force the consciences of others into a strait-jacket of conformity. “God is greater than our conscience and knows all.” Some day each of us will give an account to the Lord of all. “To his own master he stands or falls.” It is not my prerogative, while the Lord delays his coming, to smite and beat my fellow servants. We will be measured by how well we have manifested our allegiance unto him. We will be saved, not because of our perfection, but because of his perfect sacrifice.

Not even a divine being could write a document which would be proof against abuse by its recipients and readers. Our attitude toward the love letters of the Spirit will regulate our attitude toward our brethren. If one receives a letter from a fleshly brother or sister he does not subject each word to a microscopic scrutiny in an attempt to determine what may be concealed in it that other members of the family have overlooked. It is assumed that the intent and purpose of such a letter is not to destroy but to augment and encourage the family ties. No one would assume in advance of perusing a letter from his parents that every word or statement would be of equal importance, although because of the relationship of love there is a pervading interest in all that is said.

We do not minimize the value of linguistic research but it is possible that one can become so involved in word studies that he forgets the Living Word. One may develop such an obsession for minute details related to the Lord's Supper that he cannot really eat the Lord's Supper and only partakes of the "proper kind" of bread and the "proper kind" of wine. But are we not to hold fast "the form of sound words"? Indeed we are, but the purpose of sound words is to develop sound lives and attitudes. The proper criterion by which to measure how well one holds to sound words is by the hold they have on his disposition toward others of God's children to whom the same words were written. When one makes it his chief aim in life to announce his own soundness and denounce all others, we may question if it is not the sound of his own words to which he holds fast.

Perhaps we have become tiresome and tedious in this presentation and lest we provoke your patience beyond endurance, let us summarize what we have been saying.

1. Our pattern is the Lord Jesus Christ. He came to reveal how sons of God should behave. Ours is a personal relationship with the Father, so the Son of God became the Son of man to demonstrate how the sons of men may become sons of God. We have been "chosen and destined by God the Father and sanctified by the Spirit for obedience to Jesus Christ and for sprinkling with his blood." Since he has "called us to his own glory and excellence," he has seen fit to grant "to us his precious and very great promises, that through these you may escape from the corruption that is in the world because of passion, and become partakers of the divine nature.”

2. The purpose of the transformation from our lower nature to the divine nature is to make it possible for us to react spontaneously to whatever temptations or problems we meet in life. When the primitive Christians did this they were commended, when they did not they were reprimanded. The design of both commendation and condemnation was to assure their conformity to His life and character.

3. The apostolic writings provide a normative basis for the Christian life in that they constitute a revelation from God as to how His children must conduct themselves to please Him. We cannot deprecate the value of the new covenant scriptures because they constitute our means of knowing what is involved in the divine nature. Every person who gives his allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ must seek to understand and implement in his own life the things taught by the Spirit.

4. While every facet of our relationship is provided for in the new covenant scriptures, not every detail or method of implementation is spelled out. The church of God is ageless and timeless. Its members must apply the principles set forth to the best of their ability and according to their discretion. This was true of the communities of the saints to whom the letters were originally addressed. It is equally true of those who read them nineteen centuries later.

5. As knowledge and discernment increases, alterations and amendments will be made, both personally and corporately, in order to conform more fully to the demands of the divine nature. Such changes should always be within the framework of scriptural reference while love abounds more and more. These changes undertaken to come closer to the ideal of the Master must not be regarded as digressive but as part of a spiritual maturing process.

6. Since the new covenant system is not one of legalism we should avoid making the new covenant scriptures a written code of justification. This means an avoidance of judging those in Christ Jesus whose character and behavior is above censure and who demonstrate their allegiance to Christ Jesus. We should not judge the eternal worthiness of one upon his ability to see every detail as we do, lest we set up as laws or tests of fellowship, our own reasoning or interpretation. For example, it would be sinful for me to speak disparagingly of one of God's children who does not share my views relative to the use of multiple cups in distribution of the Lord's Supper. The feast is the Lord's and I must love all of his brethren who sit down at his table. They are my brethren too. If Paul could recognize as brethren those in Corinth "who came together not for the better but for the worse" surely I can revere as brethren those who do not share all of my views about externals which have no power to save or to damn. It is enough for me that "he has put his seal upon us and given his Spirit in our hearts as a guarantee."

7. I shall not be so concerned about how much my brethren know about the written word at a given time as I am about how much they love God and the brethren at all times. Surely I want to increase in knowledge and I want others to do so, but if one could "understand all mysteries and all knowledge" he would still be nothing without love. The more I learn of God the more I will know about love because "God is love." The blueprint is not written in a book. It is inscribed on the heart by the Spirit. If I interpret the Book to inspire hate or to create and justify division, I have missed the whole point. I must believe everything God said and I must believe in Him whom God sent.

Let me once more assert my conviction. I love the revealed word of God as contained in the new covenant scriptures. It is a light to my path and a lamp to my feet. But to pervert it from its divine purpose is to take the staff intended to support one who walks with his brethren and turn it into a club to kill the brethren with whom it is intended he should walk. Signposts are to be followed and not jerked up as weapons to kill other pilgrims. God has not given us a blueprint for an institution, but a green light to proceed in the Living Way, and I am ready to go.

If God wills, it is our intention, in the next issue, to discuss very openly and frankly, some of the practical implications of what we have said about “the pattern.” Please remember that we will love you as sincerely if you cannot concur with what we write as if you do! Like Paul in his letter to Corinth I can truly close with the words, “My love be with you all in the Lord Jesus.”

A Pattern of Freedom

[Abstract]

How shall we regard the new covenant scriptures? Do they constitute a body of laws, statutes and regulations, which spell out in minute detail every action we must perform in order to please God? Or, do they provide for us a revelation of the divine mind in love, enunciating certain great principles consistent with the exemplification of the life of our Lord Jesus Christ? The answer to these questions will determine our whole philosophy of Christian behavior. The way we treat God's children depends upon our concept of God. If we regard him in the role of a stern and inflexible lawgiver we will make the church a law-enforcement agency with about as much warmth and human compassion as one would find in the criminal investigation bureau of the local police station. If we regard him as a loving parent interested in the welfare of all of his dear ones, they will be treated with personal concern by ourselves as part of the family.

It is our conviction that the new covenant scriptures were never given as an arbitrary pattern in the sense that the term "pattern" is commonly used. It is a mistaken view at this juncture which has created most of our strife and division. Men have attempted to ride roughshod over the consciences of others under the false impression that they demonstrated fidelity toward the Father by laying a heavy hand upon His children. The love letters of the Spirit have been converted into an iron scepter and a whip of scorpions. The apostolic epistles have been regarded as a yoke to be riveted about the necks of the humble by clerical despotism. It has been made to appear that God has placed his subjects under martial law.

In no sense do we deny that the scriptures are the word of God. We respect both their origin and the authority for which they were given. We are not skeptical of the word of God but we are a little skeptical of the way it is employed by a lot of people in the world, some of whom are our brethren in the Lord. We do not conceive of the new covenant scriptures as supplying a rigid pattern for every exigency that can arise among us. If our view is correct, then to force them into a peremptory and rigorous role is to wrest them from the real purpose for which they were bestowed upon us by a beneficent God. It is actually, to run counter to the divine will by making that which was intended to unite us a divisive instrument. Let us catalog for you certain points which we believe to be of utmost significance to such a discussion.

1. God has always sought to insure the togetherness of his people. In previous ages he did this by law, he now accomplishes it by love. The law constituted a stockade inside which men were confined. It provided unity at the expense of freedom. "Now before faith came, we were confined under the law, kept under restraint until faith should be revealed" (Gal. 3:23). Such a system is not adapted to free men. "For freedom Christ has set us free; stand fast therefore, and do not submit again to a yoke of slavery" (Gal. 5:1). We are not under law but under grace. We are held together, not by a wall or fence around us, but by a mutual attachment to our Lord Jesus Christ. The Jews were held together by that which enclosed them on the perimeter; we are held together by a magnetic power which attracts us to a common center. They were hemmed in, we are in Him!

2. The previous covenant was written upon tablets of stone. It was a legalistic system as unyielding and inflexible as the stones upon which the ten commandments were inscribed. The new covenant is “written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone, but on tablets of human hearts” (2 Cor. 3:3). The envoys of Jesus were “qualified to be ministers of a new covenant, not in a written code but in the Spirit; for the written code kills, but the Spirit gives life.” Observe that the man who wrote the majority of the new covenant epistles positively declares that he was not ministering unto us a written code. Those who take what he did write and convert it into a code of legalistic procedure violate his very purpose.

3. The difference between God’s treatment of us and his attitude toward the people in previous ages is found in the maturity to which mankind has attained. While his people were children they were no better off than slaves. They were under guardians and trustees until the date set by the father. When the time arrived, God sent forth His Son to redeem those who were under the law, so they might receive the adoption as sons. Confinement under law is slavery, freedom in Christ is sonship. “So through God you are no longer a slave but a son, and if a son then an heir.” Few of us have recognized that if we seek to be justified by law we forfeit our inheritance. Only those free from law are sons, only sons are heirs! To convert the grace of God into a law is to deprive us of the very thing we hope to achieve by such action.

4. The coming of Christ made the difference! “The law was our custodian until Christ came, that we might be justified by faith.” Sin separated man from God and broke up the personal relationship which existed between them. No law could ever be devised or imposed which could restore such a relationship as sin destroyed. Law can confine, keep under restraint, and act as a custodian. It can point out and identify sin and provide a penalty for it but it cannot give life to the dead. Reconciliation had to be provided by a person. The law was holy, but God was not in the law reconciling man unto himself. The righteousness of God is not revealed in a law but in persons. Since the new covenant is written upon our hearts, we are the righteousness of God. “God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself, . . . For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God” (2 Cor. 5:19, 21).

5. Many of us seem incapable of accepting fully the implications of such transcendent glory as that with which God invests us. We still want to view it through a veil. Consider the import of the statement, “But now that faith has come, we are no longer under a custodian” (Gal. 3:25). “The law was our custodian until Christ came.” The very function of law is custodial. If we make of the new covenant scriptures a written code, or law, then we are under a custodian. We have merely swapped a previous custodian for a present one. When the apostle says we are no longer under a custodian, he simply means we are no longer under a law. We are free in Christ Jesus. To take the apostolic injunctions, admonitions, and commandments, and forge these into a law for justification and righteousness; to impose them as a written code to restrain men and hold them “in line,” is to create another custodian as certainly as we do it.

6. All law requires interpretation and he who interprets it regards his interpretation as the law, or its equivalent. He may, or may not, enforce his interpretation, depending upon his temperament, zeal, and inclination, but whether he does, or does not, enforce it, he will regard those who do not conform to his interpretation as violating the law. The hope of securing proper reverence for all who are in Christ Jesus lies in a recognition that we are not under law at all, but under grace. “But now we are discharged from the law, dead to that which held us captive, so that we serve not under the old written code but in the new life of the Spirit” (Rom. 7:6).

Such a noble concept when enunciated always brings a question about the rise of anarchy. A goodly number of brethren trust themselves and distrust everyone else in Christ Jesus. They regard themselves as the divinely appointed “keepers of orthodoxy” and “detectors of heresy.” By some indefinable means God has blessed them with such profound wisdom and proficiency in judgment that they can relay to the rest of mankind the official meaning of the messages from the Throne. They cannot furnish others with an unadorned copy of the sacred writings and trust them to understand what they read. They must embellish it, explain and emphasize it, and then “withdraw” from those who do not accept their interpretations as the divine law. It is obvious that they are much more frightened by anarchy than by tyranny, unless someone seeks to do unto them as they do unto others!

As for myself, I am not too fearful of any who are in Christ Jesus and who seek to walk “not after the flesh but after the Spirit.” I rather suspect there would have been faithful children of God if I had never been born. Our real problem is that we have filled our congregations with people who know nothing about the indwelling Spirit and we have to continue “cracking the whip” over their heads to keep them coming and contributing to the support of their taskmasters. Let us not forget that only slaves require taskmasters to be “urgent, saying, ‘Complete your work, your daily tasks’” (Exo. 5:13). Loving sons will do the wish of their Father, prompted by an inner feeling which no law can create.

Let us think together about the origin, nature and purpose of the new covenant scriptures. I consider these to be an expression of the will of God through chosen ambassadors. The Father gave this revelation to an age of the world which had attained its spiritual majority. This maturity was reached by the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ who is our pattern. It was not the intention of God to provide for us a detailed program for every spiritual activity. This would have been a reflection against those who were no longer slaves, but sons. Moreover, the Father desires to preserve the individuality of His children as does a careful earthly parent. It was never His desire to stifle our rational powers but to channel them. Can we agree on the following suggestions relative to the new testament writings?

1. The apostles wrote to deal with specific conditions which had arisen or which threatened. They did not specify the exact method in every instance for application of the principles they set forth but entrusted this to the sanctified hearts and consecrated commonsense of those to whom the messages were addressed. The administration of those same principles in our own age must be subject to the discretion and judgment of the saints.

2. The problems confronting the Christian system change from one generation to another and vary in different localities on the earth. However, all such problems resolve into questions of relationship and neither the categories of relationship nor the principles governing such ever alter. Any problem of relationship is always complex and latitude must be allowed in working it out. There may be more than one manner of approaching such a problem and we should not conclude that the employment of a different approach necessarily negates or destroys the relationship.

3. While the adaptability of divinely enunciated principles to our present state and needs is a demonstration of superior wisdom, their validity does not inhere from this, but from the authority of their author. As the source of all power, God is greater than any principle he has announced, and since every principle has been stated to secure a certain objective or goal, that objective is superior to any method which may be employed to attain to it. This in no sense affirms that the end justifies the means but it does warn us that when we become so involved in discussion of the means that we lose sight of the goal, we are sacrificing the greater for the lesser and our sense of values is distorted. It is astonishing how many debates have been held about modes and means by those who never pray together about the real goal to be achieved by such means.

4. In carrying out the divine purpose the primitive saints made use of such means as were at hand to accomplish their objective. Their employment of such means was not intended to be either exhaustive or exclusive, and we are free to make use of such means as we have at hand in implementation of the divine will, provided that the use of such means is not forbidden, or is not contrary to some other feature of the divine will as expressed. The selection and utilization of such means must be by the function of human judgment and in its exercise one is accountable to the Master and not to other servants. In other words, one slave cannot sit in judgment of another slave. "To his own master he stands or falls." A member can exercise his own judgment to reject the judgment of another but he cannot reject the other Person. There is a difference in disagreeing with a man's judgment and in judging him as being unworthy of the family relationship.

5. Inasmuch as the Lord lived among men at a given place on the globe and at a given time in history, some of what he said, and some of what the apostles wrote, was directly related to conditions then and there obtaining, and must be understood in that frame of reference. All truths are equally true but they are not all equally important. The relative importance of certain truths may fluctuate in different eras and in diverse areas. A truth is not always equally relevant in every spot on our globe. Certainly that which is essential to being is more important than that which merely contributes to wellbeing.

6. The method of implementation of principles or truths may vary according to custom, environment or tradition. Such variations need not be assessed as a denial or abrogation of the principles, nor should a specific method be bound as uniformly required regardless of circumstances or conditions. We suggest two examples, one related to an act of Jesus, the other to an apostolic declaration, which may serve to illustrate our point.

1. Washing of Feet

“Before the feast of the Passover . . . Jesus . . . rose from supper, laid aside his garments, and girded himself with a towel. Then he poured water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples’ feet, and to wipe them with the towel with which he was girded.”

Due to the terrain over which they traveled, and because men wore sandals or walked barefoot, it had long been a custom to set a basin of water before a guest that he might bathe his feet. Eventually this act was performed by a servant, or slave, of the household, who washed the feet of the visitor and dried them with a towel with which he had girded himself. In view of this, it came to pass that when a host wished to demonstrate special honor to a guest, he personally performed the task, thus relegating himself to the role of a menial in kneeling before the guest.

Jesus enforced the point of his action with the words, “You call me Teacher and Lord; and you are right, for so I am. If I then, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example, that you also should do as I have done to you.” He then added, “A servant is not greater than his master; nor is he who is sent greater than he who sent him. If you know these things, blessed are you if you do them.”

Upon the basis of these words some followers of Jesus in an age and place remote from his time have felt called upon to practice the washing of feet as an ordinance to be observed by the congregation. We do not speak derogatorily of any sincere attempt to be like Jesus when we mention that the observation of such a practice in our present circumstances may have exactly the opposite effect of that intended. No longer is the custom followed generally in the homes and lives of the people. It has completely lost its significance in our culture. To offer a guest a basin of water and to volunteer to wash his feet as soon as he arrives in the home would only insult him.

Under such circumstances to make a ritualistic observance of such an act may actually engender pride in partisan orthodoxy. There is a possibility that a group may place so much value on externals as to say, "Lord, we thank thee that we are not as other men, even as those who do not follow the example of our Lord in the washing of feet." In such case the washing of feet may become a matter of sectarian glory and not be an exhibition of the humble spirit at all. It was the very casualness with which our Savior arose and carried out the ablutions which made his deed so outstanding. To arrogate to such an act a creedal significance and to bind it upon men as a ritual when it has lost all of its original instructive value is to foster partisan vain-glory. This is the ever present danger in all ritual observances. It is easy to display our faith to men rather than dedicate it to God from the heart.

No thoughtful person will deny that we need to recapture for our age that sense of genuine humility and concern which characterized the life of Jesus. We live in a world where "luxury's vile contagion" has affected the whole social structure. It is an era of braggadocio, bluster and boasting. From our international relationships to our local traffic congestion, it is often the biggest bluffer who wins. This makes for glorification of the artificial and superficial. It is precisely at such a time that men are tempted to place their trust in externals as the means for demonstrating intangible qualities. A ritual may be created which, when performed, will enable them to say, "That takes care of my humility for this week— or year." Under the group pressure to participate in such a ritual for ritual's sake, the truly genuine man may be the one who declines to do so.

You will note that we spoke of the humility which characterized the life of Jesus. We need to develop that type of character which will respond in proper fashion in every circumstance that may arise and which will exhibit itself in any recognized custom or procedure. It is absurd to suppose that if Jesus visited America this year that he would insist upon washing our feet as an indication that we should be in subjection to each other. He would adapt himself to our manner of existence and give force and meaning to our recognized modes of expressing values. He would demonstrate the difference between empty forms and vital requirements. The record of John is not authority for washing feet but for cleansing hearts of pride. The former was but incidental to the latter. He who takes such an incidental and exalts it into a law mistakes the purpose of the divine example. The grave danger is that one may give such emphasis to the incidental that he neglects the essential.

2. The Feminine Veil

In the same category, as we see it, is the teaching of Paul in 1 Corinthians 11:2-16. No doubt there are a good many things the apostle had in mind which we may never clearly understand. Without a complete knowledge of the circumstances which called forth the letter we can only surmise its direct application. It seems that certain of the sisters in the congregation were praying or prophesying without wearing a veil and this practice was bringing reproach upon them and upon the community of the saints. We think that a careful study of the passage will show that its central theme is the subordination of the woman to her husband. There is no degradation involved in this for “In the Lord woman is not independent of man nor man of woman; for as woman was made from man, so man is now born of woman. And all things are from God” (1 Cor. 11:12).

In Greek cities, as well as in Eastern cities, it was the custom for women to wear a veil in public. This was a visible token of the fact that the woman recognized a status of social subordination. It was a badge of authority on her head (verse 10) and was indicative of that becoming modesty associated with the finest quality of feminine grace. Only the women of bad character who depended upon their physical charms to enhance their profession appeared without the veil. Apparently, the women in the community of saints at Corinth, mistaking certain aspects of the apostolic instruction, concluded that Christianity was intended to disregard all customs and abolish existing social structures. Their action created a scandal in the eyes of the heathen populace and if persisted in, would have rendered the divine message useless and ineffective.

Christianity did not have as its goal the destruction or abrogation of social customs. It did not interfere with funeral customs, wedding customs, or legal proceedings. True, it has had an effect upon traditional patterns by the gradual dissemination of truth about human relationships, but Jesus and his apostles were not “social reformers” in the current usage of that term. Therefore, those who were Christians conformed to social customs which were without moral significance when considered objectively, but which would have made those who disregarded them liable to moral stigma.

A great deal of writing has been done about whether or not the women in our society must wear a veil in the public services of the saints. It is not at all my plan or intention to enter into controversy over the matter. I have read all that has been written on all sides of the question and which has been available to me. In most instances, brethren are willing to settle for women wearing a hat (quite a gaudy creation in many cases which would really have created a stir in Corinth), or a token covering of some sort. I do not believe that either modesty or subordination is judged by our society on wearing a veil or hat. Since the criterion no longer obtains it would be a useless gesture. The veil is not now regarded as a badge of authority and a woman who appears publicly without a veil does not thereby dishonor her husband.

The principle of subordination will last as long as time continues. The distinctive differences between the sexes must always be recognized and maintained. We must differentiate between improving a state and abolishing it. Christianity has worked as a constant leaven to elevate woman from the plane of a chattel to that of a companion, in all the fulness of meaning and dignity attached to this latter term. But the overt demonstration of subordination will vary in different social structures, and to bind upon all and sundry, traditions which have been out-grown or lost their significance, is merely to rivet a yoke which God has not authorized. To use as a measuring rod of modest behavior a standard which has been discarded or outgrown would be like insisting upon paying your taxes with a denarius because Jesus did. Standards of social judgment change as do those of coinage.

Of course the real danger lies in the literal adoption of a thing as a symbol of a state of heart. Modesty and subordination are inner qualities of Christian character. It is possible that we may become so involved in discussions about a covering for the head that we fall into the error of supposing that the mere act of wearing such a covering constitutes the proper attitude. Thus a woman may sit in a public meeting with a hat on her head and a heart full of hate and revolt toward her husband. It is one thing to wear a veil in a society where it is universally regarded as a symbol, but a wholly different thing to wear one in conformity to a legalistic procedure where society is wholly oblivious of whether one has a hat on or not. A short time ago I was in a congregation where a husband affirmed in class that he did not believe a woman needed to have her head covered in the public assembly. His wife disagreed. After the service she said to me, "You just wait until I get him home!" She wanted to get her hat off before she started in on him.

The new covenant scriptures are authority for a recognized standard of subordination. "The head of every man is Christ, the head of a woman is her husband, and the head of Christ is God.” They are also authority for conformity to recognized social customs which publicly demonstrate the Christian character of modesty and humility. But the church of God is universal. It is ageless and timeless. It must exist in every clime and amidst varied cultures and traditions. It must not be made the excuse for that arbitrary action whereby one nation or people impose their own culture and traditions upon all others. It is a little difficult for some people to separate their loyalty to Jesus from their patriotism!

Preserving Our Freedom

Perhaps it would be well for some of us who think we have a correct understanding of the relationship of foot-washing and veil-wearing to Christian character, to take a second look at some of the other things which we regard as vital to fellowship with God and Christ Jesus. It could well be that we are making the word of God authoritative in matters where it was not intended to be such at all. Few of us would be willing to place the scriptures in the hands of others without some commentary and explanations accompanying them. Our plea for the authority of the scriptures means that they are authoritative “as explained by us.” The real authority, in the final analysis, is not the scriptures at all but our interpretation. If you doubt this you need merely to observe what happens to a man who questions the orthodox and traditional viewpoint. Regardless of how godly in character he may be, or how much he loves and values the word of God and seeks to emulate it, he is driven forth as a pagan and publican.

We do not trust the rest of God’s children as much as he trusts them. He gave them his revelation unencumbered by our interpolations and footnotes. Apparently thousands of saints died for the faith, and in the faith, before we came along. They did not have the advantage (?) of our erudition and interpretative skill. They were forced to go to the stake with only the Bible for comfort and without one of our debate books clutched in their hand. In this generation the word is authoritative as it has been digested, collated and officially explained by partisan heroes and editors. If we immerse one into Christ we hand him a Bible and give him a subscription to a partisan journal. It is the word as filtered through that journal which is authoritative. The word as explained in other and rival journals is not authoritative at all.

What sect or party would simply send the word of God, the revelation of God's will, to enlightened parts of the world, and tell men to obey its teachings? The American Bible Society has as its mission the publication of the holy scriptures in the language of the people, without note or comment, and most of those who plead the loudest for the authority of the sacred scriptures would not even support it in its mission. They would not announce its programs and they might "withdraw fellowship" from any who supported it. The word of God is not enough to save the world. Men go to the very countries from which they import many of the Bibles they carry and announce that they are taking the gospel to them for the first time.

The Wycliffe translators are doing a tremendous job in translating the scriptures into the languages of tribes which have never had the Word of God. Young college students are devoting their lives to going among savage peoples, living with them and sharing in their lives. They exist among these primitive folk in almost indescribable conditions. Through use of tape recorders and other means they capture the gutturals and grunts which constitute a mode of communication and from these construct an alphabet which may be employed in translating the message from heaven into another language of the world. It is doubtful whether we would support a brother who felt called upon to labor with the Wycliffe group. The constituents do not all belong to our party. It would be considered a compromise to give the heathen the message of God unless it was sponsored by "a faithful church."

Yet, every translation of the sacred scriptures that we so readily employ in our own study and services, was the result of painstaking labor by men who were not connected with “our movement.” We do not hesitate to use the King James Version despite the fact that it was commissioned by a foreign monarch and those who gave it to us were all connected with the Church of England. We will stand before an audience and read the J. B. Phillips’ translation, but if Phillips himself visited us we would not call upon him to stand up and read it in our hearing. We are not averse to warming ourselves by fires that others have kindled provided the others do not attempt to stand with us and warm themselves.

It is true that we spend hundreds of dollars sending the inspired scriptures to other lands but we spend thousands in sending uninspired men along to give the natives our “official” slant on the Book. This also includes the transportation of our feuds and fusses into remote areas where they have little relevance. We must be sure that primitive headhunters not only find Jesus, but also find out the correct way to break the bread, so they will be “loyal.” In no sense am I criticizing the ambition of humble men to go into all of the world and take the gospel to all who are enslaved by sin. However, most of the brethren are confused by what constitutes the gospel over here. It is not to be marveled at that they manifest the same confusion over there. It is for that reason we have sent our missionaries from a half dozen different kinds of “Churches of Christ” to create division in Christ of those who were relatively united as heathen. Our history is replete with incidents in which the long arm of American domination has reached across oceans to exercise control over congregations made up of simple people whose humble and unadorned devotion to the Master should shame us in our theological sophistication and pride.

I am not certain whether it is God’s revelation or orthodox American Church-of-Christ-ism which is our real authority. Many of our missionaries must keep one eye fastened on heaven and the other on Texas or Tennessee. The reaction in the latter places to any move or teaching will generally determine “heaven’s will” in the matter. This is not written sarcastically. It is a simple statement of conditions as I view them. Our brethren are sincere but they are victims of a system of exclusivism and legalism unparalleled in our age outside of the Roman Catholic Church. They employ the same tactics of enforcement— boycott, censorship and excommunication. They are frequently coerced by the very clergy to whose support they must contribute under threat of eternal damnation. All of this is done (as by the Catholic Clerics) in the mistaken view that such an attitude is pleasing unto God.

Our real mistake was to confound the church of God with the restoration movement launched by Presbyterians and others on American soil. This has led us to think of Christianity in our age as a sort of American possession to be shared with less fortunate regions of the earth. That it is a kind of “white man’s religion” is evident from the attitude of many in the United States who will contribute copious sums to take the gospel to Negroes in Africa while refusing to allow them in their meetinghouses over here. Our hypocrisy in refusing to develop the kind of character Jesus came to reveal, while at the same time insisting upon the authority of divine revelation, ought to prove to us that Pharisaism is not dead. “The scribes and Pharisees sit on Moses’ seat, so practice and observe whatever they tell you, but not what they do, for they preach, but do not practice” (Matt. 23:23). When we send missionaries to other lands it is not to share with them what is ours but to take to them what is also theirs.

It is rather astonishing how we have learned to “explain away” those things in the sacred writings which we do not wish to accept or practice. Take the “holy kiss” as an example. Here is something for which we have repeated command of the apostles. In addition to the commands we have the actual example of the primitive saints in conjunction with an apostle (Acts 20:37). We need not depend upon a “necessary inference” with regard to it. The last half of Romans 16:16 is very precious to a lot of us. “All the churches of Christ greet you.” But we have a clever way of evading the first half, which says, “Greet one another with a holy kiss.”

The average “Church of Christ preacher” when confronted with this, seeks to evade its force by ridicule. He may say, “It’s all right with me if you want to kiss me provided you don’t chew tobacco or dip snuff.” Or he may arouse levity by saying, “I’ll let you kiss me if you insist on it, if you’ll let me smell your breath first.” This approach to what the apostle may have written as tears streamed down his cheeks, is unworthy of one who professes to be a teacher of God’s will. If the word of God is our pattern in every particular, and if what the apostles wrote to the congregations, constitutes an exact absolute guide for every Christian action, why do we dispense with this command?

The truth is that the strict legalist can neither laugh this off nor scoff it out of application. If the new covenant scriptures constitute a specific law, compiled as a written code, the holy kiss is obligatory upon saints today. When the legalist explains it away he forfeits in the process that which is vital to his “blue print” concept. When it is stated that the command is to greet, the regulation is expressed by the word holy, and the custom was by a kiss, and that we are free to substitute our own custom as practiced in our culture, it is evident that the scriptures must be interpreted (for this is an interpretation), and they may be interpreted (at least in some instances) in the light of contemporary customs. Who is to be the Supreme Court and determine which scriptures can be so regarded and which may not?

In my own concept of the divine purpose, which is simply that Jesus is our pattern and the development of a character consistent with the divine nature is our goal, this scripture presents no problem. If Jesus went among the Chinese he would shake hands with himself in greeting; if he went among the Eskimo people he would rub noses with them. Whatever he did would be holy and free from guile. The Christian character must be exhibited in various forms and methods dictated by the recognized customs of the time and place. While it is true that we are free we must willingly submit to regulations and restraints. In this we exercise our freedom.

“For though I am free from all men, I have made myself a slave to all, that I might win the more. To the Jews I became as a Jew, in order to win Jews; to those under the law I became as one under the law— though not being myself under the law— that I might win those under the law. To those outside the law I became as one outside the law— not being without law toward God but under the law of Christ— that I might win those outside the law. To the weak I became weak, that I might win the weak. I have become all things to all men, that I might by all means save some. I do it all for the sake of the gospel, that I may share in its blessings.”

The Law of Christ

What is the law of Christ to which Paul alludes? Note that it is one which obligates a free man to become the slave of all and to do this voluntarily to achieve a greater cause— to win the more. The law of Christ is not the new covenant scriptures for these had not been written when Paul declared himself to be under it. Moreover, Paul was beheaded before all of these scriptures were written, so if they constituted the law, he was never under it in its perfection.

Any law acts as a restraining force for this is the nature of law. It restricts one in the exercise of freedom by bringing him up short when he reaches its bounds. What law is it which makes the welfare of others superior to your own and thus compels you to sacrifice your own inclinations in order to win others? On this point there can be little question. “You, my friends, were called to be free men; only do not turn your freedom into licence for your lower nature, but be servants to one another in love. For the whole law can be summed up in a single commandment: ‘Love your neighbor as yourself’” (Gal. 5:13, 14).

Love is the law of Christ. In one of his final discourses, Jesus said, “I give you a new commandment: love one another; as I have loved you so you are to love one another. If there is this love among you, then all will know that you are my disciples” (John 14:34, 35). Love is the only absolute within the Christian framework. Augustine was correct when he declared, “Love God and do what you please.” This is a perfect law of liberty. The exaltation of any other law or code must always infringe upon this. I have never known anyone who regarded the new covenant scriptures as a legalistic code who did not violate the law of love — the law of Christ. When anything except love becomes law, love is restricted or excluded by that thing, for that is the function of law. It is only when love itself is the law that it is uninhibited and unrestrained.

The new covenant letters were not written to comprise a legalistic code for the people of God. If they were, the community of saints existed for some sixty years without part of that law and for two decades without any of it. The epistles were written to commend those who observed the law of love (e.g., the one to the Philippians), or to call back to that law those who deviated from it. Nothing is clearer from these Spirit-filled letters than the fact that Jesus is our pattern and love is our law. This runs like a golden thread through all of them without exception. They constitute for us a norm of Christian behavior because they reveal how a character founded and grounded in love should react under given circumstances.

These scriptures were not written in full and imposed upon the saved ones as a law from the inception of the community of saints. From the beginning they were under the law of Christ—love. “Dear friends, I give you no new command. It is the old command which you always had before you; the old command is the message which you heard from the beginning. And yet again it is a new command that I am giving you— new in the sense that the darkness is passing and the real light already shines . . . Only the man who loves his brother dwells in the light: there is nothing to make him stumble” (1 John 2:7, 8, 10). As difficult as it may be for those who have been reared behind a fence of legalism to admit the truthfulness of what we write, it is our conviction that it is true.

The commandments are the outgrowth of the love of the Father and they should be kept out of love for Him. It makes all the difference in the world whether you regard these commands as the statutory requirements of a police state or the uplifting requests of a loving parent. Jesus did not say, “If you fear me you will obey my commands,” but “If you love me you will obey my commands.” Legalism is always concerned with the precept; love is concerned with the person. In the former, if there is any conflict between mercy and law, the law must be fulfilled regardless of circumstances. Judgment rejoices and triumphs over mercy in such a system, because it is the dignity of the law, not the dignity of the person which must be maintained.

This is not true of the law of liberty. “Always speak and act as men who are to be judged under a law of freedom. In that judgment there will be no mercy for the man who has shown no mercy. Mercy triumphs over judgment” (James 2:12, 13). The law of liberty is the law of Christ. It allows one the liberty to show mercy. No one requires mercy who keeps a law in its perfection. It is only when honest intention and purity of motive fall below the legal standard that mercy is required. The thing that makes “a perfect law of liberty” is its provision for imperfect beings. We must ever speak and act as those who will be held responsible for showing mercy. If there is a question as to enforcement of law or extension of mercy, the law of freedom makes love for men, not love for law, our chief objective.

The translation of this passage by J. B. Phillips is a very fortunate one. “Anyway, you should speak and act as men who will be judged by the law of freedom. The man who makes no allowances for others will find none made for him. It is still true that mercy smiles in the face of judgment.” It is not amiss to cite his translation of Ephesians 4:1-3 at this juncture. “As God’s prisoner then, I beg you to live lives worthy of your high calling. Accept life with humility and patience, making allowances for each other because you love each other. Make it your aim to be at one in the Spirit, and you will inevitably be at peace with one another.”

It is our intention, in our next issue, to deal practically with some of the problems confronting those of us in the non-instrument segment of the disciple brotherhood. For instance, I believe that in conjunction with the Lord’s Supper, some have elevated certain incidentals and made of them essentials, and that this course has been divisive and disruptive. I do not intend to speak censoriously of those who have done this, because their action is simply an expression of the “specific pattern” philosophy which is generally characteristic of all of our factions. Some exhibit it with reference to certain details, while others do so with reference to other details. All of us have been guilty in certain aspects.

My intention is to help all of us to re-evaluate our current condition in the light of God’s purpose for our lives. We will gain little by biting criticism or accusation. I am not so much concerned with assessing fault as with alleviating it. We believe that all of our readers will welcome the next issue of the paper which will be sent forth “with malice toward none; with charity toward all.”

The Supper Pattern

Mission Messenger (May 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

A few years ago an American evangelist visited a congregation of saints in another land. When the Lord's table was uncovered he saw that it contained a small loaf of leavened bread. He was undecided as to whether he should partake of it, because he had always been accustomed to unleavened bread on the table. That afternoon he voiced his feelings in the home of one of the elders, pointing out that Jesus chose unleavened bread. The elder informed him that Jesus did not have a choice. The Lord's Supper was ordained in conjunction with the Passover which ushered in the feast of unleavened bread. During this time Jewish families ate unleavened bread as their staple diet. Jesus simply took the kind of bread they ate at their regular meals and consecrated it. The elder pointed out that they followed the example of Jesus and used the kind of bread that was used in their ordinary meals.

Tradition is a powerful force in moulding religious practice. So the preacher pointed out that Jesus took unleavened bread and we should do the same. It was quickly pointed out to him that when Jesus or the apostles spoke of the bread they used the word artos, which means a loaf, leavened or unleavened. They did not once use the word azumos, which is the Greek for "unleavened" in any of their instructions relative to the Supper. Jesus used unleavened bread because he was a Jew. This was the only bread at hand. To argue that no one can observe the feast acceptably while eating leavened bread is to impeach the standing of thousands of God's children in the world, as well as to set up as a law that which was an incidental feature. The family should not be divided into a "leavened bread party" and an "unleavened bread party." Such factionalism is a sin.

Speaking of sin reminds us that some are so careless as to state that the Jews ate unleavened bread at the Passover because leaven was a type of sin. This is not the case at all. Unleavened bread was used to remind the people only of the haste in which they fled Egypt. "They baked unleavened cakes of the dough which they brought out of Egypt, for it was not leavened, because they were thrust out of Egypt and could not tarry" (Exodus 12:39). Moses declared, "You shall eat no leavened bread with it; seven days you shall eat it with unleavened bread, the bread of affliction—for you came out of the land of Egypt in hurried flight—that all the days of your life you may remember the day when you came out of the land of Egypt" (Deut. 16:3). Unleavened bread had a special relevance to the Jewish passover. It has none to the Lord's Supper.

The interesting thing about the preacher to whom we referred is his attitude toward some of his brethren in the United States. He was a champion of individual cups and regarded those who insisted on the use of one container as extremists. He opposed those who advocated the use of fermented wine in the Lord's Supper as radicals. He accused them of creating division by making laws where God had not made them, yet he had no hesitancy of trying to bind his view of unleavened bread upon congregations in another part of the world. One evident feature of the "rigid pattern concept" of the new covenant scriptures is that it renders inconsistent every one of its proponents and adherents. The pattern which all of them really follow is one concocted of partisan traditions, explanations and interpretations.

Perhaps the Lord's Supper will serve as a good illustration of how honest men divide over what they think is involved in “the pattern.” It is especially important because it was to serve as a visible witness to our oneness. The word for fellowship (koinonia) is actually applied to it and translated communion (1 Cor. 10:16). The record says, “For we being many are one bread and one body: for all are partakers of that one bread.” Surely if we are agreed upon any matter it should be this. The truth is that no other single item has been as divisive among us. Since it was divinely authorized as a demonstration of our cooperation, but has become the foundation for our disintegration it may furnish a clue to the nature of our trouble.

In spite of the fact that volumes have been written about the Lord’s Supper what is said about it in the scriptures can be contained in very limited space. It is not even alluded to in most of the apostolic letters and had it not been for serious controversy existing at Corinth there is no indication it would have been mentioned in the first letter addressed to the saints in that city.

Christianity has no sacred places, no sacred days, and no sacred rituals. Its only earthly sanctuary is the human heart. Here the Spirit dwells and Jesus abides by faith. Its only law is love. It is universal in scope and makes no demands that cannot be met by half-clad aborigines in the jungles as well as by sophisticated intellectuals in other cultures. While its foundation is the union of individual hearts to the Lord through the Spirit, this union creates a fellowship by its very nature. Those who are called out of the world and into Christ Jesus share in a new relationship with him, and through him, with all others who have responded to his call.

It is a koinonia of death and life. Those who compose it do so because they are dead to sin and are alive unto God through Jesus Christ the Lord. The watchwords of the fellowship are faith, hope and love. These sustain life in the three dimensions of which we are capable— past, present and future. Faith reaches back to the historical event of the cross which gave value to life; hope reaches forward to the consummation of the divine purpose and gives meaning to life. Love exists in the present and gives expression to life.

The ordinances of our Lord are two in number and both are designed to manifest our relationship to God in all three temporal dimensions. God is a divine economist. He imposes nothing that is superfluous. He requires nothing extraneous. Only two ordinances are required, one to mark our entrance or admission into the fellowship, the other to signal our continuance in it. Since those who are born into a family relationship need never re-enter, the first requires no repetition; but inasmuch as the family endures, the act expressive of it is continuous and repetitious.

Baptism, as a demonstration of our trust in Jesus, is simply a direct participation in “the passion play” drama of the ages. By faith we look back to the cross and are crucified with him. Through hope we look forward to justification in his presence. In love we are raised to walk in new life, the life of love. As Jesus died for us and was raised but one time, so we need to die and be raised only once. Death brings a cessation of all past relationships and their consequences and results. Resurrection introduces us to a new relationship with all of its blessings and privileges, whether we understand them all at the time or not. Baptism is an initiatory act. It is not to be multiplied. One may be born again because he should sustain a relationship to both flesh and spirit, but since these are the only two relationships into which he can come he should not be born again and again.

The Lord's Supper

In the Lord's Supper we give constant testimony to faith, hope and love. We proclaim the Lord's death (past) until he comes again (future). We do this as a communion (koinonia) of the body and blood of our Lord. This is an overt and public declaration that the called ones constitute the one body and that they are held together by the mutual ties of love. So important is this that when cleavages exist and factions are present, those who meet as a congregation cannot eat the Lord's Supper. They may partake of the ingredients, but it is not the Lord's Supper. It is not eating the bread or drinking the cup which makes our attitude acceptable unto God, but our attitude toward each other which makes eating the bread and drinking the cup acceptable unto God. "I am told that when you meet as a congregation you fall into sharply divided groups . . . The result is that when you meet as a congregation, it is impossible for you to eat the Lord's Supper."

The Lord's Supper is a public witness that we are one body, the Lord's body. As to this fact the apostle said, "I speak to you as men of sense. Form your own judgment on what I say." The implication is that there is but one judgment to which men of sense can come as they contemplate the Supper. The apostle then says that about which he wishes the judgment to be formed. "When we bless the cup of blessing, is it not a means of sharing the blood of Christ? When we break the bread is it not a means of sharing the body of Christ? Because there is one loaf, we, many as we are, are one body, for it is one loaf of which we all partake." If one partakes of the bread as a factional function or partisan privilege, he does not discern the body at all. Instead, he regards the faction or the party as the one body, a concept which counts the blood of the covenant wherewith we are sanctified an unholy thing and of less value than partisan conformity. Such a person, by his very eating and drinking, brings judgment on his head. "For he who eats and drinks, eats and drinks judgment on himself if he does not discern the Body" (1 Cor. 11:29).

In view of this emphasis it is astounding how men have divided over various features connected with the Lord's Supper, and created factions to advance their divergent views. Those who have done so do not wilfully and deliberately desire to disregard the word of God. All of them want to fear God and keep his commandments. Without exception they are trying to be faithful to what they regard as “the pattern” for the Lord’s Supper as they have been conditioned to do. All read the same Bible. All appeal to it for authority for their respective positions. Each charges the other with apostasy from the truth.

Why is it that honest and conscientious men cannot see “the pattern” alike? Is it possible that there is no meticulous and legalistic pattern and that all are searching for what does not exist? Can it be possible that men have been taught that the accounts of the life of our Lord and the letters from the envoys constitute a pattern, until they are trying to read a specific pattern into the text, elevating the incidental to the domain of the essential? To be explicit, brethren have divided over the use of individual containers for one thing. Did Jesus shed his blood to create a body to contend for the pro or con of such an issue?

In general, the debaters for each side assume that Jesus provided a pattern, that they both know what it is, and that the opposition is either ignorant or sectarian in attitude. If there is a plain pattern how can honest men who love the Lord disagree about it? It will avail nothing to impugn motives or imply dishonesty. Both parties have their share of sincere people. Both have their share of spiritual delinquents. If Jesus never intended to give “a pattern” for the things involved, and the word of God was not written for such a purpose as it is quoted during controversy, the dispute is much ado about nothing, and each congregation might well determine how it will proceed without attack or reprisal from any other.

Jesus instituted an ordinance designed to proclaim his death and to be a visible testimony to the unity of the one body. Such an ordinance had to be the essence of simplicity as it would be observed by unlearned and illiterate as well as by those of advanced knowledge. It had to consist of that which was universally known and practiced so that elaborate instruction would not be requisite. It is a tribute to the divine mind that eating and drinking, the very acts essential to the preservation of life, were adopted and elevated to a plane of spiritual significance. To make these common acts a portrayal of fellowship or communion, it was ordained that they must be performed together with others.

For generations before Jesus came, the act of feasting together was regarded as one indicative of sharing in common with others. Even the eternal state was portrayed as one in which men would come from the east and the west and sit down together at a table with the fathers— Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. This was fellowship manifested in a practical fashion. From it came a veritable vocabulary of togetherness. For example, it is said of Jesus that, “he raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places.”

Jesus was already eating with his disciples when he ordained the Lord’s Supper. As Jews, they were keeping the feast of the passover. “During supper he took bread, and having said the blessing he broke it and gave it to them, with the words: ‘Take this; this is my body.’ Then he took a cup, and having offered thanks to God he gave it to them; and they all drank from it. And he said, ‘This is my blood of the covenant, shed for many. I tell you this: never again shall I drink from the fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new in the kingdom of God’” (Mark 14:22-25).

It is imperative that we remember that Jesus ordained a supper. This requires two actions— eating and drinking; and these, in turn, require two substances, a solid and a liquid. Jesus used bread for the first and the fruit of the vine for the second. Thus, Jesus ordained that we eat the bread and drink the cup. This is the ordinance and I know of none of us who disagree on anything related to it. When we eat the bread and drink the cup as a memorial to him, we have the proper motivation as relates to Jesus; when we do so to proclaim his death we have the proper motivation as relates to others; when we do so discerning the Body we have the proper motivation as relates to self.

Human Deductions

Jesus did not ordain that we have a certain kind of bread, nor did he ordain that we use one container. It is true that Jesus personally used a certain kind of bread and I am convinced that he used but one container. These features, however, borrowed from the passover setting in which the Supper was ordained, are incidentals and not essentials. They are not essentials to our eating and drinking together nor are they essential to the threefold motivation with which we are to eat the Supper. Those who use leavened bread and those who use multiple cups for distribution of the fruit of the vine, eat and drink together as certainly as do others who use unleavened bread and one container. Those who insist upon the latter procedure as the only acceptable and valid one must do so on their deductions based upon the following postulates.

1. The historical account narrating the action of Jesus was intended to be a meticulous and detailed law of procedure for all times and places where the Supper is observed.

2. That which Jesus did as a Jew and because of his national relationship to the passover is binding upon Christians in their observance of the Lord's Supper. Jesus used unleavened bread because he was a Jew and there was no other bread available to him at the passover. Unleavened bread was the kind used in the regular diet of the Jews at this season of their religious year.

3. That which Jesus did incidentally, and as a matter of course, must be crystallized into an exacting law and become a criterion for judging the spiritual worthiness of others. Jesus took a cup for the simple reason that it is impossible to pass a liquid to others without some kind of container. But the container has nothing more to do with communion (fellowship), than a plate upon which to pass the bread. It is eating and drinking together, as in community, that makes communion.

4. All facts connected with an historical event are equally important and are as binding as that which we are commanded to do, so that it is better to forego any expression of fellowship as the aim of the command than to be in error about some detail of method for achieving it. This leads ultimately to the view that man was made for ordinances and not ordinances for men.

No one can prove these postulates to be scriptural by quoting a passage from the new covenant writings which even implies them. Nor will it do any good to resort to the common tactic of those who do not find specific authority and appeal to the essence or tenor of the scriptures, for it can be shown that the trend of the scriptures is generally opposed to them.

They constitute a philosophy of interpretation based upon rationalization and presupposition. They represent the approach made to the scriptures and the sin lies not in having a way of approach, for all men do this, but in dogmatically equating the approach with the will of God. To do this means we cannot correct the approach without feeling that by so doing we are denying God's will. We believe the approach represented in this philosophy needs correction and we give a few reasons for thinking so.

1. It renders its advocates inconsistent for they do not apply the postulates to all actions of Jesus with the same force that they do in the case of the partisan tests of fellowship. In his attendance at "public worship" Jesus stood up to read the scriptures and sat down to expound or explain them. When he prayed he "looked up to heaven" or "lifted up his eyes to heaven." Because we generally stand up to speak to an audience and close our eyes when we pray, one who followed the example of Jesus would be called an eccentric and would prove embarrassing to the average congregation. We generally insist on “doing as our Lord did,” in those things only that conform to our traditional modes.

2. We can insist that the bread in the Lord’s Supper must be unleavened while at the same time we can glibly explain away such things as footwashing and the holy kiss. We are nowhere told to use unleavened bread because Jesus did, but he did say, “Ye also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you” (John 13:15). We have no problem with such phrases as “Ye should do as I have done,” nor with pointed commands such as “Greet one another with a holy kiss.” These are not part of a partisan pattern.

3. We tend to ignore or disregard the fact that if Jesus adjusted his methods to the background and environment of which he was a part and made use of such means as were available to accomplishment of his design, he set a precedent indicative of his reaction to our present environment and means if he were with us in the flesh as he most certainly is in the spirit.

The Basic Fallacy

It seems to us that the basic fallacy lies in the assumption that historical accounts, or letters, written because of local circumstances or conditions (which would never have been written at all had such conditions not arisen) were intended to be made a written code of legalistic procedure and to be applied irrespective of circumstances, discoveries, or cultural growth and development. The spirit of legalism knows nothing of mercy. It can make no allowances and if the one who affirms it does make such allowances he thereby condemns his whole philosophy.

One must become as near like God as possible, but he must choose whether he will do so in the realm of authority or in the domain of love. In the first he becomes a usurper of divine prerogatives, in the second he becomes a participant in the divine purpose. The first encourages him to lay down laws with which to enslave others; the second to lay down his life to help save others. The law of God as expressed in Jesus is summed up in love which is unitive. Any attempt to enforce human deduction to the point of division among brethren is not fidelity to God but failure to comprehend the divine purpose.

It is at this juncture that brethren sin when they divide over such issues as the manner of passing the fruit of the vine to the communicants, and become a “one cup party” or a “multiple cups party.” It is no doubt useless for those who oppose individual containers to argue that there would be no division if some had not adopted individual cups, because those who oppose them are divided among themselves over various other things, some of which are related to other phases of the Lord’s Supper. Actually we are divided because we have the will to divide.

We adopt the premise that the letters of the apostles constitute a detailed law, we then proceed to interpret it as specific law, and regard ourselves as the divinely authorized enforcers of the law. When there are two viewpoints of interpretation and those who hold them begin with the idea that there must be either conformity or separation, factions are inevitable. If we were not divided over individual cups we would be divided over numerous other things, as indeed we are. It is our fallacious philosophy which is factional in its very nature.

But what can we do when brethren regard “the pattern” as requiring but one container, and others regard it as allowing more than one? Must we form two parties? Indeed not! We will not do so if we discern the Body and love all of its members. Faced with such a problem, the first thing we must do is to utterly reject division of the family as offering any proper solution. Division is a sin regardless of whether “cups” are right or wrong. There is no scripture which specifically condemns individual containers. Those who oppose them must do so by inference or deduction. But there are numerous specific passages which condemn schism and division among brethren as a sin. We dare not negate a specific declaration by a negative inference.

Second, we must recognize the right of sincere and honest men whose intellectual attainments at least equal our own, to examine the word of God for themselves and to form conclusions concerning what they read. And we must remember that this means they may reach different conclusions than ourselves. Since we are not responsible for their conclusions we must respect our brethren even while we dissent from their deduction.

Third, we must put such matters back where they belong, and that is in the realm of congregational determination. When a congregation of consecrated saints examines the word of God with the conviction that they exhibit more fidelity to its intent by use of one container they should be respected in their decision. When such a congregation is convinced that it can implement God’s will by use of individual containers it also should be respected. Neither should be placed under censure by the other. Neither should seek to bind its deduction upon the other. The autonomy, that is, the self-government of each congregation must be maintained without external coercion.

It will be asked if division will not result from the fact that the congregations differ in their conclusions on this one matter. It need not do so. The mere fact that congregations meet in separate areas and differ in their method of passing the fruit of the vine does not of itself spell division. Unity is not based upon geographical proximity but upon spiritual affinity. It does not consist of conformity in method but of oneness in Christ. We will not divide until one or both groups become factional. If one binds its deduction as the law of God and demands that the other accede to it as the price of fellowship, division will result, not because of what the Bible says, or even because of our interpretation of it, but because of dogmatism.

Congregations of saints should regard each other as brothers in the Lord whether they use one container or many. They should cease to brand each other as hobbyists or sectarians. They should stop hurling insults and desist from accusations of apostasy. This exhibits a spirit of carnality and immaturity wholly unbecoming to the profession we make. We need each other as the eye needs the mouth and as the hand needs the foot. Brethren who use one container and those who use multiple containers all share in the same grace of God and are in the communion of saints. They may disagree about details of expressing that communion from one congregation to another but this need not affect the communion or fellowship. The communion of the body and blood of the Lord Jesus is one thing, the mode of distributing the elements indicative of it is a wholly different thing. It is not sharing in the same opinion about passing the fruit of the vine that makes us one but the fact that we all share as branches of the One Vine.

It would be sinful for me to go into an area where brethren have personal convictions as to the use of one container and wreck their peace and wreak havoc by insisting that they have multiple containers as the price of fellowship with me. If I have faith (personal conviction) about such matters I must have it to myself under such circumstances. They are men for whom Christ died. They are the work of God. I must not destroy the fellowship which He created over an incidental as to its demonstration. The love of a man for his wife is more important than any demonstration of it, and so must be our love for one another. Certainly we should seek to grow in an exhibition of love and fellowship but first we must possess it, for one cannot grow in something which he does not have.

Obviously the problem will be greater for a consecrated brother who has a deep conviction as to one container when he is among those who regard it as an incidental matter. It seems to me that it will help us all if we cease to categorize our divisive problems as matters of faith and matters of opinion. When we do this we automatically separate ourselves into two warring camps. One is then regarded as faithful to Jesus, the other as a betrayer of the faith, based upon an honest conviction as to the thing under discussion. But fidelity to the Lord cannot be measured by such a criterion. We cannot measure its magnitude by such a rule any more than we can determine the content of the Pacific Ocean with a gallon bucket.

We have borrowed the slogan, "In matters of faith unity, in matters of opinion liberty, in all things charity." In reality, however, there are no matters of opinion, as we apply the slogan, for someone regards everything as a matter of faith which others regard as a matter of opinion. The result is that love is exhibited in nothing for fear we will deny the faith.

If we could cease to classify our divisive problems as matters of faith and matters of opinion and regard them as "matters of understanding" it would help greatly to remove the barriers of division. This would make our honest attitude toward these things not so much a matter of fidelity to Christ Jesus as a matter of spiritual growth. One can be tolerant of others in their lack of maturity when it would be difficult to make allowances for those who are untrue to Jesus.

Faith could be left in the realm of acceptance of Jesus and trust in Him as our Savior and Lord. Our differences in Him would be distinguished from questions about Him. There is a distinction between what is requisite to come into Christ and what is necessary to grow up into Him in all things. We should not make every issue in life as important as life itself. Certainly every problem of association is not a matter of life and death. No partisan peculiarity about the method of showing the Lord's death must ever become as vital to us as the fact of that death and its purpose as relates to fellowship.

Brotherhood in Christ

To some of my brethren it is very important to use only unleavened bread. To others it is very important to use only fermented wine. Still others regard the manner of breaking the loaf or the use of one container for the fruit of the vine as important. There are other details which are also regarded as important by many saints. Now none of these things are unimportant to me, but they are not important to me because of any intrinsic value I attach to them, but simply because they are important to my brothers— all of whom are very important to me because Jesus died for them. I cannot be unconcerned about anything which concerns one for whom Christ died. It is not that these things give validity to brotherhood or that brotherhood gives validity to them. Rather it is brotherhood which gives validity to the concern which brethren feel for such matters.

The personal scruple a brother holds may not seem important to me, but the brother who holds it, or is held by it, is important to me. The word scruple literally means “a little pebble in the shoe.” It does not take a large pebble to cause a brother to limp. Nothing may appear less important to me than a small rock in the shoe of a companion, but, at the same time, nothing appears of more significance unto him. I am not obligated to respect the pebble, nor to limp because he does. But if we are brothers I will sympathize with him and will slow down my pace so we may walk together. It may be urged that I should help him remove the pebble. This is true, but there may be complications.

I certainly am not free to remove it by force, and it may be that I shall first have to convince him that it is a pebble which is causing the difficulty. Moreover, even after it has been removed, the effect of it may linger for a long time. One who has had a rock in his shoe all his life may still limp for some time after it is gone. This is especially true if he has always been taught that such a condition is normal and the only correct way to walk. Long after a scruple has been intellectually discarded it may be emotionally retained, and I may have to walk slowly in order to walk lovingly with my brother. Under such circumstances it will help me immeasurably to realize that Jesus is my pattern. I can receive my brethren as He has received them— and me!

The Lord's Supper is not observed in memory of a law, a precept or a code. Jesus said, "Do this in remembrance of me." My task is not to lay down laws governing the Supper but to live up to the love which it entails and embraces. I shall not conclude that brethren cannot remember my precious Lord when they deviate in some detail from our method of observance. I shall allow Him to be the judge as to motivations and achievements of their hearts.

If my human judgment causes me to err in my attitude toward maintaining brotherhood, I prefer that it is in the direction of mercy and leniency rather than slanted toward stringency and implacability. The former will make it possible for Him to be merciful unto me in the Great Confrontation when I shall need mercy the most. I am no longer concerned about answering to a small clique of my brothers for an exhibition of love to all. I am concerned with answering to Him about limiting to some of my brothers that love which He exhibited for all. He is my pattern! Let me close with this quotation from David Lipscomb:

The truth is, I have always tried to keep free from partisanship in religion and other things, and am glad to recognize and encourage every truth that exists among any people, and, instead of repudiating it, I would make it a starting point to lead on to other and fuller truth. In doing this, there is no compromise of truth; but we follow the example of Jesus and Paul, who seized and encouraged every truth, found among Jew or Gentile, as a ground and starting point whence to lead them to more and fuller light. Paul quoted and approved what of truth heathen poets and philosophers taught, and sought from this truth to lead them up to fuller truth of God.

Sources of Our Patterns

Mission Messenger (June 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

I find myself almost reluctant to write on the subject which clamors for discussion in this issue. I could wish that I might deal with what I regard as a mistaken view of the apostolic letters without reference to particulars because I have no desire to be critical of my brethren. Certainly I do not wish to appear supercilious. I realize that I am lacking in knowledge upon many things. I have much to learn.

But fairness and candor demand that I not speak in riddles or dark sayings. And this requires that I deal in specifics and provide examples of that to which I allude. I am convinced that all of the two dozen factions designating themselves as “Churches of Christ” feel that they have discovered and correctly interpreted “the pattern” set forth in the new covenant scriptures. They have argued and debated with one another, made charges and counter-charges, and all have thought they were loyal to the Book.

The fact is that our brethren defend some twenty-five different “patterns,” and each disputant is thoroughly convinced that his alone is the pattern. The absurdity of men standing up and quoting the same passages, and finding justification for their varied and opposite views while proclaiming that the Word is so plain that even a blind man can see it, seems lost upon everyone except those thinking persons who are outside our movement.

I do not think that God intended to give us detailed prescriptions for every minute detail, so I can look with a great deal of charity and compassion upon those who become so worked up they cannot see their own inconsistencies. But this cannot cover up the fact that the party spirit is a work of the flesh and betrays men into all kinds of false ideas and unlovely attitudes. The great danger is that when men believe that God provided a specific detailed pattern they must find one for everything. To fail would be to charge God with neglect or imperfection.

I can recall how we used to stress that the priests and Levites had to count every tent peg in the tabernacle and they were responsible for seeing that everything was in its place according to the pattern shown to Moses in the mount. We compared that to our life under Christ and reasoned that we had to get every item just so, or fire would come out and consume us. But we overlooked the fact that the Lord pitched the true tabernacle, and not man, and we were not given a pattern in advance at all. Our heart is now the holy place. It is the sanctuary of our God. Our only pattern is a person!

Since God did not provide us a pattern we set in to provide him one. That is where we went astray. We took the apostolic love letters and warped them into a code of jurisprudence and immediately started judging our brothers and measuring them by ourselves. What we call “the pattern” is not really derived from God’s revelation at all. We created the pattern and then searched the scriptures to find justification for what we already had.

Most of our patterns consist of a combination of elements derived from three sources: (1) Cultural and environmental factors; (2) Reactions to other religious groups whom we consider as apostates or compromisers; (3) Misconception and misapplication of scriptural passages lifted from their contextual setting and used to establish our preconceptions and presuppositions.

Cultural Factors

Few of my readers will remember it, but I well recall what a hassle arose in our movement when men began to stand for prayer. In the simple rural climate of our day, men always kneeled, regardless of which sect was conducting the revival. It was argued that no one would address an earthly monarch on his throne while standing proudly before him, and how much more should we kneel before God. Tracts and booklets were written on “The Posture of Prayer.” I have some of these in my files even yet.

The scriptures were searched for passages showing that men kneeled and elaborate answers were prepared to refute those who declared that the bodily attitude made no difference. The three guns in the battery of restoration weapons—command, apostolic example, and necessary inference—were all trained on the dissenters. Prejudice was aroused by insinuating that pride was gripping men’s hearts and they were becoming too haughty to kneel. Suspicion was created when it was pointed out that standing for prayer originated among us in “city churches” where men no longer wanted to risk soiling the knees of their expensive tailor-made trousers.

I remember a debate in which one disputant triumphantly read, “And Solomon stood before the altar of the Lord in the presence of all the congregation of Israel, and spread forth his hands toward heaven” (1 Kings 8:22). The respondent could hardly wait to reply, “And it was so, that when Solomon had made an end of praying all this prayer and supplication unto the Lord, he arose from before the altar of the Lord, from kneeling on his knees with his hands spread up to heaven.” Touche!

Once, in our little rural congregation, an evangelist came from elsewhere to hold a “protracted meeting.” At the very first service he asked “Pappy” Davis, who always sat on the front seat, to lead in prayer as the audience stood. The old brother was equal to the occasion. “Sir, I’d rather kneel,” he said. And kneel he did while the whole audience, with the exception of the preacher, followed suit. It threw cold water on the whole meeting. We realized that we had “a liberal” standing in the pulpit.

One thing that kept the controversy heated up was the fact that the Gospel Advocate, commonly referred to as “The Old Reliable” was all for kneeling. David Lipscomb repeatedly pointed out that Smith’s Bible Dictionary and other authorities “tell us that standing in prayer was introduced among Christians first on Easter.” That did it! We never thought of questioning Smith’s Bible Dictionary and other authorities. We’d as soon have questioned the Sears-Roebuck catalog. We never learned who the other authorities were, but that made no difference. If Brother Lipscomb said they were authorities they were. There was no other authority who could identify other authorities with such authority as Brother Lipscomb.

And when we learned that standing in prayer was first introduced on Easter, we became convinced it was simply another part of the world conspiracy of the pope to capture us lock, stock and barrel, by infiltrating our pure worship with a pagan ritual, such as standing to pray. We already knew that every monastery had a well-stocked arsenal of weapons, and that the Knights of Columbus constituted a secret order to train men for the great “takeover” when the Protestants were sufficiently hoodwinked and myopic. Not being either, some of us thought the Lord might work it around so they would kill each other off, and leave the whole landscape to us. So those brethren who stood to pray and stubbornly resisted the pattern were regarded as dangerous and unstable. They were the victims of German rationalism and “the social gospel,” whatever that was.

All of this seems hilariously funny to our young people today, but it isn't so humorous to me. I cannot forget the great and good men who were attacked clandestinely, branded and hounded by those who were so inferior to them both intellectually and spiritually, that they were not even in the same class. I recall how patiently some of them reasoned and taught when the subject came up. I also recall the anger and ire of those who blurted out, "If we don't intend to follow what the Bible says about praying let's just tear everything else out of it and go to hell with the covers clutched in our hand."

All of that is gone now! We no longer fight stained-glass windows, spires, and carpeted aisles as signs of digression and worldliness. Some of our buildings even have crosses on them now. Once these things were symbols of departure from the simplicity that is in Christ Jesus. In every meeting they were assailed. We were warned to flee from them as Lot fled from Sodom. They were "the unfruitful works of darkness." We were not to have fellowship with them, but rebuke them.

We now stand in prayer without fear or qualm. The world about us changed and we changed with it. The Methodists, Baptists, and Presbyterians, ceased to kneel in their "revivals," so we quit kneeling in our "protracted meetings." Of course, what really happened is that with increasing enlightenment from God's word, and with better education, we began to see that ours is a life in the richness of the Spirit, and it is not necessarily affected by things. Not even such things as bodily posture.

It suddenly dawned upon us that we were fighting about aisle carpets, kitchens and baptisteries in "church-owned buildings," and we had no pattern for "churchly real estate" at all. The first "church house" was not erected until 280 A.D., and then it was put up by some pretty shady theologians. It is very doubtful that it had a sign "Church of Christ— Romans 16:16" over the front door. No one knows where we got the pattern for a million dollar structure with the approved sign on the landscaped lawn. But it is a part of our westernized culture. We are doing our best to transport it to Africa and Japan so they will be sure to have the right name and the standard sign. But, at least we stand while praying for Africans and Japanese!

Sectarian Reactions

One of the amazing things about the restoration movement is the fact that it so rapidly developed an exclusivistic sectarian attitude which shut its adherents off from meaningful contact with even friends and relatives. Originally, the principal proponents of the restoration ideal were Presbyterians. They maintained a good relationship with all believers in the Son of God about them. The thought never occurred to them, as they gained new insights, to break their association with others who had not yet arrived at the same conclusions.

Late in life Thomas Campbell declared that philosophically he was a Calvinist and expected to remain such until he died. This made no flurry among those who came into the restoration movement holding other philosophies, for they could clearly distinguish between the good news which all held in common and their doctrinal deductions. The problem arose when lesser men, riding high in the saddle, began to draw lines and make tests of union and communion out of opinions and interpretations.

By the time of my birth the partisan spirit was rampant. Men equated the restoration movement with the church of God, and to be in the church one must be in the new party in the community which had adopted as a distinguishing title, "Church of Christ." The preachers in demand were the "sect-killers." Some of them were tobacco-chewing, or snuff-dipping, Bible-quoting individuals who announced from the pulpit that they were going to "skin the sectarian preachers and tack their hides on the barn door with the bloody side out." Every night a challenge was issued for debate and notice was given that the sects were going to be run out of the community.

We were generally poor, limited in education and resources, and it gave us a sense of status to realize that our little group was the special object of God's love and mercy, and that, in the last great "roundup in the skies" we would march triumphantly through the pearly gates while our neighbors, from whom we borrowed flour or sugar when company came, would all be driven to the flaming pit. They had hearkened to their preacher instead of to ours. I do not think we worried that so many would go to hell. It was God's will. They deserved to be punished because of their ignorance. We could not tolerate ignorance!

One result of all this was a development of a pattern as a reaction to sectarians. Those who came in with us under the kind of preaching which was popular knew little about grace and mercy. They knew less about the Holy Spirit. They were not so much led into "fellowship with the Father and Son," as into membership with the Church of Christ. They were fleeing from sectarianism, renouncing everything pertaining to it. Anything which "sectarian churches" practiced was wrong, or they would not practice it. We purposely chose other methods which thereupon became right or we would not have adopted them. All that remained was to search the scriptures to find where God authorized what we were doing. I do not recall any failure to find endorsement for our action.

A good example has to do with the method of "taking up the offering." Few among us in this day recall what a furor was caused in some areas when brethren began to pass offering plates. Early restoration congregations never did this because it was sectarian. The sects all "passed the hat." This was literally true. In my childhood days the Baptist and Methodist folk would send their collectors among the audience passing felt hats lifted from the hat-rack for the purpose. When they became a little more stylish they passed collection plates with felt noise-arresters to deaden the sound of dropping quarters.

When time came for this “item of worship” in our congregations, the brothers and sisters all marched up to the front, singing “There’s An Eye Watching You,” and laid their contribution on the Lord’s Table, returning to their seats by the way which they came. It was quite a procession. Sometimes there was a great deal of milling around in front when they converged on the table from two aisles. It was further complicated in some places by the fact that the marchers all took time to shake hands with the brethren on the front seat as a sign of fellowship.

As we grew in number and in sophistication, and began to crave less noise and more solemnity, changes began to be advocated. These did not come easily. Brethren mounted the pulpit to show that God had a pattern for doing everything, and we dare not deviate. We were reminded that the ark had to be made of gopher wood. We were again told of what happened to Nadab and Abihu when they offered strange fire. When such brethren were asked for scriptural grounds for marching up and laying their money on the table they were undaunted.

One of them pointed out that the symbol on all of our currency was the eagle, and that we were plainly taught that, “Where the carcass is, thither shall the eagles be gathered together.” He elaborated upon the fact that a carcass is a dead body, and the body of our Lord was upon the table. A schoolteacher spoke up and asked, “How will this affect other nations and countries where they have a lion or unicorn on their coinage?” The speaker was stumped. He probably did not know what a unicorn was. It had never occurred to him that God had a people elsewhere. America was the promised land, the special area of divine favor.

Later, when we were discussing the problem, one skeptic referred to the argument and said that in order to justify the speaker, the passage would have to read, “Where the carcass is, thither shall the buffaloes be gathered together.” He never gave more than a nickel at a time, and our five cent pieces all had a lordly buffalo engraved upon them in those days.

I was present in one meeting where a preacher who specialized in lecturing upon and explaining the Revelation letter was asked to express himself about the encroaching sectarianism as evidenced in passing the hat. He arose and said that he was perfectly willing to abide by the scriptural pattern. Here was his argument. “My Bible says upon the first day of the week let everyone of you lay by him in store. Where is him? Him is Christ, and his body is on the table. My advice is to continue to lay by him. If God had wanted a hat passed, he would undoubtedly have said so, for they had hats when Jesus was on the earth.”

Gradually we began to overcome our provincial and parochial attitudes, and to outgrow our fears of becoming like sectarians. We began to get bathrooms in our homes and the demand began to be heard for rest rooms and toilet facilities in our meetinghouses. When children began to sleep in their own little beds at home we began to put in nurseries and cry-rooms like the sects. Our babies became angry and screamed as loudly as sectarian babies, even in holy places.

And so it came to pass that we began to take up the collection in shiny plates. It did not come easy. In one congregation, two families I knew, always passed the plate by in cool indifference. After dismissal they marched up and laid their money on the table. They were resolved that when Jesus came he would find faith on the earth. After about a year of this they decided that their action bespoke stubborn pride. They “went sectarian” like all the rest of us.

This all seems ridiculous to the “new people” and the “now generation” among us, and of course it is. But please do not get me started. I think I can point out several things to which we cling simply because of a reactionary policy. These constitute a negative pattern on an affirmative basis. In decades to come perceptive minds will look back upon our day and conclude that we had not come completely “out of the bushes” in 1970. It is a little risky for any generation to assume that it has arrived while all others have departed.

The Lifted Scriptures

I doubt that anyone would argue against the proposition that when men resort to misuse of the scriptures to sustain a position, that position is indeed weakly defended. And the more scriptures must be wrested from their context to make a point seem plausible, the weaker that point is. In spite of the fact that hundreds of my beloved brethren will disagree violently with what I say, I must confess that I do not think God intended to provide a pattern for the way a congregation should give instruction in the word.

It is my very honest conviction that the debate about classes and Sunday schools is over an artificial issue. It is a “tempest in a teapot,” a contrived issue without foundation. The fact that it has been blown up to such proportions as to rend the saints of God into two actual camps is almost unbelievable. I have several debates on the matter in the long shelf reserved for such volumes of controversy. I have a drawer full of tracts and booklets on both sides. I have read them all. Some of them I have read more than once, some many times.

I have tried to be honest in my reading. As always I have sought to place myself in the place of the writer or speaker, to understand his motivation as well as his reasoning. And I always come up with a feeling of sadness that such matters must become walls between brethren and barriers to sharing. I do not really take one side or the other. I cannot see that the Holy Spirit created either by anything he said or intimated. I rejoice when the Word is taught, whether with classes or in one group. Those who teach in either fashion are my brothers.

Once when I was in Georgia a brother attended one of my studies. He insisted on going to the same place that I went for luncheon. He wanted to share with me a great truth he had found. After years of preaching he had come to see the full force of Paul's statement in Ephesians 2:6, "But God who is rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us . . . hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places." Paul was laying down a principle which made it a sin to have classes. The "heavenly places" were the houses devoted to worship. Here God ordained that we sit together and not divide the assembly.

For a little while I thought he was joking, making a parody out of foolish arguments he had heard. Then I saw he was dead earnest, presenting this as undeniable proof that classes were sinfully wrong. I pointed out that the context was wholly out of line with his view and told him I was "sitting together in heavenly places" with Christ while lying on my bed or standing on the street corner. He became intensely worked up because I did not have sense enough to distinguish between sitting, standing or lying down.

Years ago, out in Kansas, a brother came to talk with me about the grave sin of dividing into classes to study the Word of the Lord. He quoted for me, Deuteronomy 32:2, where God says, "My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distill as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." He contended that we should teach as it rained, showering it upon every one and letting the little ones assimilate what they needed and could get, while the older ones drank in more. I asked him if he thought that the mode of teaching was the point at issue with Moses. He thought it was the very reason the passage was included in Deuteronomy. God foresaw there would be people like myself who would take little children aside to teach them and he “showered” his disapproval upon such a method through Moses.

I would not think of debating with my brethren on the so-called “class question.” To me there appears to be nothing which should command such time or effort. I do not think God is concerned with whether we teach in one class or a dozen. In our primitive one-room meetinghouses it probably would have been better to study in one group. It was difficult to concentrate with four classes going at the same time, especially with wasps flying around, or an occasional sparrow flitting about just over your head. But this was also the day of one-room public schoolhouses. When better school buildings were erected and more efficient educational methods were discovered we simply appropriated them and made them applicable to Biblical pedagogy.

I can honestly say I am not perturbed by the oft-cited fact that the Sunday-school movement began with Robert Raikes, and not with the apostles. I have no doubt that this great and generous man established the first such schools at Gloucester in 1780, as a means of furnishing both secular and religious education to children whose employment in the factories made it impossible to attend weekday schools. I am glad that he did what he could for these poor waifs who were chained like galley-slaves to the whirring looms.

I suspect that God wants us to discover new ways by which to make his truth known to the culture in which we labor. Just as the economic state in England in the last half of the eighteenth century gave rise to the Sunday-school movement, I think our own will probably gradually discard it. I will not mourn its demise as I do not deplore its inception. It is simply a tool devised to fit a need. Other and better tools will have to be created to get our task done in this age. In many places the standard Sunday-school is childish, immature and invalid. It is a place to retreat from reality by monotonous mouthing of irrelevant material.

The fact that the apostles did not advocate this approach is of little real significance. They simply adopted the methods of teaching then in vogue and employed them without intent to bind them irrevocably upon all ages and climes. The synagogue was primarily responsible for the system which was continued in the Messianic communities. That system was not intended to be a pattern but a practical expedient for that time and place. None of us know how Paul would outline the work if he could return to Louisville or Lansing in our day. We must do our best to meet the demands of our day and to supply the deep needs of men and women whom we daily meet, using such tools as are available unto us.

So long as brethren think that God intended to provide us a microscopic pattern with all details filled in, we will be searching through our factional microscopes and arguing minutiae. If we realize that we have general guidelines and not a rigid set of regulations we will be free to work as best we can in whatever situation we confront. If I believe this I cannot bind a “must be thus” as to a method of teaching upon others, because God has bound none upon me.

If my brethren in a certain place deduce from the scriptures that they should not have classes, I will accept this and will not try to undermine or proselyte from them. It may be God’s will for them that they work in this fashion. I will help them in every way that I can. My love for them will not be affected by the method they use to teach his blessed truth. Certainly I will not put up some of the silly and ridiculous arguments about when “the worship” begins and when it ends, that have been advocated and indulged by partisan class defenders in the past. Such nit-picking is not for me!

If my brethren in another place sincerely believe they can best instruct those who come to them, through use of classes, I will accept this as God's will for them. If they ask me to teach in any group I will share what I have learned and seek to edify those who listen. I will gain nothing by whetting their prejudice against brethren who do not have classes. I shall seek to help them overcome such feelings and regard others of God's children with love and kindness, allowing them the liberty to work in the manner that commends itself to them as best.

I believe that a great part of such problems stems from an anti-intellectual attitude which resulted from our frontier heritage. We were afraid of men who broadened their intellectual capacity. I can recall when a man was suspect who had even a lesser college degree. Formal education belonged to the world, the realm which one must not love or court. "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise." We ridiculed those who were not satisfied to remain untutored without realizing that such ridicule was a subtle form of praise for those whom we could not confine in our own narrow caskets.

This was what caused simple brethren among us to oppose with such venom "uninspired literature" in our corporate study. Even little children must be taught the Bible only. No colorful aids could be used. Anything printed within the leather covers was acceptable, including concordances, dates or dictionary. It did not come from "another book." As always, this created a lot of casuistry. Much of it was freely practiced by the preacher's who cried loudest and longest about usage of uninspired helps.

Men who would not dare to take a volume of The Complete Works of Flavius Josephus into the pulpit, could copy from it and quote from it as part of a sermon outline. There was a difference made between a printed book and a hand-written copy of some of its contents. It never occurred to us that there was not one bit of difference between what a preacher said orally, and what he would include in a quarterly which he wrote. The sects used quarterlies. That placed them under a ban for "the Lord's church."

There are some factions among the heirs of the restoration movement to this very day whose members are discouraged from reading anything not produced by “loyal brethren,” that is, by men approved by the party “somewhats.” In some cases there are so few men who are qualified to write that many of the members never read anything except the partisan journal which is the official mouthpiece. A great deal of the space is taken up in each issue reporting a weary round of “gospel meetings” by the same preachers, men who have been approved by the editor, and who will indulge in back-patting for one another. There are generally articles dealing with the “major issue,” written by some who want to prove they are still sound, and rehashing the same worn-out and frazzled arguments based upon a misunderstanding and misapplication of the same scriptural passages.

Such factions become inbred in their thinking. They develop a kind of sterility. They dare not think fresh thoughts. They abdicate the human family to take on the nature of parrots. The only thing which keeps them going is the flurry caused when someone learns something new and worthwhile and is “written up” as a liberal by the defenders of the status quo. These groups are seeing a gradual erosion of their forces. Young men and women can no longer engage in the kind of dishonesty which causes one to close his eyes to facts in order to remain “high and lifted up” on the sectarian totem pole.

There will come a great realignment of our forces which will ignore the battle lines of yesterday. Young people are coming to realize that most of the tests of fellowship have no validity at all. They are activities in absurdity. Brethren will gain the courage to reject the narrow and provincial limits prescribed for the kingdom of heaven by religious politicians whose financial and social well-being depend upon keeping Christians apart.

The Holy Spirit will come to be recognized as the divine agent to promote “peace on earth to men of goodwill.” The great crises which demand the best all of us can give will drive us to find the path to unity. More and more we will come to see that God has not imposed upon us a rigid and stereotyped pattern, but has given us guidelines within a historic situation. We must use these as a starting-point. We must work toward maturity within their framework.

I am moved to insert here a statement by Fenton John Anthony Hort, in his book entitled “Lectures on the Early History and the Early Concepts of the Ecclesia.” Dr. Hort is best known as a collaborator in the Westcott and Hort New Testament in the Original Greek. Will you thoughtfully read the following?

In this as in so many other things is seen the futility of endeavoring to make the apostolic history into a set of authoritative precedents to be copied rigorously without regard to time or place, thus turning the Gospel into a second Levitical code. The apostolic age is full of embodiment of purposes and principles of the most instructive kind, but the responsibility of choosing the means was for ever left to the Ecclesia, and every Ecclesia, guided by ancient precedent on the one hand and adaptation to present and future needs on the other. The lesson-book of the Ecclesia, and every Ecclesia, is not law but history. (The Ecclesia, pages 232, 233).

We are coming to see that, in many cases, the pattern we have espoused is not derived from the sacred scriptures at all. It is merely an unwritten creed, hallowed by usage and hardened by debate. As the Word is read and searched through eyes from which the scales have fallen, there will dawn on the consciousness of students that the whole so-called pattern for our two dozen minor sects has been conjured up in the imaginations of men, being read into the scriptures rather than found in them.

Members of the Church of Christ should face up to the question of what the apostle Paul would do if he returned to earth and came to the United States. With which of our partisan factions would he identify or “place membership”?

To which partisan journal would Paul report his preaching tours? Which one would he join as a staff writer? The Gospel Advocate? The Firm Foundation? The Old Paths Advocate? Gospel Tidings? Gospel Guardian? The Christian? The Christian Standard?

On which college lectureship would he participate? Abilene Christian College? Florida College? Would he address the North American Christian Convention? The World Convention of Churches of Christ?

Would Paul and Silas create a separate and exclusive patty over Bible classes, individual container’s, support of Herald of Truth, or instrumental music? Would they set at nought a brother over orphan homes? Would they destroy a brother for whom Christ died over the use of fermented wine in the Lord’s Supper? Would they fracture and splinter the heirs of heaven into clashing clans and rival parties?

Would they spend their time emphasizing the same issues which we elevate above the cross and count as more worthy than the blood of the Son of God?

Is it not time to crucify within our hearts that work of the flesh which causes us to hold aloof from so many thousands of God’s precious children, and to build bridges across our senseless chasms? Let us ignore our silly walls and barriers. Let us cross freely back and forth through them. Why should we perpetuate the stupid and asinine feuds into which our father’s were lured by the siren call of pride and ambition. Why should we continue our futile and farcical clashes, martialled for civil war by the sound of rival trumpets?

Let me make it clear again to all who read this, that I am in the glorious fellowship of the Spirit, with every child of God in this whole wide world. No partisan leader will con me into believing that he alone has discovered the key of all knowledge and that his faction has a copyright on the real Simon Pure, unvarnished truth of heaven, to the exclusion of all others. I shall allow no one to do my thinking on earth who cannot be responsible for it at the judgment. This is my declaration of independence, and “if this be treason, make the most of it!”

That Glorious Generosity

Mission Messenger (June 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“He planned, in his program of love, that we should be adopted as his own children through Jesus Christ— that we might learn to praise that glorious generosity of his which has made us welcome in the everlasting love he bears toward the Beloved” (Ephesians 1:4, 5).

1. The plan. It is a source of great assurance that we are part of an infinite design. God did not bring us to our present state by a trial-and-error method, or as the result of a divine experiment. The earth is not a laboratory in which God tests theories, but part of a universe specifically designed for those of us who inhabit it. The community of saints is not an afterthought or an expedient but a fellowship designed for our spiritual growth toward maturity. It is obvious that the omnipotent one will not allow his plan to fail. As the apostle wrote to the Philippians, “I feel sure that the one who has begun a good work in you will go on developing it until the day of Jesus Christ.” We are not part of a fly-by-night venture doomed to explode in disappointment.

2. The purpose. The relationship of creator to created can be quite mechanical and even cold, but when God made man in his own image he envisioned having a family. God is love and love must be shared. It is active, not passive, and seeks a response that is warm and reciprocal. God could not truly be a Father without offspring, and he purposed in love that we should be adopted as his children.

When we think of adoption, we automatically think of legal proceedings in which an outside authority transfers a child from one guardian to another. This is not a correct representation of what happened in our case, for God simply accepted us in his Beloved. That is why the process is sometimes referred to as adoption and sometimes as a new birth. Adoption has to do with God's action on our behalf, birth is our response through delivery into the family circle.

3. The praise. Man is a disciple, a learner. One of our mistakes is in speaking of one who became a disciple at a certain time, as if this is a one-action proposition which is over with the initiation. This is not correct, for one is always a disciple while he lives. It is a perpetual relationship. Our responsibility is to learn to praise, and the object of our praise is God's glorious generosity, the best description of the word "grace."

It is very difficult for those of us who are caught up in the human predicament to understand the wonders of grace, because we are selfish and restrained. We try to water down the concept and dilute it until we can explain and confine it, because our nature is opposed to it. In spite of this the scriptures break through our mental barriers with such passages as these, and we catch a glimpse of generosity so free and unbounded that it can only be described as glorious. This is the subject of our greatest praise.

4. The perfection. God's plan reaches its culmination in the welcome extended to us to share in eternal love. This is possible because we are justified through grace. To justify means to declare or pronounce one guiltless. We are not guiltless because of anything we have done, or because of anything we have abstained from doing. We are simply counted as guiltless because of that grace which accepts those who cease to trust in themselves and their own righteousness and trust unreservedly in the righteousness of Jesus Christ.

When one is in Christ God does not see him as a guilt-laden sinner, for his own sin has been laid upon Christ, and atonement was made for it at Calvary. God beholds Christ and his sinlessness, and if we are in him his righteousness is imputed unto us. We have none of our own, but that eternal love which is bestowed upon the Beloved becomes our heritage as well because we are in him. All praise for the glorious generosity which makes this possible.

The Money Pattern

Mission Messenger (July 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

The members of the Churches of Christ have been taught that in the new covenant scriptures it was God's intention to provide for us a blueprint with meticulous specifications governing every item of corporate praise and life. They have conceived of our highest aim and chiefest duty as being the careful scrutiny of that blueprint to determine the divinely perfect law of procedure and the implementation of the exact course in our lives. It has been constantly held forth that this is the only foundation for scriptural unity and upon no other basis can oneness ever be achieved.

Unfortunately for such a postulation, candor requires an admission that it has produced the very opposite result. There are now two dozen different kinds of "Churches of Christ," and each one of these believes that it has discovered and adopted the pattern, while all of the others are either too liberal to care for it, or too ignorant to understand it. Which of these more than twenty separate factions has recaptured "the scriptural pattern," so that its adherents can be in the favor of God, while all others are to be damned for their obduracy or imbecility? Which is "the loyal group?" Which is "the faithful church"?

Why is it we are divided into warring tribes? Is the blueprint so obscure that it cannot be seen? Is the language so ambiguous it cannot be understood? A united chorus composed of every faction proclaims that “the way is so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein.” Does one party have a corner on the intellectuals in the disciple brotherhood? If so, which one has collected all the brains? Are all of the honest brethren in one faction? If so, which one has all of the men of integrity? Which twenty-three, or so, are composed wholly of scoundrels and reprobates?

Why are we divided over the pattern in scripture? Our strife-torn schism-ridden groups cannot answer. I suggest that the reason we are divided over the apostolic pattern is because there is none. We have been pursuing a will-o-the-wisp, a nebulous invention and figment of our own imagination. Our pattern is a person, and the purpose of scripture is not to involve us in surveying areas, marking out plots, and measuring boundaries, but to bring us to him in a vital relationship which is known as eternal life.

Our problem lies in the fact that we are hooked on the blueprint idea, and because we believe it must be there we infuse it into the scriptures. Every one of our parties declares it has the blue-print, and every party has a different one. The partisans in every group have marked out a trail of passages which they have followed in journals and debates until they can cold-trail in the dark and never miss a crook or turn, and there are a lot of both!

It is astounding that brethren in the Lord can sign propositions for debate and affirm that two positions diametrically opposed to each other are scriptural. Frequently the wording reads “The scriptures authorize,” and on Monday and Tuesday nights they authorize one thing, while on Thursday and Friday nights they authorize the opposite. Wednesday night there is no discussion in order to permit all of the interested ones to attend prayer meeting at “the loyal church.”

If it were not so tragic and sad it would be laughable to see how brethren locate their patterns in God’s Word. A good example is in debate on the use of classes in teaching. In one such discussion the affirmative located classes in the order observed in creation, the feeding of the five thousand, and the instruction of the twelve men in Ephesus who knew only the baptism of John. Although the man who thus reasoned was one of the chief debaters in the segment, he referred to his opponent as one of a group of “third-rate preachers, uneducated, untrained and riding a hobby so they can be the biggest men in their bunch.”

Men must resort to this kind of unscrupulous quibbling so long as they hold that the purpose of the apostolic letters was to spell out in detailed fashion the method by which we were to carry out God’s will in all ages until our Lord returns. They can never walk in the Spirit, but always in the letter. And where there is no letter they must provide one, else they cannot walk at all. In the final analysis, and carried to its ultimate, this will mean the rejection of every means for disseminating the truth which was not available in Palestine during the time of the Caesars. And this means fossilization!

We have been the victims of eisegesis, rather than the recipients of exegesis. The last word means to get out of the word what has been inspired, or breathed into it of God; the first to inject into it one’s own views and explanations. It makes no difference how sincerely our brethren desire to follow Jesus and to please God, it still remains that they have devised and bound upon others unwritten creeds and done so under the guise that these are authorized by the sacred scriptures.

In spite of the fact that I know in advance that I shall invite vitriolic attack in partisan journals I am going to illustrate what I mean by pointing out the fragile basis upon which a recent split has occurred in the ranks of believers within the “Churches of Christ.” The point at issue has been dubbed by such terms as “institutionalism” and “centralization.” Although there are many ramifications, the fight has been primarily over whether it is scriptural to support orphan homes, homes for the aged, etc., out of the treasury, when such eleemosynary institutions are not the sole work of the local congregation and under its oversight. Allied to this is the question of whether it is scriptural to send contributions from other congregations to a congregation in Abilene, Texas, which produces and supervises Herald of Truth, a radio and television program which is a propaganda medium for Churches of Christ.

In oral and written debates, as usual, brethren on both sides have been driven to enunciate extended views which, in some instances, have become tests of orthodoxy in the faith. It is now alleged that it is wrong for a congregation to take money from its treasury to help any person who is not a member of the Church of Christ, although individuals may aid any one at any time. A side issue has been the question of providing kitchens in the “church buildings” and eating within these corporately-owned structures.

In many areas the community of saints has been divided and rival meeting-houses erected. A constant barrage of attack has been maintained on the air waves. Families have been riven by the civil war, debates held between brethren and the factional spirit crystallized into a concrete work of the flesh. Those who oppose the institutions are referred to as “antis” and hobbyists, those who endorse them are branded as “liberals.” Dire predictions of the future are made by the prophets in both camps.

Each faction has its own partisan periodicals, its own colleges, and its own brotherhood. Each maintains its sectarian recognition and its sectarian exclusiveness. The party “lectureships” feature only “sound men,” with the soundness being measured by the degree of adherence to the party line, as judged by the “somewhats” who have maneuvered themselves into a position where they can control policy at least on a relative scale.

Preachers on both sides believe they are in harmony with God's plan and purpose, and that the scriptures authorize what they are doing. Both sides profess to be able to give "chapter and verse" for their position, and frequently they both give the same "chapter and verse." Not being allied with either faction it is possible for me to look at all of these struggling brethren with a great deal of compassion, and to assess the real problem without the emotional involvement.

A perceptive observer will soon recognize that the whole thing centers around how a community of saints may spend its money, and I am quite convinced that the real hang-up stems from a mistaken view of both groups over what constitutes worship of God. Both believe that worship has been reduced to a series of acts performed on the first day of the week, one of which consists of giving money into an institutional treasury to be dispensed by certain functionaries without consent, or even approval of the expenditures by the contributors.

Unwarranted Assumptions

I trust it will not shock you if I say that the entire thing may be a mere cobweb constructed of gauzy filaments of human imagination. In the first place the word "worship" is never once applied by the scriptures to anything we do on the Lord's Day morning. The term "acts of worship" is not in the Bible. The word of God knows nothing of the expression "the worship." It was dreamed up to designate a legalistic arrangement of which the Holy Spirit said not one word. The idea of "five items of worship" as the divine plan, has been sucked out of a factional thumb.

Pursuing the thought further, the concept of a public collection from the members of the body every Sunday is based upon an interpretation which may be as full of holes as a sieve. It results from taking a specific instruction for meeting a historic emergency, and elevating it to a general and universal law, which is then bound as the will of God on a weekly basis. Let us study 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 and see what it really includes.

Now concerning the collection for the saints, as I have given order to the churches of Galatia, even so do ye. Upon the first day of the week let everyone of you lay by him in store, as God hath prospered him, that there be no gatherings when I come. And when I come, whomsoever ye shall approve by your letters, them will I send to bring your liberality unto Jerusalem. And if it be meet that I go also, they shall go with me.

Out of this has grown a whole flock of assumptions which have been bound as dogmatic requirements. The giving of money every Sunday is an act of worship, or one of the “five items of worship.” It is a sin to take up a collection at any gathering of the saints other than on the Lord’s Day. Every one is under command to give or he will be judged as falling short of his duty. There must be a “church treasury” and a “church treasurer.” Money placed in the “church treasury” cannot be expended on the needs of “outsiders” but must be given only to the saints.

I challenge this whole system as a creedal fabrication read into God’s word. It is a clearcut example of what happens when men institutionalize the work of God. I want to deal with this doctrine which has been devised, openly and without fear of what men shall do unto me. I want my readers to see how easy it is to be brainwashed by tradition.

This was a special collection. It was the collection for the saints at Jerusalem. When Paul and Barnabas were in Jerusalem for the appeal to the apostles and elders on the subject of circumcision, and the question was resolved by a compromise, James, Peter and John urged them not to forget the poverty-stricken Judean saints. “Only they would that we should remember the poor, the same which I was also forward to do”

Thus, it came about that sometime later Paul urged congregations in the Greek world to gather up what they could that it might be conveyed to Jerusalem “to minister unto them in carnal things.” Accordingly he gave instructions to the congregations in Galatia, and later repeated them to the saints in Corinth, advising them as to the best manner of handling the situation.

If this was an “item of worship” why did the apostle not bind it upon these congregations when he planted them? Why did he let them go for several years without saying a word about “systematic giving,” and then only mention it when a special occasion arose? Do you realize that there is not even a hint that the congregation at Corinth ever “passed the hat” from the time they began meeting until they received the apostolic letter? Do you realize that everything they collected was turned over to Paul and his co-laborers to be taken directly to Jerusalem? Do you know there is not even a suggestion that they ever collected another penny after this time?

A lot of my brethren are great advocates of “the authority of silence.” If God specifies a thing there must be no deviation, no addition, no substitution. Now, nothing is clearer than the fact that 1 Corinthians 16:1-4 specifies that the collection laid by in store upon the first day of the week was for the poor saints, and was to be taken to Jerusalem. On what ground can men justify taking part of the money which they affirm is collected under this specification, and use it to purchase elaborate meetinghouses, parsonages, automobiles, and just about any other thing they want. Don’t write and give me “the line” that is used to explain it. I already know the whole casuistic bit! But brethren who can parlay “poor saints” to include a million dollar building, landscaping, and a minister’s salary, ought to have no trouble getting one “little instrument” into singing. The fact is that the argument on silence can always be bent to include what we want to get into it, and then snapped back to flip out what we do not want. There is nothing in all of our history which has been quite so downright deceitful as the so-called “law of silence.” The “law of exclusion” always exempts what we have or want.

The truth is that there never was a command of God to place money in a “church treasury.” The word “order” is from diatasso, to appoint, arrange, enjoin, charge, etc. As Albert Barnes puts it so succinctly, “It does not mean that he had the authority to tax them, or that he had commanded them to make a collection. But that he had left directions as to the best manner and time in which it should be done. The collection was voluntary and cheerful in all the churches.”

Writing about the very same matter, Paul says plainly, “I speak not by commandment” (2 Corinthians 8:8). In spite of this, I was taught all of my life that we are commanded to lay by in store every Sunday. Actually, the collection of which Paul wrote was a spontaneous desire of the givers. He simply wrote to tell them the best way to take care of the matter. “For it hath pleased them of Macedonia and Achaia to make a certain contribution of the poor saints which are at Jerusalem” (Romans 15:26). If this was a “certain contribution” which the brethren determined to send, on what grounds do men reason that it was a perpetual and continuous practice to take up a contribution?

Paul said that the brethren in Macedonia actually prayed him with much entreaty to receive the gift, and take upon him the fellowship of the ministering to the saints. There probably never was a contribution taken except to meet a need, and the people who contributed knew in advance what the need was and gave to meet it. All of this talk about “giving of your means” every Sunday as a legalistic requirement of heaven and to build up a bank account for the institution is just so much froth dreamed up by the religious Establishment for the perpetuation of its own image! Don't get fighting mad at that until you think awhile.

The Church Treasury

It has always been assumed that Paul was instructing the brethren to bring money to a public gathering each Lord's Day and hand it in to be placed in "the church treasury." This is not as certain as many preachers would like to make it sound. The book says for each one to "lay by him" in store. The Greek for "by him" is par eauto, and indicates that the laying by is to be done at home. Thayer's Greek-English Lexicon, plainly says, "by him, that is, at his home." Green's Lexicon just as plainly puts it, "with one's self, at his home." The term is closely associated to the original in John 20:10, "Then the disciples went away again unto their own home."

Faced with the overwhelming evidence of the original term, the commentators have generally sought to be honest in explaining the passages in the light of the apparent meaning. This is so in spite of the traditions of the religious world, and in spite of the questions that are sometimes raised. I propose to give you the result of a little of my own research, although time and space will not permit of my going into the matter thoroughly.

Albert Barnes writes: "Let him lay up at home, treasuring up as he has been prospered. The Greek phrase, 'by himself' means, probably, the same as at home. Let him set it apart; let him designate a certain portion; let him do this by himself, when he is at home, when he can calmly look at the evidence of his prosperity." Those who are interested in pursuing this investigation should by all means read further in Barnes Notes on the New Testament, and note his attempt at modification.

In Meyer's Critical and Exegetical Handbook to the Epistles to the Corinthians, the author translates thus: "Kata mion sabbaton, on each first day of the week. Par eauto, at home. Par eauto titheto, cannot refer to the laying down of money in the assembly. Let him lay up in store at home whatever he succeeds in."

G. G. Findlay, B.A., in The Expositor's Greek New Testament, says: "Verse two refers to the rule previously laid down for Galatia; On every first day of the week let each of you by himself (at home) lay up, making a store (of it) whatever he may be prospered in."

F. W. Grosheide, Th.D., in The New International Commentary on the New Testament, writes: "Upon the first day, i.e., on every Sunday. The reference is not to the church services but to a personal assignment which everyone had to perform. But the fact that Paul speaks of the first day of the week and calls that the day for the collection implies that Sunday was destined for the special service of the Lord. Paul trusts the Corinthians; he does not ask them to hand in their collection on a weekly basis, they are allowed to keep the collected money and thus little by little a sufficient amount will be saved up."

Dr. Herman Olshausen, in his Biblical Commentary, says: "Certainly it may not be inferred from this passage that collections took place among the congregations on the Sabbath, for it was Paul's intention that each should make a suitable contribution at home."

R. C. H. Lenski has a rather lengthy discussion of the passage in his Bible Commentary, as follows:

The term logia, "collection," is used only here in the New Testament, but it was discovered in the ostraca and the inscriptions found in Egypt and elsewhere and is there used in the sense of religious collections for the altar of a pagan god, etc., . . . Each member is to deposit with himself each Sunday the amount of his gift for that week and preserve it as a store or treasure, thesaurizo. The participle completes the idea of the main verb: "let him lay by treasuring up." . . . Each member is to keep the growing amount by him, par eauto, in his own home, and is not to deposit it with the church at once. The probable reason for this advice is the fact that at this early date the churches supervised by Paul were not yet organized to the extent of having official treasurers who were duly appointed to take charge of congregational funds . . . Paul's purpose in ordering contributions from Sunday to Sunday is that, when he finally arrives in Corinth, the work may be entirely done. The plural logiai, "collections," refers to the accumulations made by the individuals; each would have his logia. The present tense ginontai accords with this: the collections are not to proceed after Paul arrives. Then it will be necessary that each individual simply bring in his accumulation.

Marvin R. Vincent, D.D., in his Word Studies in the New Testament, says: "Lay by him in store. Literally, put by himself, treasuring. Put by at home."

Arthur S. Way, in The Letters of Saint Paul, writes, "On the first day of the week, let each of you set apart a certain portion of his profits, forming a little hoard, so that the raising of the contributions may not be postponed till my actual arrival."

F. Godet, in his Commentary on First Corinthians, has this: "The words by him, denote an act done by each in his own house, and not, as some have thought, a gift bestowed in the church and known to the giver only."

W. E. Vine in his Commentary on First Corinthians, writes thus: "The storing was to be private, wherever the believer lived. The amount was to be allocated by each giver according to his gains the preceding week, lit., 'whatsoever he may be prospered' (i.e., by God). No actual proportion was laid down; a tithe would be little for some, too much for others. Each would see week by week what income he had received through his calling, and store accordingly, so as to avoid immediate decisions or claiming debts or selling goods, in order to make collections when the Apostle came.”

Marcus Dods, D.D., in The First Epistle to the Corinthians, says: “It is expressly said that each was to lay ‘by him,’ that is, not in a public fund, but at home in his own purse, what he wished to give.”

The Pulpit Commentary says: “The Greek phrase implies that the laying up was to be done at home, but when the money was accumulated, it was doubtless brought to the assembly and handed over to the presbyters.”

Scott’s Bible Commentary says: “Some are of opinion, that the sums, thus set apart, were brought to the treasury of the church at the time; but the words do not seem to admit of this interpretation; and if each separately laid by the sum which he purposed to give, the whole would be brought together at once, when necessary, without any trouble in soliciting contributions.”

John Peter Lange, D.D., in his Commentary on the Bible, writes: “Par eauto, at home. The phrase is therefore conclusive against the prevailing opinion that the collection was taken up in the church. It was an individual and private affair (this is confirmed by the exhortation in allusion to the same subject, in 2 Cor. 9:7, Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give, not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver. —Stanley).”

The Comprehensive Bible Commentary, says: “Some of the Greek fathers rightly observe here, that this advice was given for the poorer among them. They were to lay by, from week to week, and not bring into the common treasury, that by this means, their contributions might be easy to themselves, and yet grow into a fund for the relief of their brethren.”

The Critical Commentary, edited by F. C. Cook, M.A., Canon of Exeter, has this: “Rather storing up whatever he may prosper in, that when I come no gatherings may take place, for then will be the time not for collecting, but for producing the sum of what has been week by week hoarded at home in profits from trade.”

D. D. Whedon, D.D., in Commentary on the New Testament, writes: “Lay by him in store, so keeping a little savings bank at home, and bringing the whole to the church when Paul arrives.”

Despite the fact that Rome has been accused of seeking to get all the gain possible into her coffers, the commentators in A Catholic Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, kept faith with the original as they wrote: “‘First day,’ i.e., Sunday. ‘With himself,’ by him, in his own keeping. It was not then to be handed in at Mass, apparently.”

A Dissenting Voice

One outstanding commentator, while admitting that most others make the treasuring up a private affair at home, files his objection to such an arrangement. Charles Hodge, D.D., in his Commentary on First Corinthians, says:

Every one was to lay by himself, i.e., most modern commentators say at home, par eauto. Compare pros eauto in Luke 24:12; see also John 20:10. The direction then is that every one would lay aside at home whatever he was able to give, thus treasuring up his contributions. To this interpretation it may be objected that the whole expression is thus obscure and awkward. ‘Let every one at home place, treasuring up what he has to give.’ The words do not mean to lay by at home, but to lay by himself, i.e., let him take to himself what he means to give. What he was to do with it, or where he was to deposit it, is not expressed. The word thesaurizo means putting into the treasury or hoarding up, and is perfectly consistent with the assumption that the place of deposit was some common treasury and not every man's house. If Paul directed this money to be laid up at home, why was the first day of the week selected? It is evident that the first day must have offered some special facility for doing what is here enjoined. The only reason that can be assigned for requiring the thing to be done on the first day of the week, is, that on that day the Christians were accustomed to meet, and what each one laid aside from his daily gains could be treasured up, i.e., put into the common treasury of the church.

I am sure that Charles Hodge will become the hero of my brethren, who generally feel that the best commentator is the one who agrees with them. We like to have our practices condoned rather than condemned, and no one is more popular than the man who tells us that what we are doing is the scriptural thing. However, I should like to speak a word of warning for those who are prepared to adopt Mr. Hodge as a "patron saint" of giving, for John Peter Lange, replied to the above, in these words:

This is well argued in behalf of the solemn observance of the Lord's Day; but we can no more change the meaning of par eauto than we can parallel phrases in other languages. They are idiomatic expressions for "at home" and honestly require that we should so interpret. This is the rendering which even the ancient Syria version gives it.

In one of the previous quotations, reference was made to the Greek fathers, and their interpretation of the passage. We should like to share with you the words of John Chrysostom (about 375 A.D.) in his Forty-third Homily on First Corinthians. His words are:

He said not, "let him bring it into the church," lest they might feel ashamed because of the smallness of the sum; but having by gradual additions swelled his contribution, let him then produce it, when I am come, but for the present lay it up, saith he, at home, and make thine house a church, thy little box a treasury. Become a guardian of sacred wealth, a self-ordained steward of the poor. Thy benevolent mind assigns thee to this priesthood.

Have you read other versions of the passage in 1 Corinthians 16:1-4? Since it is helpful and enlightening to pursue this form of investigation, we submit herewith the verses as translated in some of them. We hope they will be helpful to you in your honest research to determine the meaning of the passage.

Concordant Literal New Testament: “Now concerning the collection for the saints, even as I prescribe to the ecclesias of Galatia, thus do you also. On one of the sabbaths let each of you lay aside by himself in store that in which he should be prospered, that no collections may be occurring then, whenever I may come.”

The New Testament in Plain English (Charles Kingsley Williams): “On the first day of the week let each of you put aside and save something from his earnings; so that the money has not all to be collected when I come.”

The New English Bible New Testament: “Every Sunday each of you is to put aside and keep by him a sum in proportion to his gains, so that there may be no collecting when I come.”

The Authentic New Testament: “The day after the sabbath let each of you put by savings as he has prospered, so that collections do not have to be made when I come.”

The Modern New Testament (George M. Lamsa): “Upon the first day of every week, let each of you put aside and keep in his house whatever he can afford, so that there may be no collections when I come.”

The Modern Speech New Testament (Richard Francis

Weymouth): “On the first day of every week let each of you put on one side and store up at his home whatever gain has been granted to him; so that whenever I come, there may then be no collections going on.”

The Twentieth Century New Testament: “On the first day of every week each of you should put by what he can afford, so that no collections need be made after I have come.”

The New Testament in Modern English (Centenary Edition): “On the first day of each week let each of you put aside something, keeping it in store as he may prosper, so that when I come there may be no collections going on.”

The Revised Standard Version: “On the first day of every week, each of you is to put something aside and store it up, as he may prosper, so that contributions need not be made when I come.”

Some Observations

Whether we like it or not, there is not one indication anywhere in the sacred scriptures, that any congregation of saints ever took up a public contribution every Sunday. Obviously the congregations in Galatia and Corinth did not take up an offering when Paul planted them, or for several years afterwards, and then the language used indicates that individuals simply laid up a sum privately each week, and kept it until the apostle came, when they turned the whole amount they had saved over to him to take to the relief of the poor saints for whom they had been laying by their weekly sums.

In spite of this I was taught as a child, and even taught it myself as I grew older, that all of our giving had to be done “through the church.” We were even led to believe that if there was a needy person in the community we should give our contributions for relief into the treasury and let it be dispensed from it “so the church could get the glory.” Sometimes, after we put it in, the brethren would not pay it out. The church wanted the money more than it wanted the glory. We were told that it was a sin to take up a contribution on any other day of the week than Sunday, and we advertised this fact in the newspapers to prove our loyalty. Of course, we could bring clothes for orphans on Wednesday night, but not money. How silly can you get?

Stress was placed upon the term “every one” and we believed that, since this was an “act of worship,” every individual had to personally put something in the plate with his own hands. Thus, a husband would provide his wife with a token amount to put in so she could “worship.” Even little boys and girls were given a penny or nickel so they could early learn the importance of “giving to the church.” This was one “item of worship” that even the vilest sinner could participate in, for I never knew anyone to receive his money back on the basis that he could not “participate in the worship.” Money makes a lot of difference, as the world learned when the pope sold indulgences. But I now realize that our whole scheme was dreamed up by visionaries, and represents only an illusion based upon an institutional image. But I can never get out of my mind the case of an elderly widow who told the elders when they visited her, that the reason she had not been in attendance, was that she didn’t have “anything to put in” and knew that her “worship” would not be acceptable if she left out an item. So she stayed home rather than be embarrassed by her lack of finance.

I plead that you do not misunderstand what I am saying. It is no sin for brethren to pool their resources to carry on any work which they regard as acceptable. They may take up a regular contribution on Sunday, or any other day, and they may select one of their number to act as treasurer, and to give an account of receipts and expenditures. Indeed, I am of the opinion that such a method, while not the only one which might be employed, may be the best in our present state of affairs.

What I am saying is that it is an outgrowth of human rationalization, and has no more direct scriptural warrant than a lot of other things that we do. To declare that this was a heavenly program, properly prepared on high and presented to us in the sacred scriptures as the divine law for giving money is just not true. And to threaten men and women with hell because they prefer to put their funds where human needs are evident, rather than in the institutional bank account, is as bad as popery in its blackest moments.

A realization of this will free some of my sisters in the Lord from the role of second-class citizens in the majestic kingdom of the Father. I know school-teachers, secretaries, clerks and saleswomen who give money into the church treasury and are not even allowed to attend a business meeting where the expenditure of their funds is discussed. If that is not taxation without representation, I do not know how you could have it. My advice to these faithful sisters is to spend their money in helping the needy and where they can see how it is used. They can give their share of the funds needed to pay the light bill, heating costs, and upkeep of the building, but otherwise let them dispense their alms without allowing someone else to determine how their money will be spent, while they are gagged and muzzled by tradition. This is plain talk, but it is long overdue. Why should any member of the body in good standing be refused admittance to a business meeting of “the church.”

Let us be honest with God and one another. We have banded ourselves together through mutual love for our Redeemer to do a work. It requires finance to accomplish that work. It is only fair that all of us should share in communal ventures to the extent of ability, and under our present wage system, Sunday is as good a day as any for replenishing the community funds. It is more convenient because we meet on this resurrection day to share in the fellowship of the body and blood at the family table.

What I am saying is that we should quit saying that “passing the plate” for money every Sunday is the divine pattern. We should stop the silly and inane statement that this is “a prescribed item of worship.” What we are doing is reading into the scriptures what we are already practicing, and while the thing we are doing is not wrong, it is certainly wrong to misuse and misapply the scriptures. We ought not to wrest the scriptures to sustain even what is right.

The real tragedy comes when brethren in the Lord start with an unsubstantial and fictitious theory, as a basis for erecting a structured concept, over which they split and fragment the saints. This has happened in recent years when men have postulated a myth concerning “the church treasury,” which they have enforced with laws and statutes that are mere figments of fertile imaginations.

Right now the congregations of Christians in the United States are riven from stem to stern over how to take care of the poor and distressed. Debates as to what can and cannot be done “out of the church treasury” have fomented hate and hostility. It is possible that the whole thing is based upon sheer conjecture. There is reason for grave suspicion that the primitive community of saints ever had a financial drive, a budget, bank account, or treasury. When you are an underground movement meeting in caves and catacombs it is a little risky to sneak in every Monday morning with your deposit slip filled out.

I question whether God ever intended to lay down a hard and fast rule to regulate our method of caring for the poor. Certainly there are several different ways sanctioned and practiced by our Lord and his apostles, and no one seemed to get hurt over any of them, except Ananias and Sapphira. It would do well if preachers who elect themselves as brotherhood regulators would haul down their signs, and allow congregations of saints to handle their own affairs. The projection of a mythical pattern promulgated as God’s precise program for all ages can only create unnecessary strife, and the exportation of our foibles to foreign lands will only serve to confuse humble natives. Let God be God!

Internal Power

Mission Messenger (July 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“The Christ you have to deal with is not a weak person outside you, but a tremendous power inside you” (2 Corinthians 13:3).

A jet engine does not know the power within itself, nor the thrust which it develops. It is insensible and material and thus whines and roars without consciousness of its energy or lift. But man is more than a mechanism. True, he is a physical machine, wonderfully synchronized and composed of elements. But he is more than that, for he is made in the image of his creator, and possesses rational powers by which he can know himself and his capabilities.

It is, therefore, a tragedy that men live beneath their potential so often, and are oblivious of the power of Christ which can be theirs. That power is a transforming power when it is released from the inhibitions and restraints with which we so often shackle and sublimate it. It may seem incredible to some that we could limit the power of Christ. This is the power which was operative in the creation of the whole universe.

But we overlook the fact that man, in the image of God, possesses a will, and that it is sovereign. God respects it to the extent that he never imposes the divine will upon it. Man is never reduced to an automaton or mere mechanical device by the power which made him. Jesus will not come in to dwell in the heart without permission, and once admitted will only work as we allow or permit.

Jesus is a tremendous power. Before he left the earth he declared that all authority was given to him. Principalities and powers are subject to him. Things in heaven, things on earth, and things under the earth, are all under his direction. They will bow the knee to him! He is God's dynamo by which the world was created and by which it is still maintained. It is not simply that he possesses power as an attribute bestowed. His is power by nature.

This is personal power. In a sense I have thought that all power is personal when traced to its origin. Whether we talk about electrical power, magnetic power, physical power, or spiritual power, none of it was self-generating. Atomic energy began with a Prime Cause which created and contained it. The power by which energy is confined must be present before the energy to be confined and must be greater than that energy. If the universe is composed of atoms and thus of contained energy, there had to be a power preceding the universe and it had to be superior to the universe.

And that power had to be governed by intelligence, else it could not have created the design for the containment of the energy, and energy uncontained dissipates itself. Both the creation and continuity of the universe bespeak a divine and intelligible source of primal power. In Jesus this power is found in its fulness, the fulness of God. And that power is available unto us. Jesus is not a weak person outside of us. He is a tremendous power inside of us.

If one truly believes this it will work a change in him. For one thing, he will lose his fear of men. One who accepted the indwelling of Jesus as a reality said, "I will not fear what men shall do unto me." Jesus himself said, "Fear not him which is able to destroy the body and after that has nothing that he can do.” He said that we were blessed when men persecuted and reviled us, and that we should rejoice and be extremely happy. John wrote, “For we realize that our life in this world is actually his life lived in us. Love contains no fear— indeed fully— developed love expels every particle of fear.”

The indwelling Jesus frees one from fear of death. He now holds the keys to death and the unseen. Consider this statement, “He also became a human being, so that by going through death as a man he might destroy him who had the power of death, that is, the devil; and might also set free those who lived their whole lives a prey to the fear of death.” Death sometimes creeps in on silent feet and in the darkness. It is not always loud and violent. And we need the assurance of his overcoming power so that death will be swallowed up in victory.

It is Christ within who gives us the power to overcome self. This is a greater victory than that over death, for it is victory by death and through it, the crucifixion of the old man who has dominated us. Paul describes our struggle. “My own behavior baffles me. For I find myself not doing what I really want to do but doing what I really loathe . . . I often find that I have the will to do good, but not the power . . . It is an agonizing situation, and who on earth can set me free from the clutches of my own sinful nature? I thank God there is a way out through Jesus Christ our Lord.”

In our outward thrust into the world Christ will open up the door and supply the divine propulsion to enable us to go as far as we are willing to go. This requires absolute trust and complete surrender. It means a sort of inspired recklessness, the courage to risk and adventure in knowledge of the fact that if we walked alone we would be helplessly crushed and beaten. It means playing for high stakes, throwing all we have and are into the game, keeping no reserve with which to cover. God must either have all or he can use none. It does not take much of a man to be a Christian but it takes all of him there is. Only when we give in to him can he freely give out to us!

The Name Pattern

Mission Messenger (August 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

A number of years ago, the grace of God made it possible for me to labor in Red Cloud, Nebraska, a lovely little city where some of my best friends reside. I did a great deal of “personal work,” as it was called, visiting from house to house and inviting the residents to attend the nightly meetings at which I was speaking. It seemed apparent that I needed printed material to leave with them which would clearly distinguish between our little group as the true church, and the sects to which they gave allegiance, which were outside the pale.

It appeared obvious that the quickest and best way to do this was to point out the difference in the religious titles which we wore. Anyone who was not too blind to read a signboard could see that we were the Church of Christ, and could as readily determine that no one else was. It was all very simple. Those who met behind our signboard were in Christ. They belonged to him! Those who met behind other signboards were not in Christ, but had been captured by Satan.

So I wrote and had printed a tract under the heading, “Whose Name Shall the Bride Wear?” It became very popular indeed with those who thought they were the bride. Eventually more than fifty-thousand copies of the folder were distributed. Several years later I came to realize that what I was doing was actually more sectarian than those whom I was seeking to reach.

Like a flash out of the blue it dawned upon me that the called out ones had no official title, no party name. To promote and defend such a title was simply to make a denomination out of the group of believers who appropriated it and trusted in it.

The very word denominate, from the Latin de and nominare, to call by a name, means, “to give a name to; designate by a name or title; to call by a distinctive name or designation.” Any group which selects and appropriates to itself a specific name, title or brand, is a denomination, whether the title it selects is from words found in the Bible, or composed of words not even mentioned in the sacred volume. The source of the title has nothing to do with the act of denominating, and any group which denominates itself is a denomination. Since it thus segments itself it is also a sect.

The ekklesia of God had no specific name in its inception. The saints were corporately designated only by simple nouns. All of these describe a relationship. Not a one was used as an exclusive title. This is obvious, or there would have been only one. As to functional unity they were the body of Christ, as to divine origin the churches of God, as to present authority the churches of Christ. In relation to government they constituted the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of God, or the kingdom of God’s dear Son. In relation to heritage they were the church of the firstborn ones whose names were enrolled in heaven.

To select any one of these terms such as church of God, church of the firstborn, or church of Christ, and make it the means of identification for a specific group in the realm of believers in the Messiah is to create a denomination, by the act of denominating that group. And to do it in order to define boundaries and to separate those Christians under the title from others who are not under it is the very essence of sectarianism.

Some very canny and contriving politicians among us have come up with the idea that by writing “church of Christ” instead of “Church of Christ” we will avoid sectarianism. But sectarianism is an attitude of the heart and not an accident of spelling. A group can be as narrow and exclusive under a little “c” as they can under a big one. Making criminals wear short pants will not reform them.

It bugs some of my fellow-editors because I refer to “The Church of Christ” in my articles just as I do to “The Church of God” or “The Baptist Church.” They want me to try and fool the two latter groups by using a little “c” on our church. But if the Church of God started writing their title “church of God,” these editors would still blast away at them as sectarians. Our problem is not with the alphabet. It is with the Alpha and Omega. We want to stake out an exclusive claim on him and get him in our corral.

At the same time we are in a real quandary because of our own divisions. Not only must we make sure that no one confuses us with other groups of believers but we must also be certain that people do not get us mixed up with others of our own brethren. So we erect signs reading: Church of Christ (Vocal Music), or Church of Christ (Christian). This means we are denominational out of parenthesis and sectarian within it. It is bad enough to be singularly denominational as Methodists and Presbyterians. But we double the dose and go them one better.

Sometimes this back-fires. Instead of clarifying it confuses. A college professor who makes no commitment to Christ mentioned to me an advertisement he had seen on “the church page” of a northern newspaper which read: Church of Christ (One Container). I explained that these brethren used one container in passing the fruit of the vine in the Lord’s Supper. As an economist and business consultant he had been working on the idea of one container loaded with a commodity at a factory and sealed for shipment across the ocean where it could be opened only by the consignee. He had wondered if the group to which he alluded had encapsulated themselves and sealed themselves in an insulated container, expecting to be transported en masse to the glory world. I told him that he was probably not too far off, at that!

A Fact of Scripture

At the very outset we have to face up to the fact that the term “church of Christ” is not even found in the scriptures. It is just not there. The nearest we can come to it is “The churches of Christ salute you” (Romans 16:16). But in the very same chapter the writer mentions “the churches of the Gentiles.” He apparently refers to the same people. But I have yet to see a sign in front of one of our edifices reading, “The churches of the Gentiles” (Romans 16:4).

Our sophists have no trouble getting around the fact that the official title is nowhere found in the Bible. Such trivial omissions as “the name of the church” do not bother debaters who speak where the Bible speaks, and frequently where it doesn’t. So there is a stock argument that is triumphantly hauled off the shelf and exhibited on the pages of orthodox journals. “Where there is a plural, there must be a singular.” If there are churches of Christ there must be a church of Christ! This settles it!

Unfortunately, this argument is as leaky as a cracked gourd dipper. I mean it will not hold water. You cannot reason from a plural which represents all to a singular component of that plural which also represents all. A plural represents the total of those units involved in it, and any single unit cannot possibly embrace them all. When Paul wrote “The congregations of Christians salute you” he knew there were individual congregations in a lot of places.

I am not saying that there is no such thing as the church of God, the church of Christ, the body of Christ, the kingdom of heaven, or the temple of God. I say there is! All I am saying is that the Holy Spirit did not apply to it the term church of Christ which we have argued (at least since 1906) is the scriptural title. We've lambasted others for having an unscriptural name and now our own denominational chickens are coming home to roost. I intend to help them find where the roost is located.

But did not Jesus say, "Upon this rock I will build my church?" Indeed, he said it and he did it. It is his church. But this statement only shows possession. It says not one thing about the name of that church. It tells us to whom the church belongs but provides no name for it except the simple noun "church." If I say, "Upon this lot I will park my car," you know to whom the car belongs but you do not know its name. You could not tell whether it was a Ford, Chevrolet or Plymouth.

And that is just the point. There is only one church. There never was but one. There never will be another. The church is a divine creation and not a human organization. A man can no more make another church than he can make another Holy Spirit. "There is one body and one Spirit." The church does not need to engage in the identification race with sects. It does not belong in that category. When it gets hooked on the signboard hang-up it gets on the sectarian level. The church on the rock is not "The Church of Christ" down the street from "The Baptist Church" or up the street from "The Presbyterian Church." It is the whole body of called-out believers in the community.

The body of Christ, the kingdom of God's dear Son, is not the church in town which does not have an instrument, or does not have classes, or does not have individual cups, or does not contribute to Herald of Truth. The body of Christians in any locality is made up of every saved person in that area. It is not the church of God because of what it does not have, but because of what it does have.

The Name of the Bride

Perhaps I'd better get on with listing some of the mistakes I made in my tract about the name of the bride. The whole argument falls as flat as a Swedish pancake when one realizes that the idea of a wife being called by the name of her husband is a product of western culture. And it is of relatively modern origin. Even now it is not the custom in many parts of the world.

Certainly such an idea is foreign to the Bible. In both the old and new covenant scriptures wives were called by their own names. Thus we read of Sarai, Abraham's wife; Rachel, Jacob's wife; Joanna, the wife of Chuza; Felix, and his wife Drusilla. No one ever reads of Mrs. Zechariah, or of Mrs. Aquila.

Even if the bride wore the name of her husband, the term "church of Christ" would not be that name. Christ is not the name of our Lord. It is his office or prophetic function. He is Jesus the Christ. He is the Christ because he was christed, or anointed, just as John the Baptist was so designated because he baptized. When you read of Simon the tanner, you do not think of tanner as being his last name. You certainly would not call his wife "Mrs. Tanner." Nor would you have addressed the wife of Simon the leper as "Mrs. Leper."

Our Lord's name is Jesus. The angel said, "Thou shalt call his name Jesus" (Matthew 1:21). When he was born Joseph "called his name Jesus" (Matt. 1:25). Paul declared that God gave him a name which is above every name that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow (Philippians 2:10). If the church is to wear the name of the bridegroom, she should be called "Mrs. Jesus." The term church of Christ is no more the name of the bride than body of Christ, kingdom of Christ, or flock of Christ. Body, kingdom, flock and church are all just common nouns.

If a congregation decided, in its ignorance, to try and be "scriptural" and put up a sign reading "Church of Jesus" the tourists from Texas and Tennessee, looking for “a faithful church with which to worship” before going to the zoo, would not even slow down. Is it not peculiar that the very same people who argue that church of Christ is the name of the bride also argue for spelling church with a lower case “c”? If that is the name of a bride or wife, it is a proper name. No one writes “nell ketcherside” when addressing my wife. Of course, our brethren are not especially noted for consistency, because they generally take a position first and then try to cook up arguments to fit it. They also bend a lot of scriptures around in some funny shapes for the same reason.

Actually, of course, if you want to be really technical, the church is not yet married to the Lamb. And when the wedding feast occurs she will not be called Mrs. Lamb. John places the wedding at the close of events as we now know them. “For the marriage of the Lamb is come, and his wife hath made herself ready” (Rev. 19:7). When the ceremony begins the bride will be attired in white linen made up of the righteousness of the saints. I am helping work on the trousseau now, although I am not too good at it, and God’s grace will have to unravel a lot of my errors. But I am looking forward to the event for, “Blessed are they which are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb.” That is one banquet I do not want to miss.

Christ wants to present the church to himself “a glorious church, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish.” If the wedding gown is to be woven of the righteousness of the saints, it is obvious to me that I will need a lot of spot remover, and a considerable amount of ironing out. I have had a lot of spots and wrinkles in my life. And I have never even thought of being without blemish. This once worried me a lot, because deep down inside, I knew I did not have what it took. I was trusting to legal rectitude to save me. But every time I tried to smooth out a wrinkle I generally made a couple of bigger ones.

Then I learned the magnificent secret from Paul. I had been trying to stay pure while dabbling in garbage. Legal rectitude will not get the job done. It only frustrates. It makes a pretender out of you. Paul said, “I count it so much garbage, for the sake of gaining Christ and finding myself incorporate in him, with no righteousness of my own, no legal rectitude, but the righteousness which comes from faith in Christ, given by God in response to faith” (Philippians 3:8, 9).

I am now incorporate in him. What a burden this has lifted off my heart. I am now riding with God and I leave the driving to Jesus. I am relaxed and I can lean back and enjoy myself and watch the scenery go by. In my life there is a lot of it to watch. I am still human and once in awhile when we are on a hairpin turn I may get butterflies in my stomach, but I really am not afraid as long as Jesus is at the wheel.

Best of all, I know that every person on this whole wide earth who has been received of the Father, and who has been given that righteousness which comes by faith, is my brother. We do not have all of these behind our signboards. I do not even know who they all are. “But God has laid a foundation, and it stands firm, with this inscription: ‘The Lord knows his own.’” Some day I shall know them also. And what a glad day that will be!

As for now, I am content to be in him and to try in my weak way to be kind, tenderhearted and forgiving, even as God for Christ’s sake has forgiven me. I consider every sincere, conscientious believer in the Messiahship and divine Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth, who has validated his faith in this sublime proposition by obedience to our Lord in baptism, as being born again. He is a part of the new humanity. He is a child of God. He is in the church of God, the church of Christ. He has been added to the one body. He may not be in “The Church of Christ” listed among the other denominations in the United States census.

You see, I am not simply opposed to sects. I am opposed to sectism, the nefarious spirit which breeds and begets sects. I am as opposed to it among us as I am among them. The whole sectarian mess created by vain wranglings about names, opinions and words, is as abhorrent to me as I think it is to God. I do not believe we can overcome and overthrow the sectarian temple by adding another brick of our own to the imposing structure. Let me draw upon a statement from Alexander Campbell which may serve to enlighten you further as to my position.

Dear sir, this plan of making our own nest, and fluttering over our own brood; of building our own tent, and of confining all goodness and grace to our noble selves and the “elect few” who are like us, is the quintessence of sublimated pharisaism. The old Pharisees were but babes in comparison to the modern: and the longer I live, and the more I reflect upon God and man— heaven and earth — the Bible and the world— the Redeemer and his church — the more I am assured that all sectarianism is the offspring of hell; and that all differences about words, and names, and opinions, hatched in Egypt, or Rome, or Edinburgh, are like the frolics of drunken men; and that where there is a new creature, or a society of them, with all their imperfections and frailties, and errors in sentiment, in views, and opinions, they ought to receive one another, and the strong to support the weak, and not to please themselves. To lock ourselves up in the bandbox of our own little circle; to associate with a few units, tens, or hundreds, as the pure church, as the elect, is real Protestant monkery, it is evangelical pharisaism.

Occasionally, since the days of Alexander Campbell, there have arisen men who have seen the true nature of our own sectarian spirit. One of these men was G. C. Brewer, and he evidenced his knowledge in an address during the Abilene Christian College Lectureship. We take this quotation from that speech.

It is never wrong to speak of the church as the church of Christ or the church of God, or the church of the first-born, but to repeat what has been said before, to exalt any one of these into the patented name of the church is to sectarianize that expression. If we have not done that very thing with the expression church of Christ then why do we not vary our terms in speaking of the church? Why is every deed made to the Church of Christ? Why is “Church of Christ” put upon every cornerstone or front of every meeting house? Why does the “Church of Christ” have a literature series? So fixed and uniform is this designation that if we would insert the name Jesus in the expression it would cause confusion. If a disciple were in a strange city and while looking for the meeting place of the saints he should come upon a house with this inscription, “The Church of Jesus Christ,” if he did not pass it up he would hesitate and make further inquiry before he entered that house. He is looking for a church of the Lord but he is not looking for this particular one. He is looking for the one that wears the stabilized, invariable name, “Church of Christ.” A name which therefore, distinguishes it from the church of Jesus Christ, or the church of God, or the church of the saints and all other of the Lord’s churches, implying, of course, that he has several. To use the term church of Christ to include any limited number of saints or to make it the name of the church is to sectarianize the expression.

Brethren, I do not expect you to get this point without some suffering but if you will endure the necessary pain caused by forcing the needle through the skin by which you get this anti-sectarian serum your suffering will then be over and your spiritual condition will soon be much better. So mote it be.

Apparently, the brethren were not willing to endure the pain and the shot did not take. They are still as sectarian as before our brother spoke. After listening to some of the sectarian pap produced in the lectureship for the past several years, I suggest that the new director take one session and read the speech delivered by our late brother Brewer. Perhaps another injection will work the desired effect and inoculate us against further sectarianism manifested among a great many of us.

We must expect no sudden recovery. There will be no miraculous healing. The sectarian spirit dies slowly and lingeringly. The ghost will not be given up but with agony and suffering. We cling to it longingly. It pampers our pride. It speaks of safety and security, the protection provided by a prison. We love our parties. We are grateful for our walls and sequestered monastic paradises. So long have we basked in our own righteousness that we are frightened by freedom. We have trusted in our signboards rather than in a Savior. And we have sought to sanctify them by scripture.

For this reason, in our next issue, we shall take those passages which have been projected as proof of a particular title and show how they have been twisted, warped and wrested, to create a name pattern with which to belabor other believers and to exhibit our own factional feelings and partisan programs. We sincerely trust that you will not overlook this examination of the sacred oracles of God.

A Sectarian Name

Mission Messenger (September 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

The body of Christ, composed of all of the called-out ones, has no official denomination or designation. The sacred scriptures employ no exclusive term or brand by which to identify that body. It is variously described, defined and denoted by a number of common nouns. The selection and exaltation of any one of these as the recognized title is sectarian and partisan. It is a work of the flesh. This was clearly understood by the reformers who preceded us. For example, M. C. Kurfees, speaking at the Abilene Christian College Lectureship in 1921, said:

“In the present divided state of the church and under the influence of parlance growing out of a denominational environment, it is difficult to avoid being sectarian or denominational in our speech; and hence there is a growing tendency today to sectarianize even the term ‘church of Christ.’ This is invariably the case when it is used, as it frequently is nowadays, to mean merely those people of God who do not work through missionary societies and do not use instrumental music in the worship, and to exclude other children of God who make the mistake of working and worshiping in the said ways. The church of Christ in any city today, using the term in accordance with Biblical usage, includes all the children of God in the said city; and until these principles are observed, the primitive church, in its constitution, its doctrine, its faith, and its practice will never be fully restored. Let us plead for the spread and recognition of these principles and for the complete restoration of the primitive church.”

That kind of talk is no longer indulged in the lectureship. The reason is clear. Our brethren had now rather be sectarian than right. They have “withdrawn fellowship” posthumously from Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Tolbert Fanning, David Lipscomb, J. W. McGarvey and M. C. Kurfees. These “liberals” have been cast out of the synagogue in absentia, and one loyal theologian in Colorado said that if Paul had been a member of his congregation when he allowed James to talk him into going into the temple with the Jewish brethren who were zealous for the law, he would have called him on the carpet to confess his wrongs. If he had refused there would have been one apostle no longer in the foundation of “The Church of Christ.” You are not even safe now after you are dead!

One of our notable traits is to search the scriptures to justify what we have already adopted. In no other area is this practice more prevalent than as it relates to “the name of the church.” We really put the wire-stretchers to work on this one. One of the favorites is Acts 4:12, where Peter said, “And there is salvation in no one else, for there is no other name under heaven given among men by which we must be saved.”

Of course, Peter was not talking about the name of the church. He was talking about the name by which he had healed a lame man. “In the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, walk” (Acts 3:6). To the startled multitude, he said, “The God of our fathers glorified Jesus . . . and his name, by faith in his name, has made this man strong whom you see and know” (Acts 3:13, 16). To the belligerent council he said, “By the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom you crucified, whom God raised from the dead, by him this man is standing before you well.”

We are not saved by the church. We are not saved by the name of the church. The church has to be saved. “Christ is the head of the church, his body, and is himself its Savior” (Ephesians 5:23). As Peter said, “There is salvation in no one else.” His name is Jesus. He is the Christ. He was from Nazareth. But you just put up a nice neon sign with the insignia “Church of Jesus Christ of Nazareth (Acts 4:12),” and see how many Texas license plates you count in your parking lot.

Did you know that Peter and John were not Christians when they healed the lame man? Do you realize there was not a single Christian in the whole congregation at Jerusalem then? If you had been on a “personally conducted holy land tour” at that time, and had slipped up and asked Peter if he was a member of the Church of Christ, he would have jumped like he would if you told him he was “the first pope.” Sectarianism plays funny tricks with men’s minds. It also destroys their moral integrity.

I am about convinced that the King James Version is responsible for most of our ludicrous arguments. Actually, the word “church” shouldn’t even be in the Bible. It isn’t a translation of ekklesia, and never was. Fenton John Anthony Hort, of Hort and Westcott fame recognized this. He gave up trying to find an Anglo-Saxon equivalent as he explains in “The Christian Ecclesia.” Alexander Campbell knew it. He never used the word in Living Oracles, always employing “congregation” instead. Perhaps the word “community” as used in The Authentic Version is the best of all. “Convey my regards to one another with a chaste kiss. All the Christian communities send their regards” (Romans 16:16).

When our brethren are confronted with the fact that the term “church of Christ” is not in the Bible, while the expression “church of God” is used repeatedly, they agree that it would be permissible to use that designation. None of them do it though. About a half dozen other parties beat us to that one and staked their claim before we got around to it. Now we cannot use it because someone on the highway might get confused and drop in under the impression that we really were “The Church of God.” If we had not come into the census so late in the game, our title would probably be “church of God,” and we would be quoting scripture to sustain it. The Gospel Advocate would be a Church of God paper, and Harding College would be a Church of God school, according to common parlance.

We have worked out some pretty good answers. They are shrewd ones if you do not study too seriously or investigate too closely. Take Acts 20:23, for example. “Feed the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood.” It was Christ who shed his blood, so God is Christ here, and thus Paul meant “church of Christ” when he wrote “church of God.” All this, in spite of the fact that just seven verses back, and in the same speech, Paul clearly distinguishes between God, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

There is pretty strong indication that the King James Version may be a wee bit misleading. The Authentic Version has it, “See to it that you tend God’s community, which he has acquired with the blood of his own (Son).” J. H. Moulton in a Grammar of New Testament Greek says, “I ventured to cite this as a possible encouragement to those who would translate Acts 20:28, ‘the blood of one who was his own.’” The Concordant Literal Version has it, “Shepherding the ecclesia of God, which he procures through the blood of his own.”

We used to make quite a play on this verse by using the deed to a piece of property and showing that the one who bought and paid for it would want it recorded in his name. It wasn’t a bad illustration, but it would wreck our sectarian playhouse. As I pointed out last month, Christ is the office of Jesus, and not his name. He is Jesus the Christ. If Mr. Brown, the carpenter, had his property recorded as belonging to Mr. Carpenter, his heirs and assigns would be in a real predicament. Even so, in our illustration from the verse, we should have come out with “church of God” like Paul did. But we never did, we always got it adjusted and corrected before the recorder got hold of it.

I must not forget Ephesians 3:14, 15. “For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named.” It was easy to assume that this meant that the entire family bore the name Christ. But this argument is as shaky as a gelatin salad. First off, as pointed out by B. W. Johnson, in that perennial best-seller, People’s New Testament With Notes, “The Father is referred to. The words, ‘Of our Lord Jesus Christ,’ are not found in the best manuscripts, and are omitted in the Revision.”

That is a real blow! But there is another. The word translated “family” is in the plural. It should read “every family.” The subject under consideration is the universal fatherhood of God, not the name of the one body. Paul bows the knee to the Father because of his sovereignty. He is the origin and source of all fatherhood. There is not a chain of lineal descent on earth, nor an order of beings in the celestial realm which does not owe its beginning to the Father. “There is one God, the Father, from whom are all things and for whom we exist” (1 Cor. 8:6).

The Revised Standard Version has, “For this reason I bow my knees before the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named” (Eph. 3:14). This is consistent with the language of the apostle and we concur in it. Only those who are hard pressed to justify the existence of an exclusive sect would use this as our brethren have used it in the past. I am not interested in sectarian defence, not even our own. I am opposed to the very spirit of sectarianism.

The same observation needs to be made about the illogical mental gymnastics employed on Hebrews 12:23, where the apostle refers to “the church of the firstborn which is written in heaven.” Sermon outline books jump on the word firstborn, and then hie away to Colossians 1:18, where Jesus is referred to as the head of the body, the church. “He is the beginning, the firstborn from the dead.” The chain of reasoning is simple. Jesus is the firstborn, the church is the church of the firstborn, therefore, the church is “the church of Christ.”

But the word for firstborn in Hebrews 12:23, is plural, the firstborn ones. It cannot refer to Jesus. The writer is addressing Hebrews who knew that under the covenant, the firstborn belonged to God (Exodus 13:12). The church is made up of those who are God’s own people. It is “the church of the firstborn ones whose names are enrolled in heaven.” The reference is to the constituency, and not to Jesus as the head at all.

There is no official title for the ekklesia of the new covenant. Only common nouns are used to identify it and these are nouns of relationship. In a corporate sense the saints are referred to by such words as church, flock, temple, family and body. But church of God is no more the official name than flock of God or temple of God. The expression “church of Christ” may be employed as a name of the church. It must never be employed as the name of a church!

When I speak of the church in Saint Louis, I am not limiting the term to a special party in the religious realm bearing the designation “Church of Christ.” I refer to every child of God, every born-again believer, every member of the new humanity in this teeming metropolitan center. They are not all meeting behind signboards bearing the caption “Church of Christ.” God’s sheep are still a scattered flock. Some are wandering on sectarian hills. Some are caught in sectarian thickets. Some are feeding at troughs where they must subsist on fodder flavored and seasoned with sectarian salt.

But if they are in his family they are my brothers and sisters. I love them all, not with that cold detached love of the partisan who seeks to love by rote or letter of the law, but with a warmth and compassion which recognizes my own ignorance and regrettable shortcomings. The body of Christ is greater than any of our parties. It is greater than all of them put together. It is greater than any movement of the body or in the body which seeks to reform its constituency. It is more majestic than any restoration movement!

Let me be clear and bold in my declaration. There are those who spend their time going over what I write with a fine tooth comb, seeking for scraps of information with which they can attack me in the minds of prejudiced readers. Allow me to save them the trouble of such meticulous research. I believe that there are Christians in the sects of our day. I believe that these are in the church of God by divine appointment, and in sectarian pastures through personal choice, influenced by tradition, teaching and early training. Our task is not to unite sects, but the Christians within them. We can never accomplish this task by creating another sect. It makes no difference whether such a sect is designated by a term lifted from the scripture or the English dictionary, sectarianism will never be overcome by creating additional sects. It is sectarianism against which I shall test the steel of my swordblade, and if that sectarianism is our own, it too must go!

The Apostolic Attitude

Tradition binds men to their past and often blinds them for their present and future. And every movement, political or religious, which survives for two generations, develops a tradition, a handing down or giving over from the prior generation to the successor. Traditional ways of looking at things may be bad, or they may be good. Often they are neutral and are neither bad nor good, being merely an approach taken to problems which have arisen.

Traditions become harmful when they shackle us to our own past and preclude any honest search for new truths and deeper insights. It is then we resent those who dare question our established position and regard them as heretics. Yet every advance in perception and understanding has been made by men branded as heretics. There has never been a reformer who has not been so castigated. We owe our gains of today to the heretics of yesterday. The heretics of today will be the heroes of tomorrow!

When Alexander Campbell was preparing to launch the journal which he designated The Christian Baptist, he said in the preface, “It is a rarity, seldom to be witnessed, to see a person boldly opposing the doctrinal errors or the unscriptural measures of a people with whom he has identified himself, and to whom he looks for approbation and support. If such a person appears in any party, he soon falls under the frowns of those who think themselves wiser than the reprover, or would wish so to appear. Hence it usually happens that such a character must lay his hand upon his mouth, or embrace the privilege of walking out of doors. Although this has usually been the case, we would hope that it would not always continue so to be.” I also labor in that same hope.

It is a tradition with many of my brethren to regard the apostolic letters addressed to communities of saints and individuals as a meticulous pattern for every act of service and devotion to be rendered unto the Father until the return of our Lord. Their attempt to implement this tradition has fractured and fragmented them into more than a score of hostile parties and made them the most divided religious movement on the contemporary American scene.

Their very attitude toward the sacred scriptures will continue to split and splinter them. The only way to avoid such a dismal future is to freeze all knowledge at the current level and place a moratorium on all honest attempts to learn. If we are under law, and our “clergy” are the lawyers, interpreters and enforcers, then there is no freedom in Christ Jesus. The dullest conformist will be more faithful than the most brilliant and sacrificing researchist.

I deny that we are under a legalistic code of statutes, specifications and judgments. Such a system belongs on the other side of the cross. “Christ is the termination of law as a means of justification for every one who has faith” (Romans 10:4). And I have faith! Law was to last only until faith came. “Before faith came, we were confined under law, kept under restraint until faith should be revealed” (Gal. 3:23). You are either under law or under faith. Take your choice. You cannot have both. Law does not rest on faith (Gal. 3:12). Christ has redeemed those that were under the law so they could receive the adoption of sons. I am in this category. Praise God, I have been redeemed and adopted.

The only law under which I serve is that of love, overwhelming love for my redeemer and adopter. I am not under law, but under grace. This is what God said. I accept it without quibble, quirk or question. It is my strength and my salvation. It is my hope! But if I am not under a written code, what is the purpose of the scripture? This is a legitimate question. I am obligated to face it squarely and unequivocally. My answer begins with this article.

A Vehicle and Agent

The primary purpose of scripture is to bring me into a living vital relationship with Jesus Christ as Lord. It is the divine vehicle which transports me into his presence, a heavenly agent which introduces me to the author of my salvation. It is not familiarity with the machinery of the vehicle nor acquaintance with the agent which makes for life. I can know the agent all my life without ever having a personal relationship with the Son of God.

Indeed, if I think I have eternal life in the scriptures, I may become so devoted to them that I never come to him at all. He said this was possible. “You search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life; and it is they that bear witness of me, yet you refuse to come to me that you might have life” (John 5:39). These words were addressed to the most intense students of the sacred oracles this world has ever produced.

They revered the holy scriptures, literally binding portions of them to their foreheads and on their arms. The very entrance to their houses had small containers affixed and in these were written verses from God’s word in exactly twenty-two lines. Josephus wrote, “If anyone should question one of us concerning the laws, he would more easily repeat all of them than his own name; since we learn them from our first consciousness, we have them as it were, engraven on our souls” (Against Apion 2:18).

Rabbi Hillel, whose school in Jerusalem Paul attended, said, “The more teaching of the Law, the more life; the more school, the more wisdom; the more counsel, the more reasonable action” (Sayings of the Fathers 2:5, 7). After the Babylonian exile, the Jews literally became “the people of the Book.” A. R. S. Kennedy says that the Torah in its written form then became “the regulating norm in very relation of life.” But they rejected Jesus of whom the prophets spoke.

If life could have been achieved by law, there was no necessity for the coming of Christ. The law given through Moses was holy and just and good. But the purpose of the law was to bring us to Jesus as the source of life. No law can produce life. “For if a law had been given which could make alive, righteousness would indeed be by law” (Gal. 3:21). Obedience to law for the sake of law does not make one good. And it cannot make one live. Life is personal. “In him was life” (John 1:4).

Searching the scriptures is one thing. Coming to Jesus in order to have life is a wholly different thing. The scriptures bear witness of Jesus. This is their function. But if we are not led into a life giving relationship with him all of our scriptural knowledge will go for naught. It will only serve to condemn us. It may be argued that this was true of the old covenant scriptures but not of the new. But John was speaking of his own epistle when he wrote, “Now Jesus did many other signs in the presence of the disciples, which are not written in this book, but these are written that you may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that believing you may have life in his name.”

Believing in miracles does not produce life. Believing in the record of miracles does not produce life. The design of miracles is not to save but to make credible the claims of Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God. The testimony is one thing, the attestation another thing, and the belief of that testimony which establishes a personal relationship is still another. What is it to have life in his name?

In such usage the word “name” stands for the character, attributes and nature which constitute a person. Life in his name is life in his person. One may believe that the Bible is true and still not be saved. It is not intellectual assent to the veracity of a record which saves, even though that record has a divine origin. Rather, it is receiving him of whom the record testifies which spells the difference between life and death. “To all who received him, who believed in his name, he gave power to become children of God” (John 1:12).

The good news, consisting of the facts related to Jesus, was promulgated in Jerusalem on the first Pentecost following his resurrection. This message was gladly received by some three thousand hearers who reformed and were immersed in the name of Jesus Christ. All of them being Jews, they continued to attend the temple together each day, although “breaking bread in their own homes, they partook of food with glad and generous hearts.”

Being ignorant of many of the implications of their new relationship, they had to rely upon instruction of the apostles. They did not regard this as a new law and would have deeply resented it if someone had suggested that it was to supplant the law of Moses. In fact, they had no intention of abandoning the law or its forms and ceremonies. They expected to constitute a Messianic synagogue within the framework of Judaism. Years later, after some of the apostles had already been killed, they said, “You see, brother, how many thousands there are among the Jews who have believed, and they are all zealous for the law” (Acts 21:20).

It is obvious that the apostles in Jerusalem did not think of their teaching as the laying down of a new law, and just as obvious that “the many priests who were obedient to the faith” (Acts 6:7) did not so regard it. Upon one occasion, an eminent Pharisee, Gamaliel, a highly revered teacher of the law, came to the rescue of the apostles by suggesting that “this plan or this undertaking” might be of God (Acts 5:38). He would never have said this if he had thought of it as another law.

The apostolic teaching was not then, nor has it ever been since, a written code or law for justification. The apostle who wrote twice as many of the epistles as all of the rest put together, plainly states, “But now, having died to that which held us bound, we are discharged from the law, to serve God in a new way, the way of the spirit, in contrast to the old way, the way of a written code” (Romans 7:6).

In spite of this, men seek to take the very epistles of Paul and warp them into a written code. A law requires lawyers to argue about inferences, meanings and deductions. It requires courts, trials, determination of guilt and assessment of penalties. It must create machinery to enforce conformity, to threaten reprisal and to close loopholes in boycott procedures. The lawyers are those who go to school to study legal matters and to become interpreters of divine meaning.

They bind “heavy burdens, hard to bear, and lay them on men’s shoulders.” They learn the keen distinction between swearing by the temple, which is nothing, and “swearing by the gold of the temple which is binding.” They learn how to discourse fluently about giving God a proper measure of mint and anise and dill, and become authorities on sacrificing the smallest garden herbs for the glory of God.

The Way of the Spirit

We serve God in a new way. It is a way of the spirit! We are no longer under the old way, the way of a written code. But if the apostolic epistles are not a written code, what are they? Lay aside your legalistic spectacles for a moment. Read them without a veil over your face!

One of them was a letter of endorsement for a runaway slave being sent back to his owner and master as a brother in Christ. One was a letter of thanks to a community of saints for a gift sent to an ambassador in chains. One was a letter to a young man with a weak stomach, who was sick a lot of the time, encouraging him to keep safe and intact that which had been entrusted to him. Another was a farewell letter to the same young man asking him to come soon and bring an overcoat and some books, especially notebooks for writing purposes.

Still another contained a reply to questions about conduct in marriage. One was a letter encouraging the recipients to leave the ranks of the unemployed and not to expect the imminent return of Jesus, nor use it as an excuse for “idling their time away, minding everybody’s business but their own.” These are not items in a written code. They are love letters to saints and brethren. They were not intended to make polished lawyers but perfect lovers.

The new covenant epistles were designed to assure those who received them of the love of the writers. “God knows how I long for you all, with the deep yearning of Christ himself” (Phil. 1:8). “Only let your conduct be worthy of the gospel of Christ, so that whether I come and see for myself or hear about you from a distance, I may know that you are standing firm, one in spirit, one in mind, contending as one man for the gospel faith, meeting your opponents without so much as a tremor” (1:27).

The letter to the Philippians was not a part of “the gospel of Christ.” The Philippians had long since accepted the gospel, and had taken part themselves in proclaiming it from the first day until they received this letter (1:5). Contending for the gospel faith had nothing to do with arguing with brethren about the implication of anything which Paul wrote in the letter. By the absurd conclusion that the apostolic epistles are all part of the gospel of Christ, and a perfect understanding of the epistles is essential to obedience of the gospel, we have wrecked all hope of unity in the body of God's Son. Too, we have done with the epistles what their writers refused to do with them. We have made them a written code and reverted to a pre-Calvary means of justification, living B.C. lives in an A.D. world.

It is now time for us to renounce our childish and immature traditionalism and grow up in Christ Jesus. This means simply to adopt the same attitude and spirit as the apostles had. It is best exemplified in the words of Paul. "I have not yet reached perfection, but I press on, hoping to take hold of that for which Christ once took hold of me. My friends, I do not reckon myself to have got hold of it as yet . . . Let us then keep to this way of thinking, those of us who are mature. If there is any point on which you think differently, this also God will make plain to you. Only let your conduct be consistent with the level we have already reached."

The very next words are: "Agree together, my friends, to follow my example. You have us for a model; watch those whose way of life conforms to it." Amen!

If we can ever sense that Christianity is not a law but a life, that it is not a sacrificial code imposed from on high but the sharing in our lot of a God who came down from above, our fears will give way to faith, and our heartaches to hope. We will cease to ride herd on God's sheep and be willing to follow in the steps of the Shepherd.

Right On!

Mission Messenger (October 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

Right on! This is the current cry of revolution. It is also my watchword. I am in revolt! I am sick of the sectarian status quo. I am tired of the treadmill trampling of the courts, the “let things take their course” philosophy, which will guarantee the survival of factional animosity for another century.

God’s children are divided. They are fractured and fragmented, splintered and separated. This is an unholy state, contrived in hell, fostered by Satan, and maintained in open defiance of the divine will. It is contrary to the eternal purpose, inconsistent with the prayer of Jesus, and in direct conflict with the sacred scriptures. It makes brotherly love a farce, perpetuates factional interpretations which are absurd, and holds up to ridicule a movement which began to “unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

How can we regain our proper course and proceed with the momentous task of “making all men see what is the mystery of the fellowship”? First, let me tell you how it will not be done. It will not be accomplished by craven men who pay lip-service to the unity of all believers and beat a hurried retreat into the bunkers of financial security the minute they are challenged. It will not be accomplished by those who hold out the olive branch socially and privately, and then publicly cater to the sectarian bitterness which pampers the pride of the congregations which control their prestige and purse strings.

Nor will unity ever come from the meeting of two groups of select partisans gathering to spar suspiciously in the hope of capturing one another by some tired doctrinal elaboration or quirk of fate. Men who talk unity out of one corner of their mouths to others, then secretly rejoice in their adroitness and expertise at fending off their brethren are dishonest in their ingenuousness and unworthy of trust. Factional partisans will not produce unity. They are the very ones who have perpetuated division. The loyalty in which they glory is party loyalty.

Although I am no longer young, I doubt that much will be accomplished by those who are older and dependent for financial and emotional support upon our partisan establishment. They must maintain the party while they live. It is in building the exclusive factional structure they have achieved the little measure of glory which sustains their ego. They are not “heroes of the faith” to those in other factions who do not recognize their names and are wholly unaware of their partisan prowess or exploits, and their claim to fame!

I may be wrong, but I think our silly “Berlin walls” will be beaten down by courageous younger men and women, the dare-devils of the faith who refuse to be satisfied with the sop thrown to them by any party clique. They will early grasp the difference between being faithful to Christ Jesus and being a satellite to a sect. They will cross lines, ignore barriers, scale mountains, bridge chasms, and share their loving insights with the brethren wherever they find them.

They will not be tempted to become mere mercenaries, paid to trample over and over the same musty and mildewed grapes in the congregational winepress. They will not waste their time flailing straw from which the last possible grain of doctrinal wheat was long ago winnowed. Of course they will be “delivered up to councils and verbally flogged in the synagogues.” When persecuted in one town they will have to flee to the next. There is nothing too cruel for the aroused sectarian spirit to perpetrate. It has burnt more martyrs, racked more saints, and crucified more innocents, than anything else in the history of mankind.

Those who would be in the vanguard of the struggle for peace must be willing to pay the price. Peace comes high! Brother will deliver up brother to partisan death, and the father his child, and children will rise against parents and hound them out into the world. They will be hated of all factional legalists for his name's sake. Withdrawal, boycott, hatred and violence—these are the weapons in the sectarian arsenals. But “if they have called the master of the house Beelzebul, how much more will they malign those of his household?”

Knowing as I do that peace is destined to triumph over strife, as truth will over error, my chief concern is what I may do in the few years of my earthly sojourn to further the cause which I revere more than life. Fortunately, my course appears clear. I have no inner misgivings or forebodings, no qualms or doubts. The star by which I steer is clear before me. The compass needle of my life knows no vacillation in these days.

I conceive as my purpose the recognition, receiving and welcoming of all of God's children and my brothers, regardless of the enclosures in which they are sheltered. I do not ask them to come to me. If they allow, I will go to them, sharing and serving as I can. I will identify with all of them in Christ Jesus, but with none of their peculiar structures. That which makes us all one in him means everything to me. That which herds us into partisan corrals has no validity to my faith in Christ Jesus as my Savior and Lord. What I can hold in common with all who are in Christ—the common faith—is that for which I will contend. That which is a personal conviction about controversial matters, I shall “keep between myself and God” and not cause my brothers to stumble or be made weak.

SPECIFIC EXAMPLES

Let me be specific, since our divisions have been specific. If a congregation of saints employs instrumental music in their public praise, I will love them and respect them as my brethren. I will go among them, share with them and encourage them both to live and to walk in the Spirit.

If a congregation expresses its adoration solely in vocal music, they are my brothers and I will labor with them and assist them to “put on the Lord Jesus, and make no provision for the flesh.” But I will not go anywhere as the representative of an “instrument party” or an “anti-instrument party.” If it is a stipulation in either case that I come as a front man for one segment as opposed to the other, I will not go at all. I have rejected sectarianism, all of it, including our own. It is displeasing unto our Father. Brethren who want a sectarian to defend the party spirit must look elsewhere.

I accept all of my brothers. They did not become children of my Father by a position on music and I will not cast them out of the family on that basis. They were not begotten by a view of the instrument nor born again by a correct understanding of vocal praise. If they were good enough for the Father to grant the Spirit of adoption in spite of their ignorance and mistakes, they are not too bad for me to welcome in spite of my ignorance and mistakes. If, when my Lord comes, he wants to weed out all who sang with a piano, and all who sang four-part harmony instead of chanting as they did in the days of the apostles, that will be the divine prerogative. Meanwhile, I shall go right on loving them all, “not in word and in speech, but in deed and in truth.”

The same thing holds true for those who are separated into warring camps over what they are pleased to dub “institutionalism.” They are all my brothers. I love all of the brethren who attend Florida College, and all who teach them. I also love all of those who attend Abilene Christian College, and all who teach them. I welcome as my brothers Roy Cogdill, Cecil Willis, Yater Tant and William Wallace, “but not for disputes over opinions.” I also welcome Reuel Lemmons, B. C. Goodpasture, Guy N. Woods, and J. D. Thomas, “without attempting to settle doubtful points.”

To me none of them are “antis” and none are “liberals.” They are just persons like myself, caught up in the human predicament, and doing what they honestly think God wants them to do. I do not want to pass judgment on them. I do not want to despise them. I am not anxious to argue with any of them about their “meats” and “days.” I prefer to allow them to stand or fall to their own master. I do not want to do their thinking for them and I assure you they will not do my thinking for me!

How they regard one another, and even how they treat me, no longer has any real significance in my life. That is between them and God, not between them and me. Since the love of God was shed abroad in my heart by the Holy Spirit, I can truthfully affirm that “with me it is a very small thing that I should be judged by brethren or by any human court . . . I am not aware of anything against myself, but I am not thereby acquitted. It is the Lord who judges me.” If, in the final Great Encounter, God banishes from the glory world all who sent a dollar to the Herald of Truth or cared for fatherless children in homes with a board of trustees, I will submit to his sovereign and infinite will.

Meanwhile, I shall go on saying, “What then? Only that in every way, whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is proclaimed; and in that I rejoice.” And I will praise his name for every little distressed human waif who is fed and clothed and housed by my brethren, individually or collectively. I have my preference, of course, but I could be wrong. It would not be the first time for that, either!

It appears downright silly to me to maintain rival camps as respects the millennium. From the very outset of the restoration movement many good brethren have thought the coming of Jesus would precede the millennium. Others, who were just as sincere, thought it would be the other way around. We have always had some who interpreted certain passages literally while others regarded them metaphorically. The great majority knew very little about the matter one way or another. I do not think we really divided over the millennial issue at all. We divided when ambitious leaders, motivated by hunger for power, sought for an issue to use as a scarecrow and bugaboo.

My brethren are now, as they have always been, on both sides. I shall not allow either side to manipulate me into disregard for the other. I am not sure that I know all that Jesus will do when he comes again, but whatever it is, I want to share in it. I am not pre-millennial but pro-millennial. Whatever it is, I am for it. It is not understanding the second coming that makes one a child of God, but believing it was the Son of God who came the first time. And all of my brethren believe that, praise God!

If brethren have time to argue and fuss about what has not yet transpired, they are welcome to it. But I have no time to foster hate and animosity over such things. We are taught to comfort one another with the thought of the resurrection, not clobber one another with it. It is a pretty big task for me to fight the devil and all of his angels, and to keep them from moving in on me. I haven't the time or desire to fight my brethren over something which God will take care of at the proper time, even if I am mistaken about it. I expect to meet my Lord in the air, but I don't intend to "get up in the air" ahead of time. I am willing to wait until I'm caught up with the saints, and not get hung with them now!

THE GIFT OF TONGUES

Of course, the big hangup right now is the work of the Holy Spirit. It has created a real furor because we thought we had the Spirit bagged up and bogged down a long time ago. Not even the most optimistic prophet fifty years ago, would have been rash enough to predict that the Spirit would ever bother "the Lord's church." And now we are in a real dither. I am sorry that we are having trouble over the Holy Spirit but, viewed from one angle, it is a real sign of growth. It beats debating over such things as how to break the loaf, whether to use fermented wine in the Lord's Supper, and if women ought to be allowed to attend the business meetings.

We've finally moved out of the theological bushes and are playing in a major league park. A pretty good sprinkling of brethren testify that they became bored, bothered and bone-weary with our static and sterility and went on a spiritual safari to seek bigger game. Some of them wrestled and agonized in prayer, and as they paint the picture, suddenly found themselves uttering strange sounds without knowing what that they were doing or saying.

Such testimonies as these have caused the "Church of Christ Protective League" to go into action to "save the church." Preachers have been fired, brethren have been threatened, congregations have been split, and saints driven out of the buildings which they helped to erect. There are some disadvantages in the current outbreak. Formerly we thought of those who indulged in such things as ignorant, illiterate, over-emotional folks from across the tracks, people who lived down by the meatpacking plant. We could dismiss them with a wave of the hand when they got "hooked" and left us. They were not too bright to start with and the church would be better off without them.

But the present glossolalia crop has jerked the rug out from under us. A lot of them are graduates of "our schools" maintained to preserve the faith and to produce sound men.

Some of them have taught in the colleges. They live in beautiful homes and drive big air-conditioned cars. They fly all over the country and “give their testimony” and even fraternize with sectarians and “lesser breeds without the law.” If it is the Holy Spirit at work, he played a dirty trick on us by getting to folks with money and prestige whom we would hate to lose.

I keep getting letters from Oklahoma, Texas, California and Tennessee asking what I am going to do about it. Well, I am not going to do anything about it! If the Holy Spirit should be at work in a special way with others, I’m not going to step in and say, “Here, you can’t do that? What do you mean ruining my sermon outlines, and gumming up my past talks?” If it isn’t the Spirit at work, and the brethren are just caught up in excitement and ecstasy until they are beside themselves, they wouldn’t pay any attention to me anyhow. They’d listen and smile sweetly at my ignorance and simplicity and go right on doing their thing!

I certainly am not going to start a “Church of Christ (Tongues)” and a “Church of Christ (No Tongues).” We’ve already got a “Church of Christ (Christian)” and a “Church of Christ (Vocal Music).” That’s enough for me. It doesn’t take a whole lot of the sectarian spirit until “my cup runneth over.” I am fairly calm and pragmatic and nothing much ever happens to me, but if a brother looks me in the eye and tells me of a fantastic experience that grabbed him, I am not going to say, “Now, you know that’s a lie. Nothing like that happened to you!” I was not there and I don’t know what happened. Some pretty funny things have happened to some of my brethren, I guess.

My own purpose is to pursue “the more excellent way.” This is what Paul recommended to a congregation that was really upset by tongues. And I have quite a way to go before I fully mature in the one thing that validates all gifts and services. When one exercises the more excellent way it is no problem to receive brethren who differ with him, even about spiritual gifts. I would not think of driving out into the cold a brother who said he had an experience I have not had, and don't expect to have. My real problem is not with those who claim to speak in tongues and do not know what they are saying. My problem is with those who claim to speak English and I don't understand what they are saying.

If that which is perfect has already come (and I think it has), I will love my brethren. If it has not, I will love them until it gets here. As it is, there is a lot of difference even about what it is, but there is no difference about the need for love and tolerance. Please remember that tolerance is not endorsing anything that is wrong, but simply enduring one who thinks it is right!

The only way to cure our divisions is to resolve never to create or promote another one, and to work to eliminate those which we have inherited. "If you bite and devour one another take heed that you are not consumed by one another." Someone has to cross over all of the lines and ignore all of the factional walls. I propose to do just that. I do not intend to be bought off or frightened off. I do not mean to quit talking about the consummate folly of our present condition. I do not intend to cease urging my brethren to abandon the philosophy of divisiveness which has cursed us for a century. Those who intend to "write me up" should lay in a good supply of typewriter ribbons for they will have a lot to do. I am just getting warmed up to the task of crying out against our sectarian stance.

The way to unite is to unite! The time to do it is now! Everyone says that unity is the thing. It is the will of God. We have talked about it, discussed it and dialogued about it. Now let's do it. If we are brothers, let's show it, and let's start now. Why hold more meetings to talk about how to have unity? Why not hold one to demonstrate the unity we already have, the unity of the Spirit?

Unity is not based upon conformity but upon community in Him. Brotherhood results from a common fatherhood, fellowship from a common sonship. The only unity available to finite beings is a unity in diversity. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. There is as much variation in mental capacity and powers of rationalization as there is in facial lineaments.

It is not knowing all of the same things, but all of us knowing the same One that makes us one. It is absurd to allow our trivial arguments in the flesh to destroy the spiritual family ties. It is sinful to “set at nought a brother for whom Christ died.” I do not care what opinion that brother holds about any or all of the “issues” which we have inflated until they mean more to some of us than the cross and the blood which makes us united in Him.

I summon you to an answer to the prayer of our precious Lord as uttered on the night before His cruel death. Let us rise up now from all of the little parties and factions, and refuse any longer to be driven like dumb cattle. Let us be men, and show the world that the bond of peace is not an imaginary and visionary something but a real tie that binds. Let us preach peace to them that are afar off and to them that are nigh. Let us lose our fear of men and refuse to be manipulated as cogs in the party machines. The time has come for action. The world is waiting for our united plea! Right on!

The Happiness Pattern

Mission Messenger (November 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

The apostolic letters were not penned to produce eternal life but to inform those in Christ that they already had it. John writes, “This letter is to assure you that you have eternal life. It is addressed to those who give their allegiance to the Son of God” (1 John 5:13). Eternal life is the result of a personal relationship with the Son of God. The scriptures simply bear witness of this fact. “The witness is this: that God has given us eternal life, and that this life is found in the Son. He who possesses the Son has life indeed; he who does not possess the Son of God has not that life.”

There is as much difference between the apostolic letters and eternal life as there is between a birth certificate and physical life. No one considers that a birth certificate produces life although it bears witness to the fact that one exists. To this, the careless student objects that we are born of the word of God, and quotes, “You have been born anew, not of mortal parentage but of immortal, through the living and enduring word of God” (1 Peter 1:23).

This objection falls flat, however, when it is remembered that Peter is not talking about the letters written to the churches, but about the gospel. “And this ‘word’ is the word of the Gospel preached to you.” Certainly the epistles of Peter were not included in the word by which “God’s scattered people” (1:1) were begotten, for they already had an inheritance laid up for them in heaven before Peter ever wrote them. The letters were sent to confirm that fact.

When the term “word of God” is used with reference to birth or begetting it never refers to an apostolic epistle. All of these were written to congregations or individuals already in Christ Jesus. When Paul writes that “faith comes by hearing, and hearing by the word of God” (Romans 10:17), he did not include the Roman letter, for it was written to those who had already been justified by faith, and who had received the Spirit that made them sons and enabled them to cry, “Abba! Father!”

The very context of Romans 10 shows that faith comes by the gospel. “How could they invoke one in whom they had no faith? And how could they have faith in one they never heard of? And how hear without someone to spread the news? And how could anyone spread the news without a commission to do so? And that is what the Scriptures affirm: ‘How welcome are the feet of the messengers of good news!’ But not all have responded to the good news. For Isaiah says, Lord, who has believed our message?” We conclude that faith is awakened by the message, and the message that awakens it comes through the word of Christ.”

Alexander Campbell wrote: “We preach, or report, or proclaim news. But who teaches news? Who exhorts news? We preach the gospel to unbelievers, to aliens, but never to Christians, or those who have received it.”

A modern theologian, Alan Richardson, Canon of Durham, agrees. In his Theological Word Book of the Bible he says, “In the N. T. preaching has nothing to do with delivering sermons to the converted, which is what it usually means today, but always concerns the proclamation of the ‘good tidings of God’ to the non-Christian world. As such it is to be distinguished from teaching which in the N. T. normally means ethical instruction, or occasionally apologetics or instructions in the faith.”

The apostolic epistles do not comprise a written code. They were never intended to be a compilation of laws. They were written as love letters to “all who are dedicated to him” (2 Cor. 1:1). The purpose of the writers is carefully stated, “Do not think that we are dictating the terms of your faith; your hold on the faith is secure enough. We are working with you for your own happiness” (2 Cor. 1:24). If the apostles did not write to dictate “the terms of your faith,” on what grounds do lesser and later lights take what they wrote and try to use it for just such a purpose?

The apostolic writings are guidelines to happiness No one confuses the guide lines on the highway, provided for safety and convenience, with a statute book. It is recognized that such lines and signs are fixed by authority, by one of the higher powers. There are some no passing zones where one must never cross the center line, but in many places one must use his judgment and take the responsibility. He may “pass with caution” or “drive with moderate speed.” The good driver is one who adjusts to circumstances and conditions.

The Living Way has marked out the way for us. In most cases we must use commonsense and judgment, tempering our actions according to the needs of our brethren, and being cognizant that the eyes of the world are upon us. Some things are always wrong. Others are wrong only under certain circumstances. “Happy is the man who can make his decision with a clear conscience” (Romans 14:22). Happy, too, is the man who allows another the liberty to decide without trying to impose his own judgment and opinion upon him.

In every generation there are those who have tried to play God with the lives of other men. They have taken general passages and given them specific application, finding in them a way to condemn what they have already decided is wrong. Under the guise of promoting “holiness” they have compiled their arbitrary list of things deemed unholy in contemporary culture and measured the character of men by their own yardsticks. They have legislated where the Spirit has not and claimed infallibility for their dogmas. Nothing is more unholy than for men to exalt themselves to the position of divine interpreters of the sacred oracles.

To drive out God’s precious children because they cannot conform to partisan whims, fancies and rulings, and to elevate opinions to terms of union and communion, is to assume the role of false apostles, and not truly follow the leading of the apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ. To turn epistles of grace into a lash with which to lacerate the hearts of the brethren is not to follow the example of one who wrote, “For we are glad when we are weak and you are strong. What we pray for is your improvement.”

Our pattern is Jesus of Nazareth. The good news about Jesus leads to faith in him. That faith implies more than intellectual assent to his role in history. It is belief that he is the Messiah of the prophets, the Son of God, the Lord of life. It is not merely belief on him, or in him, but belief into him, the kind of faith which involves commitment or surrender to him who is its object.

In him is life, eternal life. In him we become partakers of that life, sharers in his life! In him we grow up, maturing in the various aspects of life. It is here the apostolic epistles fulfill their role. They were written to saints who were ignorant of how they should walk, and often to those who knew but who had become cold and careless. One does not write to his children to produce life but to show them how to have a good life. One must never confuse a recipe for happiness with the sperm from which he is begotten.

The purpose of the apostolic writings is to bring us together, to aid us in being united. “Complete my joy being of the same mind, having the same love, being in full accord, of one mind” (Phil. 2:2). “Be kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving one another, as God in Christ Jesus forgave you” (Eph. 4:32). “Mend your ways, heed my appeal, agree with one another, live in peace, and the God of love and peace be with you” (2 Cor. 13:11).

When we take the scriptures and use them as a club to batter brethren into unwilling conformity, or when we quote them to justify our separations and divisions, we misuse and abuse them. The scriptures are for all, not for a clerical power structure. Every man must be allowed to approach the word of God for himself. The Christian armor is to be worn by every soldier in the ranks and not by an elite corps of self-appointed gladiators.

One exhibits no loyalty for the word of God when he twists and wrests the scriptures to make them do what they were never intended to do. To make them into a legalistic code to stifle thought and enforce rigidity is to do despite to the grace of God. Let the revelation of heaven be what God intended it to be, the means of teaching us to glory in the cross of Christ Jesus.

Brother Thomas on Unity

Mission Messenger (November 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

All of us are aware of the fact that in the interest of truth and integrity there must come occasions when confrontation with opposing views is essential and unavoidable. One cannot go blithely sailing over the journalistic main without recognizing that there are other beats skimming the surface. We need to hear what other brethren are saying. If we disagree with it and are motivated to reply we should do so. When we do we should seek to be fair and honest in our evaluation and treatment of such views.

In the Gospel Advocate for August 6, appears an article by our esteemed brother in the Lord, J. D. Thomas, a respected member of the faculty at Abilene Christian College. We reproduce it in full so that you can peruse it in proper perspective. Our own comments and strictures will follow the article.

OBSERVATIONS ON UNITY

J. D. Thomas

Having just returned from a “Unity” meeting, and while my mind is fresh on the topic, I would like to make a few observations, and also some suggestions as to how unity may be achieved among the penitent, baptized believers in Christ.

I would define “unity” as involving “the spirit of interrelation of Christians” to the point where there would be no hesitancy in inviting a person to hold a gospel meeting for you, provided he was sufficiently capable as a preacher. To call a man “brother” in public is, of course, a certain unity, but it is too shallow a view of unity to actually be that for which we should seek whenever we have “unity meetings.” This is not the full-fellowship that is desired for God’s people. So far as I know, most of us who are now, or have ever been, true children of God admit that the penitent baptized believer is a “brother,” although we might hold back on the degree of fellowship activities we would be willing to engage in with him.

Full-fellowship to the extent that we will be willing for a person to hold a meeting for us, is impossible, as we have all recognized and practiced, without our doctrinal differences first being faced head on and cleared up point by point. This is true because the real doctrines that cause our present differences involve the actual practice of sin, as understood by those who withhold the full fellowship in each case. It is a logical impossibility for someone to decide that a given practice is no longer sinful without his having a new understanding of the matter, and having clear-cut reasons that change his understanding of the Lord’s teaching on the point.

Moving from right to left across the spectrum, we begin with the “One-Cuppers,” who believe that it is a sin for the congregation to take the fruit of the vine out of more than one container and they, therefore, practice fellowship only with those who see like they do. Only in this way can they avoid the practice of something counted to be sinful. 1 Corinthians 14:23 makes a violation of conscience to be sin, whether the thing practiced is actually sinful in God’s sight or not. So long as a man thinks that more than one container is sinful, he can do nothing else but refuse to take it in situations where many containers are used.

By the same token our “Non-Class” brethren, who have been withdrawn from by the One-Cuppers, feel that it is sinful to teach the Bible in classes in the arrangement that we ordinarily call Sunday School. As long as they feel this way, they have to withdraw themselves from those of us who have classes, or else they would be guilty of practicing that which they conscientiously believe to be sinful. It would be a sin for them to practice this while believing it to be wrong.

Again, those of us who use multiple-containers and classes, but do not use the instrument in our music, believe that it is sinful and wrong, and we have to separate ourselves from those who do use the instrument, to keep from sinning ourselves.

In all these cases everybody recognizes that each other is a child of God and therefore “brother.” But as these illustrations indicate, the more conservative brethren in each case are forced by conscience to establish their own worship and fellowship programs. They have no choice, on pain of sin.

The Independent Christian Church brethren who use the instrument, but deny the scripturalness of the Missionary Society, are also logically bound to fellowship only with people of like convictions, else they constantly will be having to fight a battle of compromise with something that they definitely count sinful. Again, the brethren who accept the instrument and the Missionary Society, but who believe the Bible to be the infallible and inerrant word of God and their only rule of faith and practice, have to withdraw themselves from the extreme liberal Disciples who have been affected by modernism to the extent that they no longer get their authority for their faith and practice only from the written word.

To get all of these brethren into a single, real fellowship is going to require the working out of all these differences of understanding, and for each man who has an erroneous belief there must come a change of conviction before we could have real unity.

We already have a fellowship in the sense of “calling one another brother,” but this is not fellowship in the Bible sense. It is not really being one in the sense for which Jesus prayed. Unity meetings ought to seek, therefore, to go “to the teaching and to the testimony” (Isa. 8:20) and to work out in a careful and prayerful way a clear understanding of the real will of God upon the point at issue. There is in all this no place for an ugly spirit or anything other than deep “love of the brethren” to motivate us in our relations with one another. “Let love be without hypocrisy.”

Too often brethren are disposed to sow seeds of discord, to judge the motives of others, and to believe half-truths and innuendoes. Possibly we get anxious to tear down a fellow preacher and his influence because of our own inferiority complex, thinking that if we can tear him down we ourselves will look better by comparison. This is another one of Satan’s fallacies, but it has probably caused many preachers to act in a way that will bring condemnation in the judgment. Above all we need to learn to truly love one another, and to realize that we are all on the same team— fighting Satan. It is nothing less than stupid for us to fight one another, as well as being sinful.

In a following article we hope to give the benefit of a lesson from J. W. McGarvey which we feel will be relevant as we meditate upon the right and the wrong of these points of doctrine.

REPLY TO THE ABOVE

Although Brother Thomas, at the outset, proposes to make “some suggestions as to how unity may be achieved,” he utterly fails to do so. Instead, his article is an apologetic for division. It is a clear-cut statement of that legalistic attitude which may best be designated as Church of Christism. It was this very attitude which created our divisions in the first place and has perpetuated them ever since. So long as it is maintained unity will be an empty dream, a vision of sheer vanity.

Our brother begins with his definition of unity. It is wholly without scriptural basis. He concocts it out of thin air, and having offered such an evanescent presentation he proceeds as if everyone will acknowledge its validity. He is doomed to disappointment. To him, unity is “the spirit of interrelation of Christians to the point where there would be no hesitancy in inviting a person to hold a meeting for you, provided he was sufficiently capable as a preacher.”

Where did the Holy Spirit ever define unity in such terms? Which one of the apostles ever described it in such fashion? Can the prayer of God’s Son be paraphrased to read, “Neither pray I for these alone, but for all them which shall believe on me through their word, that they all may be one to the point where there would be no hesitancy in inviting one to hold meetings for them”? Even the most casual and uncritical student of the scriptures should realize that “inviting a person to hold a gospel meeting for you,” has absolutely no relation to the prayer which our Savior offered. Unity in Christ involves Jew and Greek, bond and free, male and female. So Paul said, and so I believe. Is our brother not going to share “the spirit of interrelation of Christians” with our good sisters in Christ? He’d better pray that the Women’s Liberation Movement stays out of Texas.

If unity begins at the point of no hesitancy, then there is no unity of the Spirit while brethren are making up their minds whether they should invite a brother to hold a gospel meeting. What designation is bestowed upon “the spirit of interrelation of Christians” up to this point? Suppose that half of the congregation were willing to call a man for a meeting, and the other half hesitated. Would there be unity between the preacher and the half who wanted to invite him? If so, would there be unity between this half and the hesitants? Brother Thomas now has us in a real mess. In making “some suggestions as to how unity may be achieved,” he has laid a foundation for splitting congregations over inviting preachers to hold gospel meetings. He will not be able to get a “patent” on this invention of his. A lot of congregations have been dividing over that very thing for years.

Why did our brother take this tangent? He had to do so. We must not forget that he is a leader in a party or faction within the restoration movement which is very reactionary against the fellowship of all God’s precious children. I know just how he feels. I was once in the same boat, or rather in a different boat on the same pond. It is imperative that he define unity in such a manner as to make it impossible to have it. The barriers must be kept up to prevent the walls of exclusiveness from eroding away. If he would define unity in scriptural terms he would be forced to admit that it was not something we achieved at all. It is the result of the indwelling Spirit. Every person in whom the Spirit dwells is united to Christ, and through him to every other person who is in Christ. Our job is not to achieve unity but to enjoy it, and endeavor to keep it in the bond of peace. If he wrote that way the Gospel Advocate would not publish it!

Our brother is eminently correct in saying that merely calling a man “brother” in public, is too shallow. But really loving and treating all of God’s children as brothers, both publicly and privately, is not so shallow. It can run deep! And since Brother Thomas admits that every penitent baptized believer is a brother, we commend this course to him. Brotherhood results from a common fatherhood. When I disdain or “set at nought a brother” for whom Christ died— any brother— I reflect against the Father. Paternity makes fraternity possible. If one is good enough for the Father to adopt as a child, he ought not to be too bad for me to accept as a brother, whether he holds meetings or doesn’t.

is clear proof that he is not dealing with fellowship on a scriptural basis. Like so many others, he probably has it confused with endorsement. They are not the same at all. Fellowship is a state or relationship into which we are called by God (1 Cor. 1:9). It is the sharing of the common life of the Spirit. Endorsement is an act of one's own mind in sanctioning a practice or thing. There is no "half-fellowship" because there are no half-brothers or stepchildren in the family. To use the term "full fellowship" is to employ an expression without scriptural warrant.

In true legalistic fashion it is said, "Full-fellowship to the extent that we will be willing for a person to hold a meeting for us, is impossible, as we have all recognized and practiced, without our doctrinal differences first being faced head on and cleared up point by point." Please do not think that I am rude and uncivil when I say this is sheer poppycock. Our good brother is farther "back in the woods" than I thought. He is still living in the nineteenth century with its factional fights, fusses and feuds. I have been invited to hold meetings for Disciples of Christ who believe that the word of God is our rule of faith and practice, for Independent Christian Churches, pre-millennial congregations, one-cup congregations, anti-Sunday School congregations, and even congregations where they would invite Brother Thomas. In all of these places we knew that we disagreed upon many things. We found our oneness in Christ Jesus. We were resolved that we would permit none of our differences to mean more to us than the relationship purchased by his wonderful blood. We allowed grace to cover our divergent views and met at the cross. It is a little ridiculous to postulate that we can never work together in our blessed Lord until we resolve every trivial action of every faction and settle every schism of every sect.

Brother Thomas engages in a dangerous practice when he starts calling the roll of our little segments and analyzing their position. One always reveals his own inconsistency when he plays this game. Our brother places those who use one container in distributing the fruit of the vine on the far right. He calls them “One-Cuppers.” But whether they are on the right or left has nothing to do with where they are standing. It is determined by the direction Brother Thomas is facing. If he turns around the Disciples of Christ will be on his right. Obviously, he thinks he is in the center. So does everyone else. We are all “centrists” when we are doing the talking. But that means there are some on the right of Brother Thomas and some on the left of him. He is like the Light Brigade in the poem. You will recall that they got wiped out!

His point is that those who use only one container believe he is sinning because he uses individual cups. But Brother Thomas does not believe he is sinning. If he did he would ditch the cups. The same thing holds true with reference to Sunday School classes. He is not going to allow himself to be judged by those on the right as to what is sin for him. But Brother Thomas is to the right of the brethren who use instrumental music and he is going to judge it is a sin for them. The fact is that the whole burden of his essay is that there will be no unity until everyone sees everything just as he does.

There will be a lot of protesting about this but that is exactly what it amounts to. Brother Thomas is not about to give up cups and classes so those who use them can be united with his party. The only way they can have unity is to admit they were wrong in making a test of fellowship out of such things and come and join Brother Thomas. By the same token, and on the other side of the spectrum, as he puts it, those who use instruments must admit they are sinful, and come and join Brother Thomas. This means our unity is not in Christ’s redemptive act but in Brother Thomas’ expository ability.

Our brethren who are riding in his partisan vehicle are going to be the sole judges of what is opinion for everyone else and of what is faith for themselves. It is this very spirit of dogmatism which shattered a noble unity movement and smashed and splintered it into smithereens. So our brother is actually continuing a plea for division. He is not really pleading for unity at all!

His reference to 1 Corinthians 14:23 is unfortunate for his thesis. That chapter was inserted to show that we must receive and welcome one another in spite of our differences. If our brother believes the teaching of the chapter why does he not keep his “faith” about the instrument to himself? Why does he judge his brethren who use it? Why does he set at nought these brethren? Why does he seek to have dominion over their faith? Why does he try to destroy those for whom Christ died? Why does he not let them stand or fall to their own master? Is he endeavoring to judge another man’s servant?

I emphatically deny that it is going to require the working out of all of these differences of understanding to get all of our brethren into a single, real fellowship. The apostolic letter to Corinth is stark proof of the utter fallacy of such a position. Were the brethren at Corinth not in a single real fellowship? In spite of their schisms, their mistaken views, their doctrinal errors, and their messed up lives, the apostle said, “Surely you know that you are God’s temple, where the Spirit of God dwells” (1 Cor. 3:16). He wrote, “Now you are Christ’s body, and each of you a limb or organ of it” (12:27). Can you think of a better example of “a single, real fellowship” than a body?

If Brother Thomas had been at Corinth he would only have aggravated their state. They had some brethren who had “been so accustomed to idolatry that even now they eat food with a sense of its heathen consecration, and their conscience is polluted by the eating.” They had others in the congregation who said there was “no resurrection of the dead.” Paul did not tell them that it was “going to require a working out of all those differences of understanding” to get them all into a single, real fellowship. Instead, he said, “God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord.” That is a single fellowship, since there is one Lord. It is real! Praise God!

Our brother asserts that for each man who has an erroneous belief “there must come a change of conviction before we can have real unity.” The catch in this is that Brother Thomas does not think he has any erroneous beliefs. He thinks everyone else has. The brethren who make a test of fellowship out of cups, classes, and such things, all have erroneous beliefs. The brethren who use instrumental music also have an erroneous belief. All of these must have a change of conviction, that is, they must see things like Brother Thomas does in order to have real unity. But no one has a more erroneous belief than does our good brother himself. He needs to change his conviction about what constitutes real unity. There is where the real problem lies.

What he is advocating is that the body of Christ has to be fractured, split and shivered, over sin by definition. Let me explain. God does not say that employing multiple containers in the Lord’s Supper is a sin. Those who think that Brother Thomas is sinning in this regard, postulate sin by human definition— their definition. God does not say that teaching the word in classes is a sin. Those who think that Brother Thomas is sinning in this regard, postulate sin by human definition— their definition. God does not say that using an instrument is a sin. Brother Thomas thinks those who do so are sinning by definition — his definition. It is not that they violate God’s directive. They just do not respect Brother Thomas’ deduction.

These brethren propose to read and interpret God’s word for themselves on musical praise, as Brother Thomas does on cups and classes. They respect God’s revelation but deplore Brother Thomas’ explanation. They feel that the word of God can be read as well in Abilene, Kansas, as in Abilene, Texas. If Brother Thomas in his observations on unity represents the thinking of the administration and faculty at Abilene Christian College, that school is set to encourage strife and schism, and promote division instead of dialogue. The brightest spot in the whole mess is that a lot of students no longer fall for the kind of thinking our brother projects. I happen to know a number of them who are sick and tired of the artificial walls which have perpetuated senseless strife in the majestic family of our God. They are full up with the narrow and intolerant attitude upon which we have thrived in the “desert.”

I have a deep compassion for men like Brother Thomas. They are on the spot. “The eyes of Texas are upon them!” It is hard to play the game when the signals are being called by the spectators. I commend very highly the spirit exhibited in the last two paragraphs of our brother’s article. He is right when he says, “It is nothing less than stupid for us to fight one another, as well as its being sinful.” It is also stupid for us to perpetuate division and schism.

I am in the fellowship with Brother Thomas. I am also in the fellowship with brethren who oppose cups and classes, and with those who condone the use of instrumental music. I will help any of them, share with them, and labor with them when they will allow. The relationship which we have in Christ is worth more to me than the peculiarities of any of those who are in him.

Irrelevant Antagonism

Mission Messenger (November 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“For he reconciled both to God by the sacrifice of one body on the cross, and by this act made utterly irrelevant the antagonism between them” (Ephesians 2:16).

The both mentioned here includes Jew and Gentile. Between them there had existed deep hostility. The nature of it was such that no purely human power could overcome it. It was augmented by national pride, prompting each to regard the other with ill-concealed contempt. The passage of time had only served to imbed it more deeply in each succeeding generation. By the time of Jesus it was a festering sore, an open ulcer in the social tissue.

Jesus did not heal it by insisting that one move over and become like the other. The Jew did not have to give up being a Jew and become a Gentile. The Gentile did not have to become a Jew. The circumcised remained in his circumcision; the uncircumcised in his uncircumcision. The real problem was not their relationship to one another, but their relationship to God. The way they regarded each other was simply a reflection of the way they stood with reference to God. Their hostility to one another was a symptom of a deeper malignancy.

Jesus did not try to unite them to one another for to bring together hostile forces is simply to precipitate conflict. What he did was to reconcile them both to God. The Jew was reconciled to God and so was the Gentile. Such reconciliation freed them both from a guilt complex. It lifted the burden of sin and made possible a sense of security which could not be threatened by any external force. In God there is no national or sectarian rivalry, no conflict of interests. God is love. Thus there is no need for ambitious strife, no clamoring for advantage.

This state was achieved by the sacrifice of one body on the cross. One body was sacrificed for both Jew and Gentile. There was not one body for the Jew and another for the Gentile. The same body made reconciliation for both. If the Jew claimed reconciliation at all it had to be by the same body as the Gentile recognized. Since both were reconciled by one body, as reconciled ones they had to be in one body.

So the cross was the instrument of reconciliation. And the cross is a monument to man's weakness and futility. It is the "final solution" to the problem of disunity and disharmony. Thus the cross is superior to any system or method of man. It is the only creed available to those who labor in conjunction with heaven's purpose to bring about unity in the universe. If anything else could produce harmony the cross would not be needed. To acknowledge the cross is to acknowledge its transcendence, and to derogate everything else.

The cross is the place where one act made irrelevant the antagonism between bitter rivals. It is stupid for two men in death row awaiting execution to engage in fisticuffs over the relative merits of their political parties. Of what avail is it to two famished souls struggling across a trackless desert to come to blows over their understanding of a problem in mathematics. Measured by the circumstance of Calvary all else is rendered insignificant. It is meaningless.

The cross is the answer to all partisan hostility. And the fact that it could unite such divergent elements as Jew and Gentile provides hope for removing all other barriers. None of our partisan problems can even begin to approximate in severity that which separated Jew and Gentile. If that schism could be healed all lesser breaches can be bridged. Our “circumcision” today takes many forms. Circumcision, in principle, is anything external which is less than the cross but is the ground of such pride as to make the cross seem inferior. It is anything in which man trusts as a symbol of his covenant relationship with God.

Such “circumcision” automatically renders everyone who does not trust in such a condition of rightness as uncircumcised. It places him outside the pale. It makes him a member of a rival tribe, an object of hostility. So long as men glory in externals, in that which they perform in Christ as a criterion of faithfulness, the cross is made of none effect. The circumcision will create alienation and nullify the purpose of the cross. It will cause men to forget grace and attempt to be justified by law.

THE POWER OF THE CROSS

Once the meaning of the cross breaks into the human heart and enlightens the mind, it is seen that neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision. One becomes part of a new humanity. He does not turn over a new leaf but is turned over to a new life. He no longer walks in legal justification. So long as man trusts in law as the basis of his hope others will be regarded as “lesser breeds without the law.” It makes no difference whether the law is humanly contrived or divinely revealed. It is the very nature of law to divide. It will create a wall whether written by the finger of God or by the hands of men.

At the cross every man is seen for what he is. Here he is stripped of all externals. He is made naked and open unto the eyes of him with whom we have to do. He is revealed as helpless and hopeless, unable to keep law perfectly and abjectly in need of coming within “the circle of God’s love.” Here his little mental meanderings, his rationalizations, his cute little complex schemes of doctrinal orthodoxy are shown to be cobweb ladders which he has built to try and achieve reconciliation, always too short, always ineffective. He cannot even attain to his own ideals.

The cross changes all of this. The blood of Jesus nullifies it. But it is accomplished, not by altering circumcision or uncircumcision, but by elevating our relationship to a wholly different plane. Those who continue to argue about the relative merits of their “circumcision” demonstrate that they have not grasped grace nor seen the salvation which is in him.

The cross does not make us alike. It does not alter externals. We continue in circumcision, or uncircumcision. We are simply reconciled to God and our being right or wrong about every point of doctrine has nothing to do with it. This does not produce the shared life. “But even though we were dead in our sins God, who is rich in mercy, because of the great love he had for us, gave us life together with Christ— it is, remember, by grace and not by achievement you are saved— and has lifted us right out of the old life to take our place with him in Christ Jesus in the Heavens.”

Think of this. It is not by our achievement, intellectually, mentally, or morally. We are given life together with Christ. Given it! We did not earn it. We did not deserve it. It did not come through our intelligence or power. Man can no more lift himself by his own bookstraps than by his own bootstraps. It is at once apparent that this puts a different face on the whole matter of our relationship to each other.

We no longer receive one another because of attainment or achievement. The question is no longer how one stands on this or that, or what his views are on one point or another. The question now is whether one has been lifted right out of the old life to take his place in Christ Jesus. If one is in Christ, if he has been given life together with Christ, this is the ultimate criterion. If he has not he can be right about everything else and still be lost. All of his attainments about which he boasts are symptoms of vain pride.

Obviously it is good to be right on as many things as possible. To be correct is infinitely better than to be mistaken. Facts at the fingertip are manifestly superior to guesses at the mental gate. No one desires to be voluntarily ignorant but knowledge may puff up rather than build up, and man is expected to be a babe in Christ, not a balloon. But this has nothing to do with our reconciliation. The apostle says, "No one can pride himself upon earning the love of God."

What this does, then, is to make "utterly irrelevant the antagonism between us." Antagonism is not necessarily irrelevant under a legalistic system. It is the nature of law to create such. Legal arguments belong to law, gracious acceptance belongs to grace. It is unthinkable that Jesus would make antagonism irrelevant between Jew and Gentile to bring them together and then make relevant antagonism between them to divide and fragment them.

The party spirit operates to produce conformity, the Holy Spirit to encourage community. The party spirit begins with recrimination, the Holy Spirit with reconciliation. The party spirit makes antagonism inevitable, the Holy Spirit makes it irrelevant. If we are to be workers together with God we must help men see the cross purpose of God and cease to be at cross purposes with one another.

We are reconciled by one act. The parable of the prodigal is a good illustration. He was not welcomed by the father because of his knowledge. He was ignorant of many things with relation to the father's house. In that respect he was far behind his older brother. But he was reconciled by a single act. He came to the father. He may have become a problem at home after his return because of his ignorance of what had transpired while he was away. But he had been lost and now he was found. He had been dead but now he was alive. It would be tragic if, like the older brother, we should continue our antagonism which has been rendered irrelevant by the one great fact of our reconciliation to the Father.

No Human Invention

Mission Messenger (November 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“The gospel I preach to you is no human invention. No man gave it to me, no man taught it to me; it came as a direct revelation from Jesus Christ” (Galatians 1:11-12).

The credibility attached to this statement of the apostle Paul, insofar as the origin of the gospel is concerned, is dependent upon the degree of veracity we assign to him. We cannot prove that no man gave him the gospel. We only have his word for it. If we believe that he told the truth we will believe that the gospel came to him by direct revelation. If we regard Paul as a mystic or visionary, and a lot of modern critics do, we will probably doubt the divine source of his message.

It is observable that Paul left no room for compromise. The gospel is either a human invention or a direct revelation from Jesus Christ. Men will react toward the gospel exactly as they regard one or the other of these as its source. If they accept it as a divine and direct revelation from Jesus Christ it will have authority over their lives which will change them according to its terms. If it is regarded as a mere human philosophy it will provide the subject for endless debate but not for endless life.

While we cannot prove that Paul was correct in his statement, we can certainly prove that he believed what he said was true. He endured beatings and floggings, was stoned and shipwrecked, imprisoned and jailed, all for the sake of the gospel. He said, "I have known exhaustion, pain, long vigils, hunger and thirst, doing without meals, cold and lack of clothing." One does not undergo such agony willingly for a mere concoction of human rationalization. But my confidence that the gospel did not originate with men is not dependent upon the testimony of a man, not even that of the great apostle Paul. I respect his word and believe what he said about the source of his message. But I do not hinge my whole faith, as to the authorship of the gospel, upon his word. Instead, I hold that the real proof is inherent in the message. It is not human testimony as to the source, but the nature of the gospel which proves that it is no human invention.

It runs counter to all that men would devise if they were arrogant enough to attempt a plan for universal redemption. Men begin with those of humble parentage and create heroes of them who may be elevated as gods. But the gospel begins with one who was God, emptying himself, and adopting the nature of a slave. It is distinctly said that "he made himself of no reputation." It seems that he deliberately chose a course which placed obstacles in the path of belief, and of course the reason is that he wanted to attract followers by no superficial appeal or secondary attraction. Think of but a few of the ways by which he made himself of no reputation.

1. The circumstance of his birth. By being born of a virgin, an unmarried Jewish peasant girl, he became a stumblingblock in all ages to the coldly intellectual world.

2. The place of birth. He entered the world in the stable of an inn in an obscure village in a remote province of the Roman Empire. He was wrapped in swaddling-cloths and placed in a manger where homage was paid to him only by "certain poor shepherds."

3. The boyhood home. He grew up in Nazareth which was in Galilee, a province inhabited by warlike zealots whom George Adam Smith described as “volcanic.” W. E. Vine writes, “To say the least, the Galileans were the object of contempt owing to their lack of culture, their rude dialect and their association with Gentiles.” Nathaniel, who became a devoted follower, was hesitant at first to approach Jesus because he asked, “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?”

4. The choice of disciples. For ambassadors to an alien world Jesus selected what might have been termed a motley crew. There were fishermen from Galilee, a socially outcast publican, a member of the Zealot political party, and one who was a thief from the beginning.

5. The daily companions. Jesus associated with those “on the wrong side of the tracks.” He was stigmatized as a friend of publicans and sinners, and was branded as a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. He suggested as one mark of his identity that “the poor have the gospel preached unto them.”

6. The manner of death. This was the crucial test. The Jews regarded as under a curse those who died upon a tree, while others regarded crucifixion as reserved for the lowest and vilest of criminals. The offense of the cross has not ceased even yet.

I believe that the whole scheme of redemption is of divine origin and that it bears the imprint of the divine mind upon its very face. The gospel is not merely words announced to us, but a life shared with us. Jesus is the Good News of God to a dying world, because it is in him that life resides, and that life is the light of the world. This is my story, this is my song!

Miracle at the Pool

Mission Messenger (December 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

It is a refreshing experience to retrace the steps of Jesus, and especially to seek from the narratives of his earth visit the motives which prompted him to do what he did. I am quite convinced that he was always conscious that he was doing the work of the Father, so I know what God wants his sons to do by observing what his Son did.

I do not imply that we are expected to perform dynamic works which cut across the whole realm of nature. The “greater works” which are laid upon us are not in the domain of the material, for in this area no one can exceed his feat of raising the dead. So magnificent was it that his own resurrection was given as proof of his divinity. Our greater works lie in the area of human nature and its transformation, and we are to walk among men as those who were dead but are alive again. If you have no consciousness of walking in newness of life it is because you never really died.

At the same time I have no intellectual problems with the miracles of Jesus. I would have problems with Jesus if it were not for his miracles. What he did to attest his deity is exactly what I would expect of one who claimed to face a skeptical world as the Son of God. Those poor souls who are always talking about the problems raised by miracles put their mental finger on the wrong sore spot. Their problem is with God, not with his alleged acts. When they get their directional finders tuned in the right direction they will cease to be troubled by distorted images of infinity.

It will help us to remember that it was as natural for Jesus to do mighty works as it would appear supernatural to us. But the reason for doing certain acts may make them all the more appealing. For instance, there was the case of healing which took place in one of the colonnades at the Sheep-Pool in Jerusalem. I am intrigued by it because here there came together all of the forces of life— religious ritualism, human misery, superstition, compassion and legalism. The fascinating account of it will be found in John 5.

Jesus had gone up to Jerusalem for one of the Jewish festivals. We do not know which one, and it is not important. Certainly he was at the temple where rigid ceremonial formulae were carried out in meticulous detail by the professional priesthood. There would be the robed choir, the burning of incense, the formal priestly prayers and all of the liturgical elements which made the occasion impressive with external pomp and glory.

From all of this Jesus turned away, escaping to go to the Sheep-Pool. It is most likely that the pool was near the Sheep-Gate in the northern suburb, part of the tangle of shops, bazaars, and workmen's stalls, where the mob pushed and shoved, and polyglot voices were heard lifted in raucous shout. The pool was enclosed with five porches. It was known as Bethesda, place of mercy or healing.

When Jesus visited it he was in the midst of squalid misery. A great crowd of sick people, blind, lame and paralyzed, filled the porches. A superstitious tradition held that at intervals an angel came down unseen and caused the water to bubble up, and whoever was fortunate enough to first fling himself into the pool when the agitation began would be healed. There is, in the hearts of the grievously smitten, an inclination to try anything that even remotely holds forth hope. So the multitude remained there in their tragic condition.

While the agitation of the water was obviously from physical causes, we need not question that psychosomatics were healed, and every such case of relief for an overwrought imagination brought hope to the others. It is significant that Jesus left the glitter and unreality which characterized the temple a few blocks south and turned toward the suffering and ignorant multitude, where groans and wails rent the air in piteous appeals for help. He came to share the lot of the helpless.

It was the sabbath day. At the temple, visitors and rabbis from all over the world of the Mediterranean would be talking about how the sabbath must be kept to please God. It had already been decided that one could not wipe away the blood or pus exuding from a wound, for that would be work. Nor could he stop the flow of liquid from a cask by picking up a little piece of wax to plug up the hole. He might not gargle a liquid for the sore throat unless he swallowed it. And on and on, multiplying the technicalities, while a short distance away people were contorted in pain and suffering untold agony of the flesh.

Jesus saw a man who had been a cripple for thirty-eight years, and watching him as he lay on his pallet, he asked him, "Do you want to recover?" This was not a silly question. Not at all! Many who have suffered from a lengthy illness really glory in it. Unable to secure attention in any other way, and suffering from an inferiority complex, sickness becomes the means of gratifying ego. People come to see you, to sympathize with you, to make over you! And you can always escape some of the responsibilities of life.

I am thinking of two women as I write. A number of years ago, one of these discovered that through fancied illness she could bind her family to her as slaves. She began to project the most frightening diseases in her troubled mental state and warped convictions. Not only has she withdrawn a life from service that could have been useful but she has made life miserable for others about her. Sickness is her weapon, her shield and buckler!

The other thrills at being asked how she is feeling. It provides a glorious opportunity to run down the catalogue of aches and pains, reciting them off to each enquirer like items on a grocery list. When I saw what her trouble was I decided upon a different approach. I walk up to her smilingly, and say, "My, I hope you are feeling half as well as you look!" I am not sure she really likes me any longer. Professional invalids are like other professionals. They resent it when they are not given an opportunity to exhibit in the field in which they excel through long practice. I ought to be ashamed, I know, but nothing is funnier than two hypochondriacs meeting in the aisle of a supermarket and starting to play cards, using their ailments in an attempt to trump each other. Come right down to it, there are a lot of people who do not want to recover. They would have to "complain of feeling better."

The cripple answered Jesus like many cripples react. He ignored the question and began an explanation of why he remained in his present condition. He was very polite and almost coldly formal with this enquiring stranger. "Sir," he replied, "I have no one to put me in the pool when the water is disturbed, but while I am moving, someone else is in the pool before me." I can almost hear the half-apologetic tone used in the explanation.

Jesus said, "Rise to your feet, take up your bed, and walk!" The man looked at Jesus and Jesus was looking at him and through him. Without the least bit of hesitancy the man got to his feet, rolled up his pallet, put it on his shoulder and started for home. But he had hardly gotten started when he ran into some folk "coming home from church," as we so quaintly say. They were incensed at such brazen disrespect for a holy day.

“Hey there, you! Who do you think you are? This is the Sabbath. You are not allowed to lug a bed on the Sabbath.” The former cripple, now walking sprightly along, and anxious to get home and surprise the folks, stopped. He said, “The man who cured me told me to take up my bed and walk, so I took it up and I am walking.” A crowd began to gather. And a number of them asked at once, “Who told you to take up your bed and walk?” They did not ask who had healed him after thirty-eight years of crippling patalysis. That was secondary. The big interest was the identity of any person with the audacity to tell a man to carry his bed home on the Sabbath. What would the world come to if former cripples did such things?

The man did not know who cured him. Later on Jesus saw him in the temple and slipped up to his side and spoke to him. The man then went and informed the Jews who had healed him. John tells us that, “it was works of this kind done on the Sabbath that stirred the Jews to persecute Jesus.” They resolved to kill him because he not only broke the sabbath, “but, by calling God his own Father, he claimed equality with God.”

Did Jesus break the law of God? Did he teach men to do so? It will probably help us to understand why he did not if we remember the very basis upon which God provided law for man. The Pharisees forgot this and were led to the worship of law rather than to the worship of God. Law had two purposes. First, it was to serve the needs of mankind and provide for human wellbeing. Second, it was to bring men to Christ. It was to act as a guardian until faith arrived and a custodian was no longer required.

Jesus said, “Man was not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath for man.” God was not interested in days but in men. Man was not intended to be a slave of the sabbath regulation but the sabbath was intended to provide rest and relaxation for man. When Jesus faced the conflict between a crippled man and a code of laws, the human need took precedence. It was the superior value. In healing the lame man Jesus provided for him rest, comfort and freedom from suffering which had been denied him for thirty-eight years. And this is what the sabbath was all about.

But those who were specialists in lawkeeping as a way of life obscured the human need. Relief of suffering was not nearly so important as obeying a command. The chief aim of men should be to discuss, debate, argue and reason about how the law could be made more binding. The details must be supplied. There must be rules and regulations to protect the law which is to fence in the people. There is no end to this kind of authoritarianism, once it is started. The powers that be (rabbis, popes, elders and ministers) rule upon each new item and factor, and the rule of man must be acknowledged as the rule of God. Soon the web is so great that man becomes helpless in its strands and meshes. Then he either drops out, or drops in and tunes out, in order to survive and keep a little of his sanity.

The contrast between Jesus and the temple priests was amazing. Jesus sought how to help a man recover and live. They sought how they might kill Jesus and stop him from living. Never let us forget that legalism and casuistry are members of the same family. The last is the offspring of the first. The legalist can always interpret the law so as to get away with murder. Life is cheap to a legalist. Human values are far down the scale. Men exist only to keep the law alive, even if they themselves die in the attempt. They must live by the law if it kills them! And it is true that the letter killeth!

Religion is life! It is not a code unloaded from above, but a life shared from above. It is a life of service. There is no other way to serve God than by serving men made in God's image. If you overlook this fact, you will end up degrading yourself and those who are helpless, by helping them for religion's sake. Your alms will become "sucker bait." Your charity will be a part of your sectarian propaganda. Your good deeds will become commodities for swapping and trading for names on the church record. This makes needy men mere things, pawns in a power struggle, persons who are helped on a commercial basis and not out of sheer compassion.

The tragedy of this is that it makes hypocrites out of us. We claim a concern for suffering humanity, but after helping them awhile, if they do not respond and attend our meetings and become “identified” with our roster, we cut them off, and consider that the help extended did not pay off. The problem is that we are still in the temple and not in the market-place or the gates.

We do not help people simply so they can live, but so we can live. By giving a poor unfortunate despondent cripple a happy sabbath, Jesus gave himself one. He proved that he was the Son of God by working like the Father worked. And that is the only way we can show that we are the sons of God. Let men gather to argue, fight and debate over the trivia, but let us look for the Sheep-Pools of the inner city. Let us do it, for God’s sake! As James puts it, “The religion that is unstained and untarnished in God’s sight is to go and relieve the needs of widows and fatherless children and to keep from becoming contaminated in daily contact with the world.”

These Tremendous Issues

Mission Messenger (December 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

It has been said that you can judge the caliber of a man by the things at which he laughs. I suspect that it is equally true that character is revealed by what it takes to make us weep. And by the same token, the greatness or littleness of a religious movement may be determined by the things with which its membership is preoccupied in a time of distress and in a world at crisis.

Despite the unfavorable light in which the Earth is placed as man becomes ever more familiar with the other planets, it still remains that, insofar as human knowledge goes, it was central in the divine purpose. It was to this fly-speck rotating in the galaxies of infinity that the Word came, clothed in flesh, to share the common lot. This was the terminus of the light beam of Love, the transforming dynamic of the universe. This is the visited planet. Here redeeming Grace found shelter and reconciliation reversed the tide of what, in our human predicament, we call history.

The human mind, beset by the limitations of time and space, is staggered when it seeks to grasp the majesty with which God invests the eternal plan for our return to the divine-human relationship which was broken and shattered by sin. In our finitude we can never fully embrace it. Our words are too meager, our syllables too simple for such a tremendous task.

Yet, the apostle Paul, that remarkable symbol of God's transcending concern, leads us close enough that we may touch the hem of the garment. In no place do I come closer than in the first thirteen verses of chapter three of the letter to the Ephesians.

Of course, when we talk about chapters and verses, we speak of something of which the apostle knew nothing. Chapters are the slices we have made to enhance our serving of the bread of life, and verses are the bites into which we have carved them. Sometimes they make our mastication difficult, having been cut across the grain. Perhaps that is why, at this particular juncture, I like best the translation by J. B. Phillips, that inimitable purveyor of inestimable treasure wrapped up in the commonplace folds of the daily newspaper. The particular volume which lies before me as I write is divided into paragraphs with no stakes driven down at intervals to create a numerical obstacle course.

I should like to share with you some of the magnetic truths which seem to leap from the page and burn their way into my consciousness. Paul begins with mention of the great cause which resulted in his imprisonment, and defines it as being related to the Gentiles. He regards his call to serve them as a distinct manifestation of grace, and is thrilled by the fact that God has inducted him into the divine mystery, the superlative secret of the ages, opening the door to it with the key of revelation.

This secret was maintained inviolate in the vaults of heaven, hidden from the prying eyes and longing hearts of every generation of the past. Now it has been made known through the agency of the Holy Spirit. God's chosen envoys and prophets are the recipients of a plain declaration. For them the veil has been lifted, the enshrouding darkness has turned to light.

And what is the noble secret? Are you ready for it? Then, hear the apostle: "It is simply this: that the Gentiles who were previously excluded from God's agreements, are to be equal heirs with his chosen people, equal members and equal partners in God's promises given by Christ through the gospel." Does that leave you untouched? Does it provide a "let-down?" Then you have not begun to grasp the eternal plan for the unity of all things in the universe in Christ Jesus.

The mystery unfolded is the end of ethnic, racial, social and national barriers. It is an announcement that the war is over. Hate has been dethroned. Selfishness is revealed as a blatant usurper. There is no other side of the tracks. The tracks have been removed. There is no wall of separation and segregation. The wall has been broken down. Former outcasts are now in camp, former outlaws are caught up in love and life, equal heirs and equal partners.

What is mysterious about it? The answer is simple. The way it was achieved. It was not by conformity. The circumcised did not become uncircumcised. The uncircumcised did not become circumcised. The wall was between them and the wall was broken down. And there they were, no longer apart, but seeing each other face to face. Blood washed away the barrier. It brought together those who were alienated. Paul says that the incalculable riches of Christ were opened up for all (not just one race) to share. That is the mystery!

THE ROLE OF ANGELS

He declares. "The purpose is that all the angelic powers should now see the complex wisdom of God's plan being worked out through the Church, in conformity to that timeless purpose which he centered in Christ Jesus, our Lord." Angels were not in on the secret. They were interested in it and sought to peer into these things. But they had no revelation just as the angels that sinned had no Saviour. Revelation was for men and so was the Savior.

The only way that the angels could grasp God's "complex plan" is to see it worked out in the community of saints. The community of the reconciled ones is God's university for angels. It is their only opportunity to fathom the purpose which was hidden from ages and generations. The angels have their eyes upon us to see how diverse elements can be united in one body by the cross in spite of their diversity.

So the apostle continues: "In view of these tremendous issues, I beg you not to lose heart because I am now suffering for my part in bringing you the gospel." I like that! I am attracted to it again and again! Great issues demand great sacrifices. The freeing of the mystery may require the imprisonment of the minister. We must never lose heart if the messenger forfeits his liberty that the message may go forth unfettered. The bodies of men can be cast into prison but the body of Christ cannot be. The Word of God is not bound! It is as free as the Spirit.

These tremendous issues. How they shame us for the trivia which we exalt above the cross. How they make our little debates and arguments and wrangles so unimportant and inconsequential. The mystery of the ages is the gathering into one body of variegated elements and welding them into an indissoluble unity of the Spirit. God have mercy upon those who fly in the face of heaven's eternal purpose and who think they are called to fracture and fragment the saints in order to please God while frustrating the Great Design. It is enough to make the eagerly watching angels weep!

That Inner Illumination

Mission Messenger (December 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“And this is my prayer . . . that you may receive that inner illumination of the spirit which will make you realize how great is the hope to which he is calling you” (Ephesians 1:18).

All of our readers recognize by this time that translators of the sacred scriptures sometimes find themselves in difficulty when facing the original word for spirit. The Greek pneuma can refer to the Spirit of God, or it can refer to that divinely given attribute within man which makes of him a rational being, able to hold converse with Deity. Even the term hagios pneuma is fraught with problems. It may refer to the Spirit who is holy by nature, or to the spirit in man when purged of the taint and guilt of sin and consecrated unto the service of God.

The passage with which we are here concerned is a good case in point. Some translators capitalize the word and make it Spirit, concluding that the Spirit is the agency of illumination, God’s flashlight to conduct the way into deeper recesses of the Word. Others render it spirit, referring to the heart, the intellectual faculty, which is flooded with greater light and thus made more capable of functioning effectively in fulfilling the divine purpose.

Those who are aware of my personal convictions about the work of the Spirit also recognize that I am not perturbed by which position is taken. I hold that the spirit of man is capable of being floodlighted and given insight, and I believe that this is one of the functions of the Holy Spirit. There is a difference between revelation and illumination. The first relates to impartation of truth undiscoverable by other means. It has to do with an action of the divine mind in conveying truth. The second has to do with perceptiveness of that truth and is an action related to the human understanding.

I do not think the Spirit is revealing additional truth to men in our day. I am content to believe that the revelation of divine truth as contained in the sacred scriptures was completed by the special envoys of Christ during their lifetime. But all of the truths in that revelation have not been apprehended. It is one thing to uncover the body of saving truth and a wholly different thing to discover the truths contained in it. I do not feel that the bodies of men today are one whit different than that of Adam, but scientists are discovering new truths about us all of the time. The Spirit does not operate in illumination by imposing the Word upon our minds, else all of us would have an equal knowledge of God's truth. The Spirit dwells in the heart and infuses the mind into the truth to the extent of its willingness and capability. No two persons in the world have the same capacity for understanding. In all of us, the powers of perception, retention, and rationalization differ. We can no more understand alike than we can all look alike. It is for this reason that knowledge can never be made a ground of fellowship any more than can physical stature or appearance.

Our willingness to adopt new truths may be affected by prejudice, loyalty to the party, indifference, or fear of loss of prestige, power or pelf. The Spirit cannot drive us farther than we are willing to go. In order to grasp the greatness of truth one must cast off all shackles and make the leap of faith. The overwhelming desire for truth must become the magnificent obsession, the search for the holy grail, the quest of the golden fleece.

When one arrives at the point where all else is counted as refuse and he surrenders himself unreservedly to the Spirit who dwells within, when he commits himself without restraint to the leading of the Spirit to follow without hesitancy, his heart is prepared for illumination. The word of God will take on new depths of meaning, passages which once were like a blank wall become open gates attracting to the broad fields beyond, those which were interpreted with that inconsistency which is the bane of every faction will suddenly come into focus and proper correlation, and an unbounded joy will fill the heart. This is the promise of God!

The Spirit did not come as a truck driver to dump the truth on an empty lot and then retire to the shade of a tree to watch our fumbling efforts to cement the blocks together into a tabernacle for our God. God is as much concerned that we grasp the truth as that we get it. So the Spirit dwells within each of us, helping us to overcome our weakness, and empowering us to understand. So long as we drowsily confuse the Message of heaven with the call of men, even those who are priests of God, we will be frantic. But when we quietly compose ourselves and say, "Speak Lord, thy servant heareth," the truth will break through. And when this happens it will "make you realize how great is the hope to which he is calling you." This I earnestly crave for all of you because of the love I have for you!

The Satisfying Bread

Mission Messenger (December 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

“He who gives seed to the sower and turns that seed into bread to eat, will give you the seed of generosity to sow and, for the harvest, the satisfying bread of good deeds done” (2 Corinthians 9:10).

This intriguing statement appears as a part of a letter devoted to raising money. It was intended to encourage those who received it to give freely of their means to help people whom they had not seen and would probably never see. Those to whom the money was to be sent were prejudiced against those who were asked to contribute. They were racially segregated, even though they were brothers in the Lord.

The apostle Paul felt that a generous gift from communities of the saints among the Gentiles to help the poor among the Jewish disciples in Palestine might go far toward lessening tensions. He was a little dubious as to how the gesture might be received, and even wrote to the Romans, “Now, my brothers, I am going to ask you, for the sake of our Lord Jesus Christ and for the love we bear each other in the Spirit, to stand behind me in earnest prayer to God on my behalf— that I may not fall into the hands of the unbelievers in Judea, and that the Jerusalem Christians may receive the gift I am taking to them in the spirit in which it was made.”

So much for the background which evoked the statement. I am interested in its implications in my own life. Because the apostle was writing to a people familiar with rural life, he uses language drawn from their existence to illustrate his message. After urging them to make theirs a spontaneous gift rather than one squeezed out of them by the pressure of his words, he says, "All I will say is that a poor sowing means a poor harvest, and generous sowing means a generous harvest."

This may have been a popular proverb which he was merely quoting. In any event, in those days when farmers walked through their fields scattering the seed in broadcast fashion, they had to decide whether they would sow sparsely or freely. If they sought to save and hoard their seed there would be a poor harvest, but if they dipped in the bag and cast the seed abroad in lavish fashion a generous harvest could be gathered in.

It would seem that since it was all so simple there could be no question about how to sow, but there were variable factors. Nature had to be taken into account. There might be too much rain, or a drouth, or an insect invasion. Under such circumstances it would appear that it would have been best to save the seed rather than to cast it out with such abandon. Thus, one had to have faith to really sow generously, whereas to sow miserly indicated a lack of trust or hope.

In the sharing of life's bounty we must remember that all will not always turn out as we planned. Those whom we help may be resentful and unappreciative. They may take that for which we labored and waste it or "throw it down a rathole." They may even become our enemies. So we must decide whether we are giving to try and purchase goodwill and commendation, or whether we are motivated solely by a spirit of altruism and compassion.

The peculiar thing about it is that if we sit down and try to coldly calculate in advance, we will get only a very minimal return, but if we dip down into the bag of seed spontaneously and enthusiastically and sow it with a spirit of trust, the harvest will be amazing. One cannot tell another how to give or what to give. I cannot bind a percentage upon you, nor can I reap for you. "Let everyone give as his heart tells him, neither grudgingly nor under compulsion, for God loves the man who gives cheerfully."

The harvest starts in your own heart before the planting begins. And the seed is fertilized and watered by your attitude. If you turn loose of it with grumbling reluctance or because of pressures put upon you, you have degerminated it before it leaves your hand, in so far as your own harvest is concerned. God will open up heaven to bless you only when your heart is open to receive the blessing. He sends none away empty except those who are full of themselves. When the strings of the heart are drawn taut by the hand of stinginess God cannot deposit the riches of His grace in that heart.

God gives seed to the sower. Man can plant seed but he cannot make it. God can turn that seed into bread to eat. But man cannot hoard the seed and have the bread. It is only as we are willing to turn loose of the seed which God places in our hand that we can expect a harvest. If we save the seed we lose the bread.

As it is in the realm of nature, so it is in the domain of the spirit. God will give you the seed of generosity to sow and, for the harvest, the satisfying bread of good deeds done. Many in our day are starved and emaciated within. They suffer from frustration and discontent. They grumble because they have no satisfying bread, but the reason they have none is because they have not sowed the seed of unselfish giving. There is no use waiting for your ship to come in, if you have never sent it out! Someone has said, "The man who waits for things to turn up has his eyes fixed on his toes." The risk of faith pays off!

The Butting Brethren

Mission Messenger (December 1970)

Volume 32

[Abstract]

It is generally recognized, I think, that I am a controversial figure. This is no novelty for me. I seem always to have been cast in such a role. I entered the restoration movement through a rather small but combative and vociferous segment. This required a constant attack upon others as traitors and apostates. It also demanded a considerable amount of debating over issues which seemed of such gravity that unless properly settled the earth would cease her stated rounds and the stars fall like untimely figs when a rude wind blows.

I never lost a debate. Neither did any of my opponents. This fact can easily be verified by reading our respective accounts of our skirmishes. In a more mature age I wonder if such discussions revealed a sense of insecurity in the party, and if we gained reassurance by jumping on representatives of bigger and older factions. That may also account for the aggressive stance of the whole restoration movement toward those who have grown up in various sectarian moulds.

I am no longer a factional front man. I am no longer a sectarian at heart. Such vestiges of this work of the flesh which still cling to me are there because of ignorance and not because of my wish. I have renounced all sectarianism, ours as well as theirs, whoever they are! And now I find myself more of a problem to many of my brethren than ever before. They knew how to handle me when I was a party proponent because they have all of the arguments collected, catalogued and correlated for each party. I do not fit into any of their little compartments now. Praise God!

The accepted course of procedures when you learn you are in a faction is to change factions. This means that you search for one which is a little narrower or a little broader than the one in which you have labored, depending upon which way you are going. Then you affiliate yourself with the new faction and the party journal publishes your picture together with a notification to the “faithful brethren” that after so many years of preaching in error you have seen the light and will now accept meetings with the loyal church.

But I did not go anywhere! I had already shown that I could be as narrow as anyone where I was, so I decided to show you can be as loving as need be wherever you are. We do not need to leave some brethren to love all brethren. If you can’t love them where you are, you’ll not love them anywhere else. This game of musical chairs may be all right for a children’s party, but our parties are composed of grown men, at least physically. It is a genuine thrill to know that the only brethren you have are brethren in error. That eliminates the need of mentioning the fact. You’ve heard the old spiritual, “All of God’s chillun got shoes.” Well, all of God’s chillun also have hangups, problems and unanswered questions. Some of them not only have problems, they are problems. But I receive them all just like God does. If he doesn’t drive out his problem children I will not drive out my problem brethren. If they are in him, we are in him together. And I am not going to leave him or them. They don’t have to love me for me to love them. Love is not a “horse trading” proposition.

This troubles a lot of folks. They wanted me to change my attitude, but they wanted me to reach only to them. When you start loving people in other parties you are “going too far.” So I get written up pretty regularly in all kinds of papers. Sometimes I'm called a traitor, a liberal, or a Judas Iscariot, and other things like that. One editor solemnly warned his readers that I was a "Pied Piper" but when I wrote him that the Pied Piper influenced only children and rats, he didn't mention it any more.

None of this moves me. Really, I get a kind of kick out of it. I do not worry whether what is said is untrue. One of these days everything is going to be straightened out and squared up at the White Throne. I am willing to wait. It really isn't too important what men say or think about me. It wasn't to Jesus and it isn't to me. I've learned that by following him as closely as possible I can love even those who think they are my enemies. It isn't always easy but it is always satisfying.

It is interesting to read these little attacks in which brethren seek to limit my influence and create prejudice against what I am saying. Most of them follow a stereotyped pattern. Before me as I write are three of these articles. One says, "Brother Ketcherside's writings for many months have presented some profound truths, in a writing style which is the finest in this generation, but . . ." Another says, "Brother Ketcherside is dangerous because he manifests the love he talks so much about. He is genial in disposition and disarming in manner, but . . ." The third says, "Do not misunderstand me. Carl is a powerful speaker and if he were sound on the fellowship issue he could be a tremendous force for good, but . . ."

If I just paid attention to what was before the "buts" I would think more highly of myself than I ought to think. If I concentrated on what followed the "buts" I might develop a mental depression or go into a blue funk. If you will pardon me for saying so, I am not going to be either cast down or built up by such aspersion and acclaim. I am just no longer working for the approval of men. What they say will neither set me up nor upset me! Someone has to cut across our silly lines. Someone has to ignore our trivial barriers. Someone has to batter down our fanatical walls. I intend to do it out of love for God. It is no sacrifice for me to do his will. I am thrilled to be set free by the grace of God. I shall never return to the narrow, bigoted, sectarian outlook which shackles the heart and quenches the Spirit. I shall not let well-meaning, but factional-minded brethren “but” me out of the eternal kingdom.

The Ascent of Faith

Mission Messenger (January 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

Samuel Taylor Coleridge, whose “Rime of the Ancient Mariner” has always intrigued me, was an interesting character. In spite of the fact that he became hopelessly addicted to drugs, being a good friend of Thomas de Quincey who wrote “Confessions of an English Opium Eater,” he could never forget the impression made upon his mind by the study of the Bible in his early days at Cambridge. And he repeatedly said that Paul’s letter to the Romans was “the most profound work in existence.”

Then there was F. Godet, the eminent French professor of theology in the University of Neuchatel, whose commentary on Luke opened up so many new vistas of thought for me. He referred to Romans as “the cathedral of the Christian faith.” Martin Luther, whose name was always spoken in reverence in my childhood home, declared that Romans was “the chief part of the New Testament.”

If the Roman letter is the Alps of the new covenant scriptures, certainly chapter eight is the Matterhorn, looming high above and towering into the clouds. It will be my privilege (I do not count it a task) this year, to lead an expedition in scaling this peak, and to this exciting adventure we invite both you and your friends.

As one in scaling a mountain must first work his way up gentler slopes, it becomes necessary for us to mention the reasoning of the apostle leading up to this one great chapter. We shall try to avoid the temptation to peer into every nook and crevice on the way, and shall keep in view the snowy peak which is our objective. The background will be painted in bold strokes and not in fine detail.

However, there are certain words in the Roman letter which cannot be casually brushed aside. Unless we understand their true connotation all other effort will be in vain. If we seem to stop too long in some places, please remember that we are digging in toe-holds for our cleats, and thus preparing for the ascent which beckons us onward and upward. He travels at his own risk who thinks he can understand the word of God while ignoring the words of God.

Even the casual student of the sacred scriptures realizes that the letter to the Romans is different than any other letter which Paul wrote. Certainly it more nearly approaches a systematic treatise on our relationship with the divine than any other. It does not contain the references to local problems which are found in most of the rest. The reason for this appears to be quite simple.

Paul did not plant the congregation of saints in Rome, the capital city of the world. He had not visited the city and was dependent upon the report of others for any knowledge of the state of the believers. But he had long wanted to see them for two reasons. First, as an envoy of the King, he wanted to bestow upon them an enabling gift, and second, he desired to behold souls from among the Gentiles gathered into God's granary. Paul had a passion for Gentiles. He was their very own ambassador.

Something had just occurred which encouraged Paul to hope that his dream might be realized. For a long time he had been planning how he might visit Spain, a great frontier of the Empire. He had been deterred from going into the regions beyond by the need to take up a contribution from congregations of Greeks to relieve the destitution and abject poverty which persisted in Jerusalem and Palestine. The money had been gathered and he was ready to travel with it to Jerusalem and turn it over to the brethren.

While casting about for something to do after accomplishment of this mission, the thought came to him that it would be an opportune time to visit Spain, and to make a stopover in Rome enroute. There was really no place left in Asia Minor or on the Greek peninsula, which had not heard the Message. He had proclaimed it from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum. He would not consider going where others had labored lest he build upon another man's foundation.

So he sat down and wrote to those who were "loved of God and called to be Christ's men and women" in Rome. He said, "Since for many years I have had a great desire to see you, I hope to visit you on my way to Spain. I hope also that you will speed me on my journey, after I have had the satisfaction of seeing you all." While he was dictating the letter to Tertius, who took it all down, he decided to set forth for those whom he had never met what the life of faith was all about. And that is how we came to have this remarkable and thrilling personal letter.

THE CENTRAL THEME

At the very outset I must tell you that the theme of the letter is justification by faith. Unfortunately, in our day, we have put God's revelation through theological wringers and dyed the fabric with sectarian tints. Thus, when we hear an expression such as "justification by faith," our minds immediately refer it to some kind of partisan philosophy. We never really find out what Paul meant because of our intense anxiety to show what he did not mean. We cannot eat the bread of life because we are so busily engaged in showing what ingredients it does not contain.

It is important that we grasp what is meant in the expression “righteousness of faith.” Our hope for life is involved in it. And do not be disturbed that in one sentence I write justification and in the next righteousness. They are from the same word. Only in our English translation have we made a distinction. In doing so we have created mental confusion. Since it is so important that we lay a proper groundwork let me make a few general statements about these terms, and then, by God’s grace and mercy, we can enlarge upon them in subsequent articles.

Now it is true that faith is the belief of testimony but it is not mere mental assent to the veracity of that testimony. It goes far beyond this. It involves the surrender of self without reservation to him who is the object of faith. Faith in Christ is a pledge of allegiance to Christ. Inherent in it is the idea of trust which leads to commitment, the utter abandonment of one’s self to another in the full confidence that what he has promised he will do.

In recent years certain men within our communion have been critical of the term “commitment to Christ.” It is their contention that the words are not found in the Bible. Of course, they refer to the English Version as commissioned by King James. But theirs is a shallow objection, for the very word for believe is rendered commit, or committed, no less than seven times in that version. The faith which justifies in Christ is the faith which declares its utter bankruptcy of any other hope. It throws out no other anchor regardless of how strong the tempest or how rough the sea. It never panics or looks for another refuge. It recognizes there is no other Savior in heaven and none on earth besides him. It is not Jesus or someone else; it is Jesus or no one else!

So when I write about faith in this series I am not dealing with a mere mental concept related to Jesus of Nazareth. Neither am I referring to a verbal statement or confession of belief. I am talking about the reaching out of the inner man to embrace the Son of God so fully and completely as to lose one's own personality in identification with him. As Paul said to the Colossians, "You who were spiritually dead because of your sins and your uncircumcision, God has made to share in the very life of Christ." Surely faith must reside in the heart, and certainly it must be confessed, but it is more than a rational idea among other ideas, and far greater than the stumbling expression of it in words.

Let us now consider the meaning of justification. Justification is made necessary because of our guilt. To stand justified before God is to be guiltless. It is to be righteous, to sustain a right relationship with God. How can sinful man enter into such a relationship with a sinless God who hates iniquity, and whose very nature impels him to judgment upon every sinful act? Unless we can find a solution to this we will be driven to despair and wallow in the blackness of recurring doubt.

Man cannot obtain justification by recalling or undoing a single act that he has committed. If one engages in the sin of adultery in an act of blinding passion, he cannot undo it. He may agonize in the burning hell of an accusing conscience and shed rivers of tears. He may rationalize within his disturbed heart and seek for mental comfort in the prevalence of such a deed in the social culture. But the act, once committed, cannot be burnt up, washed out or explained away. The doer is guilty before God. If he lives an exemplary sexual life the remainder of his days upon the earth he still cannot blot out the former act.

Nor can one be justified by law-keeping. Ideally, if a man could completely fulfill the law and perfectly obey its every jot and tittle, he would be justified (Rom. 2:13). But no earthly being has ever done this. No one ever will. The least infraction of the law, the very first deviation, places one under condemnation.

Then he is helpless. Then, too, as Paul writes, “The commandment, which was meant to be a direction to life, I found was a sentence of death.” That is why he also says, “No man can justify himself before God by a perfect performance of the Law’s demands— indeed it is the straight-edge of the Law that shows how crooked we are” (Romans 3:20).

It is in the face of our helplessness to undo the tangled skein of life, and our hopelessness of perfect performance of a written code, that God offers us justification as a free gift. This is the fruit of abundant mercy and amazing grace. Justification is a judicial act of offended Majesty. Every sin, like the very first one, is an offense against God. Our only hope is to receive acquittal. We cannot win, merit or deserve it. Nor can God bestow it in such a way as to make it appear that he condones transgression or treats it lightly and as of little consequence. He cannot make himself unrighteous to make us righteous!

The problem of sin has to be met without equivocation. And it required propitiation which man could not provide. It resolved itself in the death for sin of a sinless person. “God has appointed him as the means of propitiation, a propitiation accomplished by the shedding of his blood, to be received and made effective in ourselves by faith.” By this means God preserved his righteousness. He made it possible for justice and mercy to meet and merge without clashing. “Under this divine system a man who has faith is now freely acquitted in the eyes of God by his generous dealing in the redemptive act of Christ” (Romans 3:24).

Really, it is quite simple. Jesus gave up his estate in heaven to become identified with man in his sin. What he did for all men each man must now do for him. Each must give up his life on earth, the life of sin, to become identified with Jesus in his sinlessness. When a person does this God declares him justified. This does not mean that one has not sinned, or is not a sinner. It does not mean that he is worthy or pure. It does mean that he is forgiven because in Christ God counts him righteous, not reckoning sin to him. “If a man, irrespective of his work, has faith in him who justifies the sinful, then that man’s faith is counted as righteousness, and that is the gift of God. This is the happy state of the man God accounts righteous apart from his achievements” (Romans 4:5).

Remember that it is not the sinless man whom God justifies. There is no such man on earth. God justifies sinful men. This is my only hope. It is the ground of my confidence. I am justified by the sinless life of Jesus which I appropriate by faith. When I cut loose all of the ropes in which I have trusted for security and launch out into the deep with nothing but Jesus to bear me up, when I stake all I am or ever hope to be on him, then God bestows his righteousness upon me as a gift. So long as I keep a balancing pole of my own, or have a net below just in case, I can never be justified. I am still trusting in my own wit and achievement. In such a situation my sin must be reckoned unto me because I have not laid it all on him.

The good news that man can be justified by “the fact of his faith in God’s appointed Savior and not by what he has managed to achieve under the Law,” is the theme of the Roman letter. This is the gospel, the glad tidings. So Paul writes, “I am not ashamed of the good news about Christ, for it is God’s dynamic to restore to a state of wholeness all who believe it, the Jew first, but also the Gentile. For in the good news is announced God’s program of justification by faith, in order to produce faith, for it was long since recorded that the just will live by faith” (Romans 1:16, 17).

This last statement does not mean that the just will walk, exercise or continue in faith, although that is certainly true. Nothing is clearer than the fact that “we walk by faith and not by sight.” However, the thought of the apostle here is that faith is the source of being, the principle of existence. Without this faith man is dead. I have no life of my own. I am under condemnation. I must either have his life or I am doomed. “But where sin was thus multiplied, grace immeasurably exceeded it, in order that, as sin established its reign by way of death, so God’s grace might establish its reign in righteousness, and issue in eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” (Romans 5:21). I am under the umbrella of God’s love. I am living under the reign of grace.

THE FUTILITY OF WISDOM

When Paul wrote all humanity was divided into two classes — Jew and Gentile. Both had to be convinced of the vanity of the means by which they sought for the meaning of life. The Gentile relied upon man’s wisdom, upon his rational powers. The Jew trusted in his conformity to the law which he possessed. The first sought to lift himself from misty mediocrity by his own bookstraps, the second by his own bootstraps, that is, by his own achievement.

The apostle deals with the Gentile first, in Romans 1:21-32. This is one of the most revealing sections of sacred scripture. It belies the whole theory that man began with polytheism, or a multiplicity of tribal gods, and that Israel elevated a Palestinian baal to the place of a supreme deity and gradually shook off superstitious fear of other deities and came to proclaim that there was no other besides their own.

Instead, mankind began with a concept of one God, and gradually sunk into idolatry as a gross perversion. Man is not so much a creature of evolution as of “devolution.” The steps toward degradation are clearly identified. (1) A universal knowledge of God obtained. (2) A refusal to honor or respect him as divine. (3) Lack of thankfulness for the blessings bestowed by nature. (4) Futile thinking resulting from lack of a spiritual foundation. (5) A darkening of intellectual powers. (6) Boasting of wisdom while making fools of themselves. (7)

Exchanging the splendor of the immortal God for an image made like mortal man, and even for images of creatures that run, fly or crawl.

It is axiomatic that man becomes like the object that he worships. The more he worships the more he adopts the traits and characteristics of the revered object. When a man worships animals he becomes bestial. When such worship becomes general the environment which he creates is that of the jungle with “the law of fang and claw.” When a society completely eliminates God from its thinking God gives them up. God spreads before us the proofs of his existence and provides the instinctive motivations for our recognition of the divine will in the universe, but he will not intrude himself upon the sovereignty of the human will.

Three times Paul declares that God gave man up, and tells why. (1) “They gave up God: and therefore God gave them up—to be playthings of their own foul desires in dishonoring their own bodies” (1:24). This is the origin of “the playboy philosophy,” and it is not new. Poor deluded Hugh Hefner cannot hold a candle for the ancient Greeks in his attempted revival of the religion of hedonism. (2) “These men deliberately forsook the truth of God and accepted a lie, paying homage and rendering service to the creature instead of the Creator . . . so God gave them up to shameful passions” (1:25, 26).

(3) “Thus, because they have not seen fit to acknowledge God, he has given them up to their own depraved passion” (1:28). With this we are supplied a catalogue of depravity, characteristic of paganism when it was shaped by those who “became fatuous in their argumentations and plunged their silly minds still further into the dark” (1:21). Noteworthy are the strictures against homosexuality, effeminacy and lesbianism. Instead of these being regarded as exhibitions of liberty of personality they are branded as disgraceful passions, abnormal, unnatural, shameful horrors and sexual perversity.

The crackpot advocates of unisex, the fanatical shatterpated defenders of homosexuality between consenting adults, are all representatives of Satan's revival of the philosophic delusions of Grecian philosophy. Not a single new element has been added. The pornography in print is a commentary on that which was distributed in the Athenian agora as poetry; the exploitation of sex and nudity on the screen is rivalled by that which was portrayed on the walls of Pompeii and Herculaneum. Men still suffer from "bats in the belfry." Only the belfry has been modernized. The bats are the same! "They know well enough the just decree of God, that those who behave like this deserve to die, and yet they do it; not only so, they actually applaud such practices" (1:32).

Man can never save himself by his own wisdom. He cannot think himself out of the dilemma of sin. It is sinful man who does the thinking and, regardless of his brilliance he will not free himself from the mire. "Where is your wise man now, your man of learning, or your subtle debater, limited all of them to this passing age? God has made the wisdom of this world look foolish" (1 Cor. 1:20).

THE LEGALISTIC APPROACH

Now we must turn to the Jew who trusted in legal rectitude. Like all legalists in every age, the Jew condemned himself by his judgment of others. It is the nature of prohibitory law to kindle desire and incite to sin. I have in mind a brother who never missed an opportunity to publicly condemn attendance at movie theaters, but who broke down and tearfully confessed that the whole time he had been frequenting a burlesque house with its striptease performances and suggestive jokes. I remember another who constantly belabored gambling in a congregation of humble saints, not a one of whom would purchase a ticket on a raffle. It was later learned that the vociferous teacher had long been betting on horse races and playing the ponies. Paul wrote, “The commandment which should have led to life proved in my experience to lead to death, because sin found its opportunity in the commandment, seduced me, and through the commandment killed me.”

This was literally true in the case of a much older friend of mine. He earnestly tried to live up to the idea of Christianity projected by our little congregation and the itinerant preachers who held our meetings. He heard all of the sermons about the hell that awaited the man who kept the whole law and yet offended in one point. He knew that he fell short in more ways than one, a fact of which his good nagging Christian wife continually reminded him. When he could take what he thought was his own hypocrisy no longer, he took his revolver and walked to the orchard and blew his brains out against the bark of an apple tree. I wish I knew what he was thinking before he pulled the fatal trigger. I wonder if he thought the rest of us were murdering him.

Law always starts with one who is helpless and leaves him hopeless. I know from experience. I tried for years to be justified by law and the whole time I was living behind a facade. I learned that there is no law in existence that one cannot mentally evade if he wants to do a thing enough to take the risk. The real power of law is fear. Its lash is a threat. But no fear of future judgment will deter from a present act, for every sinner thinks he can “beat the rap.” He will do it just this once and then live so good the rest of his life that God will be forced to let down the bars and let him into heaven. He fools only himself!

Did you ever study carefully the kind of pride bred in the Jews by their boast that they were God’s elect? One of the most blistering indictments ever made was pronounced against them. Listen! “You take your stand upon the Law, and are, so to speak, proud of your God. You know his plan, and are able through your knowledge of the Law truly to appreciate moral values. You can, therefore, confidently look upon yourself as a guide to those who do not know the way, and as a light to those who are groping in the dark. You can instruct those who have no spiritual wisdom: you can teach those who, spiritually speaking, are only just out of the cradle. You have a certain grasp of the basis of true knowledge.” Does this sound like a description of anyone you know? Then read on in Romans 2:18-24.

But cheer up! All is not lost! “What happens now to human pride of achievement? There is no room for it. Why, because failure to keep the Law killed it? Not at all, but because the whole matter is now on a different plane— believing instead of achieving. We see now that a man is justified before God by the fact of his faith in God’s appointed Savior and not by what he has managed to achieve under the Law.”

Never forget this. Justification is on a different plane than that of legalistic conformity to a written code. If you revert to hope based on your own correctness, your own legal rectitude, you have not restored the life of the primitive Christians. You have simply revived the original Pharisees!

The apostle uses Abraham as an example. He was declared to be justified before he was circumcised and a long time prior to the advent of the Law. And he provides for us a genuine definition of the faith which justifies. Discounting the weakness of his own vital powers and the deadness of Sarah’s womb, he “remained absolutely convinced that God was able to implement his own promise. This was the ‘faith’ which was counted unto him for righteousness” (4:21, 22).

Let that seep into the pores of your consciousness. The faith which is counted for righteousness, that is, which establishes a proper relationship with the eternal life of God is “the unshakable conviction that what God has promised he has power to fulfill.” This is important because I am constantly running into young people on the college campus who are shaken up and claim to have trouble with their faith.

A lot of them do not have trouble with their faith at all. They are trying to operate on a set of values inherited from their grandparents, borrowed from their parents, or saddled on them by the congregation in which they grew up. Like David, when confronted with a giant, they find they cannot fight in another man's armor. But instead of getting a good fit they throw one! One might as well try to eat with a set a dentures borrowed from his father as to tackle the philosophical fare dished up today while trying to operate on a "slightly used faith" brought with him from home.

Most people do not know what faith is and they use it as one ingredient in a tossed salad of varied concepts flavored with a dressing of intellectual doubt. And some think it is a horrible sin to have such salad dressing in their mental refrigerators. They try to hide it from sight behind the effervescent mental soda pop. There was, for instance, the coed who tearfully confided in me that there had been questions raised in her biology class which she could not answer. When I asked her why she felt obligated to furnish an answer for every problem that arose, she replied, "But can a person have faith and doubts at the same time?" Obviously one can have faith in the power of God and doubts related to the biological realm at the same time. Indeed, if he is normal this will almost certainly be the case.

I can never forget the dictum of Sir Francis Bacon, "If we begin with certainties, we shall end in doubts; but if we begin with doubts, and are patient in them, we shall end in certainties." It was the philosopher Colton who said, "Doubt is the vestibule through which all must pass before they can enter into the temple of wisdom." My own faith in God is much stronger because of the period of testing through which I struggled. Wrestling with one's self is real exercise. I know that my Redeemer lives. I know he will fulfill his promises. But it is one thing to believe this and to trust in it, and a wholly different thing to know how it will be done. Most of our doubts are related to the how and that is outside our sphere. Abraham did not know how Sarah could conceive, seeing that she had long since passed through the menopause, yet he “remained absolutely convinced that God was able to implement his own promises.”

My faith is that of Abraham. The promise is different but the nature of the faith is not. I do not intend to be shaken in it nor shaken loose from it, by the wisdom of this passing age. There are not enough pseudo-scientists, pettifogging professors or perverted philosophers in this world to make me lose faith in my God. I am sold out to him, lock, stock and barrel. I have crossed the Great Divide and I am not turning back. I have bound myself to the mast of faith so that the siren voices of infidelity cannot lure me to set foot on the shifting sands of the island of unbelief. I have invested all I am and have in the life trust bank. There is nothing left with which to speculate. “I dare not trust the sweetest frame, but wholly lean on Jesus’ name.”

PEACE WITH GOD

This brings us to a great resting place in our ascent—Romans 5. It begins with a breathtaking conclusion introduced with the appropriate word “therefore.” And it defines for us the remarkable results growing out of it. Drink in the first two verses. “Therefore, being declared free of guilt by faith, we have attained unto peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Through him we have been inducted into this new relationship of grace, and here we stand, in happy anticipation of the glorious things he has for us in the future.”

Here is life in three dimensions— past, present and future. In the past, the pall of guilt with fear of what was to come. Faith reaches back to the remedy for guilt, for faith is based upon fact and fact is grounded in the act of God. God did something about sin! He drew the fangs. He milked death of its venom. “It is sin which gives death its sting, and it is the Law which gives sin its strength. All thanks to God then, who gives us the victory over these things through our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 15:56, 57).

Through faith in our Lord I am acquitted, made free, and given a new life. I am reconciled to God. I have peace with God. What does this mean? In the old covenant scriptures which provide the vocabulary for the new, peace and salvation are the same. To save is to make whole, to restore the proper functioning and relationship of the thing under consideration. To save from sin is to restore one to the state of being with God which man enjoyed before sin came. When the psalmist said, “He restoreth my soul,” the Hebrew is literally, “he taketh me back to the place of my beginnings.”

Only grace can build the bridge across what man is, back to what he was, and forward to what he can become. And grace is a gift. It is not a toll bridge. It provides free access to the one who casts himself upon Jesus. It is false pride which causes man to go until he gives out, when he can only really start when he gives in. I am thrilled that love pried open my clenched fingers so I could reach out the hand of faith and grasp the gift of God’s grace. What confidence is bred by the peace of God, a peace which is not negative, not merely a cessation of hostilities, but an active, vital, triumphant force!

And the future is more glorious to contemplate. Peace produces assurances of promises on the morrow. We rejoice in the hope of the glory of God. Now that I am justified through surrender to Jesus the future has lost its fear. I am steering into the sunrise and not the sunset. Doubt is gone! Despair has vanished! Listen! “But when the kindness of God our savior and his love towards man appeared, he saved us in his mercy— not by virtue of any moral achievement of ours, but by the cleansing power of a new birth and the moral renewal of the Holy Spirit, which he gave us so generously through Jesus Christ our Savior. The result is that we are acquitted by his grace, and can look forward to inheriting eternal life. This is solid truth. I want you to speak about these matters with absolute certainty” (Titus 3:4-8).

Absolute certainty about such matters as the kindness of God, the love of God, the mercy of God, the new birth, renewal through the Holy Spirit, acquittal through grace, and eternal life! Unless we can be certain about these we can never be sure of anything. I am certain! This is what peace with God has brought my once trembling soul. I shall meet him over there because I have met him over here.

Don’t get me wrong. I am not postponing my joy until I wade out into the breakers and cross the tide. I do not take the position that the present is a time to fret, complain and look glum. My motto is not “Be morose today and merry tomorrow.” I am thrilled to the depths with life as it is. I would not have it one bit different. Whatever happens to me since I am in Jesus is a part of the trip! I am on a package tour to heaven. I am not riding along with an arm or leg sticking out of the window to get knocked off by one of the devil’s telephone poles. I am in him with everything that I have. Whatever happens to me will happen in him. Let it happen! It can only work good! Listen:

This doesn’t mean, of course, that we have only a hope of future joys— we can be full of joy here and now even in our trials and troubles. Taken in the right spirit these very things will give us patient endurance; this in turn will develop a mature character, and a character of this sort produces a steady hope that will never disappoint us, because God’s love has been poured out in our heart through the Holy Spirit he has given us (5:2-5).

Taken in the right spirit. A steady hope! I know some people whose level of hope goes up and down like the mercury in a thermometer. One day they are topping tall timber and the next day they are crawling through the thicket in a swamp. I am thinking of one man in particular. When things are going along smoothly on his job, he is the life of the party. But if by-and-by “hard times come knocking at the door,” it is “Old Kentucky home, goodnight!” He gets so little he could sit on the curb and not be able to hit the street with his feet. He exudes gloom so thick that you could slice it and serve it in gloom sandwiches. What’s the trouble? That’s easy. He has not developed the patience that develops a mature character. He is still selfish. His heart is shriveled up like a prune. He is waiting for others to serve him. The love of God cannot get in through the closed heart.

If you keep a puckering string on your heart you hurt yourself. It is true that what you have won’t get out, but what you need won’t get in. Suspicious, tight-fisted, bitterly critical people pollute the atmosphere with their unhappiness, but they also have to breathe it and while they may stifle others they are committing suicide. The love of God can change that. I happen to know.

I am acquainted with a man and wife who had no children but were blessed with an abundance of this world’s goods. Their daily conversation at the table had to do with interest rates, and clipping dividend coupons. They lived for it. They were as tight as the bark on a hickory tree. They complained about having to pay school taxes, griped about the rising cost of food, and grumbled about government welfare programs. They chose as their friends the kind of people who were pessimistic and with whom they could share their prediction of impending disaster. And they looked like an accident going somewhere to happen.

Then a transformation occurred. The Holy Spirit entered their lives and you never saw such a change as took place. I know when it happened. Against their will they were persuaded to attend a small group session in a home. They consented to go only because they thought that those who were present would sit around and criticize the “institutional church” and its begging for money, and they knew that they could relate to such a sharing of dismals, dumps and doldrums. They craved the fellowship of the funereal and the love of the lugubrious. But it did not turn out that way!

The brother in whose home the meeting was held opened with the remark that God had been speaking to him through the written word in a remarkable way as he lately read it. He then turned to 2 Corinthians 13, and read these lines: "Then you will have the proof you seek of the Christ who speaks through me, the Christ who, far from being weak with you, makes his power felt among you. True, he died on the cross in weakness, but he lives by the power of God; and we who share his weakness shall by the power of God live in your service. Examine yourselves: are you living the life of faith? Put yourself to the test. Surely you recognize that Jesus Christ is among you?— unless of course you prove unequal to the test."

Closing the book, the brother said that he had a confession to make. He had been baptized when he was about thirteen years old, having "gone forward" with a group of others his age during a protracted meeting. In his teen years he had been guilty of every kind of indiscretion, and while going regularly to the gatherings of the church, he had lied to his parents, taken things which did not belong to him, and been guilty of immoral escapades with some of the girls in class. Later, he had been drafted, and in a foreign country had laid his religious convictions aside until he returned to his native land.

He continued his recital by telling how he married the wonderful wife whom he now had, and how their home had been blessed with three children. They never missed attendance at Sunday school but they went as part of a routine of life. He became successful in business, erected and paid for the luxurious home in which all were now sitting, but all of this time was haunted with an inner emptiness, a feeling that somehow there was something just beyond his grasp which was the real secret of happiness.

A few months before, driven by a gnawing sense of his own need, he arose one morning while it was still dark and going into the den, poured out unto God all of the pent-up feelings in his inner being. He wept freely, and then of a sudden, he felt strangely relieved of anxiety and a peace came stealing into his soul which he had never known before. He declared that he accepted this as peace with God brought about by the lifting of the sense of guilt which had lurked inside and poisoned his whole being for years. He asked all who were present to pray for him that he would always experience that peace which passed human understanding.

This confession sparked a good deal of serious talk. There were no stale jokes told, and there was not one note of criticism. Mostly it resolved itself into testimonies of heart-searching upon the part of others. The couple I mentioned drove home lost in thought. They hardly exchanged a word. But that night the man could not sleep. After several hours his wife asked him if he was awake and confessed that she had not been able to sleep either. They got up and talked most of the rest of the night. As the streaks of dawn began to break across the eastern sky they had come to the place where they could pray together, something they had never done before in their lives.

And God took advantage of the open door to come in. The love of God was poured out into their hearts by the Spirit. The selfishness was washed away. The dark corners of suspicion were flushed out by the waters of life. Their whole beings have changed. They are closer to one another than they have ever been before. They like to have young people around them and, for the first time, young people like to be around them. They are hospitable, they visit the sick, they help the needy, and they spend money like it was going out of style. The grace of God is reflected in their very persons. He no longer suffers from an “upset stomach;” she no longer has frightful headaches.

Really, the years have fallen off their shoulders. They have begun to walk with a sprightlier step. Some who knew them before think they may be getting a little “balmy.” They are not! Most members of the church think that real Christians are off in “the upper story” because they are still living on the basement level. The average person isn’t hooked on to the power source. He is like a freight train that has come unhooked from the engine. He is all loaded up but is not going anywhere!

HOPE AND LOVE

Now, one who is in Christ has a hope which will be realized. It will never disappoint because it cannot. Why not? For the simple reason that one who has peace with God opens up his heart. He isn’t afraid to leave the door unbarred. When he opens the door the love of God pours in like the waters of a swollen river when the dam bursts. The King James Version says it is shed abroad. The original is the word for “poured out.” Hope always goes hand-in-hand with faith and love. They are the three abiding principles!

But the love of God is like an ocean tide which flows two ways. It is incoming, drawing us closer to the heart of God. It is outgoing, enabling us to touch the hearts of others. This is the principle of relationship with Jesus. This is the responsibility of discipleship. Think about two verses in Matthew 10. One says, “Then he called his twelve disciples to him.” The other says, “These twelve Jesus sent out with the following instructions.” All of us are called and then sent. Discipleship is not “hanging around” with Jesus, but penetrating the world. It is going out with the instructions.

I have no doubt the twelve would have preferred to stay around where Jesus was, but they were needed where Jesus was not. The love of God is not an escape hatch from responsibility. It does not provide a hiding place. It does not say, “There he is Lord, send him!” It never proposes “Let’s you and Satan fight.”

One who is full of the love of God has no need to hide from anything or anyone, not even from himself. And that is where most of our trouble lies.

God's undeniable, unquestionable proof of his love for us is that "Christ died for us while we were yet sinners" (5:8). We were powerless and we were God's enemies. Paul told Titus that at the time when this took place we were silly, stubborn, and slaves of sensuality. We could not stand ourselves and hated one another. If God had waited to get us out of where we were to love us we would all have been damned. Instead, he loved us to get us out of what we were. And that's the only way any of us will ever get out of our predicament. We have to be pulled out. We cannot extract ourselves. The more frantic our effort the deeper we sink. One does not fight his way out of quicksand!

But here is a true source of comfort and reassurance. God does not start something and leave it unfinished. He does not abandon the task when it is half done. It is reasonable to assume that if he loved us when we were enemies, he will not forsake us after we have become his friends. And this very thing is affirmed for us by the apostle. "Since we have now been justified by Christ's sacrificial death, we shall all the more certainly be saved through him from final retribution. For if, when we were God's enemies, we were reconciled to him through the death of his Son, much more, in that we are reconciled, shall we be saved by his life."

I am not unaware that in the realm of faith, as in every other, there are grandstand quarterbacks. They are always eager to tell how God should have done it and point out where he made his mistakes. As they feed it to us, God should not have required sacrifices of blood under the Mosaic economy. This makes him appear inept and crude to modern men. It breathes of a slaughterhouse religion and God can be mistaken for a bloody butcher.

Too, the idea of offering his Son as a ransom for others was wholly unnecessary and useless. It puts the whole scheme of things in a bad light. God seems to be contradictory. He refused to allow Abraham to offer his son, and then turns around and does it himself. I cannot truthfully say that I dismiss all of this with but a passing glance for I do not even entertain it long enough to dismiss it.

You see, it is not a question of how men think God ought to act, but of how God acted. One who is subject to the judgment of fallible beings and who must allow them to “call the shots” would not be God. Finite men cannot project their ideas upon an infinite God. One quotation puts that thought to sleep! “For who knows the mind of the Lord? who can advise him?” (1 Cor. 2:16).

I am confidently expecting to be saved from the final retribution through Christ. That God made this possible by the death of his Son provides no mental stumblingblock for me. That he chose to teach mankind the value of substitutionary death of an innocent victim for the guilty through ages past in no sense minimizes my respect for his revelation in the word or through The Word.

It was through one man that sin entered the world, and death through sin. Death became universal, the penalty becoming as broad as the involvement. If the act of one man who obeyed the urging of sin affected all men, it would not be surprising that the act of one who did not sin would affect all. “For if by the wrongdoing of that one death established its reign, through a single sinner, much more shall those who receive in far greater measure God’s grace, and his gift of righteousness, live and reign through the one man, Jesus Christ.”

Please observe that the first order is sin and the reign of death. The next is grace and the gift of justification with the reign of life. It is not that Adam sinned and died while we do not sin and live. We sin as Adam did. But we live, not because of our sinlessness, but because of the sinlessness of Jesus Christ. Grace, which immeasurably exceeds sin and death, established a reign of righteousness, and under it, through faith in the Lord Jesus, we are declared righteous. Our sins are not counted unto us! His righteousness is!

Having said this much we shall establish camp at this level and dig in for another month. If God wills, we shall move out again in four weeks, and work our way upward to the summit. We will begin with what happens when we are “baptized into union with Christ Jesus” (6:3) and work our way forward to an understanding of the power of the indwelling Spirit of God.

In closing, let me urge upon you to cast yourself upon Jesus. Most of us try too hard. We become frantic and tension-filled. We are frightened and fretful. We are afraid to lean back upon the everlasting arms although we sing about it quite lustily. If there seems to you to be an uncrossable gulf between our faith and that exhibited by the early saints, please read this from the pen of J. B. Phillips:

The word of God which stimulates and sustains faith is eternal truth breaking through into this temporary world, so that the certainty of the early Christians which we may regard with a certain wistfulness means, not that they were men of exceptional spiritual calibre, but simply that they recognized the word of God as being quite literally the message, plan and command of God himself. It was a faith more rock-like than any human certainty which gave their lives astonishing quality.

Taking a Stand

[Abstract]

A group of us out in California were talking about old times not long ago, and I mentioned that a watchword in our particular faction was, “We’ll force them to take a stand!” Nothing much that was really new ever toppled into our barricaded rut, but when something a little out of the ordinary lifted its strange countenance above the parapet, the party “some-whats” swung into action, blasting away and challenging for debate.

I recall that congregations which preferred the aroma of peace to the acrid smell of the smoke of battle, sometimes refused to be caught up into shouting with the lips and shooting from the hips, and decided to “sit this one out.” It never worked. Neither party of belligerents could permit such a show of apathy toward the world-shaking issues to which they were giving their all. So those who quietly desisted from the fray were tagged as compromisers. The party guns went to work to smoke them out and force them to take a stand.

A lot of folk have outgrown their tendency to act as busybodies in other men’s matters, and this is wonderful. But there are still enough of them riding the range to make it uncomfortable for groups of humble saints who prefer to be left alone to love all of the brethren. The latest “shoot-out” is about the work of the Holy Spirit. In some areas the sectarian, gorge is rising as preachers sound off and demand that all and sundry let it be known which side you are on. Those who are not interested in taking sides are being pressured to tell how they “stand on Pat Boone,” since he claims to have spoken in tongues.

If you will suffer a word of exhortation from a veteran of a half century of combat, I’d like to point out that all of the hullabaloo is unnecessary. The question is simply not worth exalting to the status of a prime target. Whatever you think of Pat and the phenomenon to which he testifies has not one thing to do with your relationship to the Lord Jesus Christ. Do not let preachers of either side hook you on the outworn cliché that it is “a matter of the authority of Christ,” so you will conclude that to line up with Jesus you will have to line up with them. Do not be maneuvered by the skilled salesman of either position into an anti or pro party.

This is one time you can show that your allegiance is to Jesus Christ, and what you think about him is what really counts. It is the only thing that counts! Pats may come and Pats may go, but he goes on forever. If you really love Jesus you can love Pat Boone and all the rest of the brethren. You can even be mistaken about a lot of things concerning the Spirit and still go to heaven. If you can’t, heaven is going to be a mighty lonesome place! The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy and peace, and a pretty good way to demonstrate that you do not know the Spirit is to kick up a fuss and disturb the peace about how you think he works.

Flesh and Spirit

Mission Messenger (February 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

A month has gone by since we camped on the slopes of Romans 5. It is now time to shoulder our packs and start anew up the steep slopes of grace, gaining our initial toe-hold at Romans 6:1. Sin is flint-hearted and treacherous. And one of its potent weapons is rationalization. It uses this for self-preservation, seeking to hold captive those who are in its malign grasp and upon whom it feeds as a vicious parasite. Sometimes it approaches delusion from the negative side, sometimes from the positive, but always it has the black hood at hand to drop over the eyes of the victim, while the gallows starkly waits in the background.

Smiley Blanton, the psychiatrist, affirms that rationalizing “is the great narcotic that people use to anesthetize their consciences and justify yielding to temptation; an embezzler telling himself he is just ‘borrowing’ the money and will surely put it back. An unfaithful husband assures himself that what his wife does not know will not hurt her. In a thousand daily temptations from padding the expense account to exceeding the speed limit, the rationalizer’s attitude is ‘Everybody’s doing it, why shouldn’t I’?”

Paul anticipated just such an attitude toward grace. He had said some mind-staggering things about it. “God’s act of grace is out of all proportion to Adam’s wrongdoing. For if the wrongdoing of that one man brought death upon so many, its effect is vastly exceeded by the grace of God and the gift that came to so many by the grace of one man, Jesus Christ” (5:15). “For by the wrong-doing of that one man, death established its reign through a single sinner, much more shall those who receive in far greater measure God’s grace, and his gift of righteousness, live and reign through the one man, Jesus Christ” (5:17).

Then he dealt with the problem of law in respect to grace. “Now we find that the Law keeps slipping into the picture to point out the vast extent of sin. But where sin was multiplied grace exceeded it on an immeasurable scale . . . so grace could issue in eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord” (5:21). One can almost anticipate the reaction of the carnal mind to this. As sin multiplies, grace increases to exceed it, and since grace is essential to eternal life, the more it increases the better off are its recipients.

“What are we to say, then? Shall we persist in sin, so that there may be all the more grace?” From this, the apostle recoils and shows the absurdity of such a presumption. “No! No! We died to sin: how can we live in it any longer?” A dead building contractor does not draw plans for constructing a new housing project. A dead grocer does not propose to increase his income by expanding his business outreach. If the occupant of a casket suddenly sat up in his satin-lined box to discuss a blueprint with the mortician, it would be taken for granted he was not dead when they loaded him in the hearse. It would also have a visible effect on the funeral director.

Is it possible that a lot of people just play dead spiritually? When you see one who professes to be in Christ, but who is busily engaged in making plans to widen the scope of his sin, and extend his franchise for evil into new territories, can you not assume that he is employed by sin? The apostle uses his clincher argument. “Have you forgotten that when we were baptized into union with Christ Jesus we were baptized into his death? By baptism we were buried with him, and lay dead, in order that, as Christ was raised from the dead in the splendor of the Father, so also we might set our feet upon the new path of life.”

This is beautiful in its simplicity. It is regrettable that it ever got caught in the gears of the theological meat-grinder and was reduced to shreds. Certainly the apostle never dreamed that his statement would be put to the uses to which it has been subjected, to prove some things on one side and to disprove more things on the other. I do not propose to be lured from my theme to beat the bushes and thump the thickets in argument. I shall indicate a few things which seem to me to appear obvious and move on up, leaving the professional pugilists to pummel each other into a loving pulp over peripheral matters.

GRACE AND BAPTISM

The apostle saw no conflict between grace and baptism. As the greatest exponent of grace the world has ever known he had no concept of an unbaptized person in union with Christ Jesus. The very thought of death to sin caused his mind immediately to revert to the burial with Christ in which they lay dead, as a prerequisite to being raised with him. No man can be a faithful expositor of the Roman letter who belittles or negates either grace or baptism.

Either all who died to sin were baptized or the entire argument is rendered ridiculous. That no explanation of justification by faith which excludes being baptized into union with Christ Jesus, is fair to the apostolic letter, is apparent to the concerned student. Paul accepts the postulate that his argument based upon baptism will be immediately understood by all who have died to sin. He makes no explanation of baptism for no one questioned it. It would be a little silly to say, “Have you forgotten that when we were baptized . . . ?” if a bunch of them had never been and did not even think it was essential.

This is another good example of Paul's mastery of what I call the "as and so" reasoning. He employed it frequently. It is a balanced argument. On one hand you list under "as" all of the necessary elements. Then under "so" the same items must be catalogued. If one does not fit under "so" it must be removed from under "as," for these words signify a relationship of the identical.

What Jesus did to save all men, all men must do to be saved. The saving features of the Good News are three in number— that Christ died for our sins, that he was buried, and that he rose again (1 Cor. 15:3, 4). Christ identified with us in a body to die, be buried and rise again. So we must die, be buried and rise again, to be identified with him in a body. He did so according to the old covenant scriptures. We must do so according to the new covenant scriptures. As he died for sin we must die to sin. As he was buried we must be buried. As he arose from the dead in glory we must "rise to life on a new plane altogether."

I suspect there may be one little item in Paul's reasoning which a lot of my readers overlook. Because of the post-apostolic introduction of sprinkling and pouring as a ritual (they do not constitute baptism), a lot of us have been on the firing line and have sought for every argument to enforce our contention for immersion, which I accept as eminently correct. We have insisted that baptism is a burial, and it is, of course. But when Paul, who was not writing to supply our arsenal, speaks of being buried in baptism he uses two separate and distinct words.

It has been our contention that the original for baptism should have been translated immersion. To this, W. E. Vine takes pointed exception. He says that there is no word in the English language to translate baptizo, for it signifies more than dipping or plunging and includes coming out or being withdrawn. "The word baptizo was necessarily transliterated into English, as there was no equivalent in our language. 'To immerse' would be simply 'to plunge into.' To baptize is to put into water and take out again. It involves immersion, submersion, and emergence— death, burial and resurrection. The word was used among the heathen Greeks of articles which underwent submersion and emergence, as in the case of dyeing a garment” (The Epistle to the Romans, page 87).

If you have not read William Barclay’s comments on how the Jews and the Greeks would understand Paul’s reference to baptism and death, you have missed a great deal. We urge you to share in his insights by referring to his book in the Daily Study Bible Series, entitled The Letter to the Romans, pages 82-86. It will provide background material I have found in no other place.

To Paul, baptism was limited to believers, who were responsible adults. His very argument makes this essential. One would not ask a person who was sprinkled as an infant, “Have you forgotten that when we were baptized into union with Christ Jesus we were baptized into his death?” One cannot forget something of which he was never conscious at the time.

But we must get back to Paul’s purpose in mentioning baptism. The man who has been baptized has died to sin. He cannot engage in it to promote an increase of grace. He is not his former self. That self was crucified so the tyranny of sin could be broken. “For a dead man can safely be said to be immune to the power of sin” (6:6). “In the same way look upon yourselves as dead to the appeal and power of sin but alive and sensitive to the call of God through Jesus Christ our Lord” (6:11).

The appeal of sin! The power of sin! These affect us only when we are alive to sin. Dead men are immune to that power. Law increases sin by making us conscious of it. It serves the same purpose as the nerves of the body. These do not create pain but they make us aware of all the places in which it is present. The nerve of law has been deadened and removed. “Sin is not meant to be your master— you are no longer living under law but under grace.”

This makes legalists uncomfortable. A legalist must have a law or he cannot survive. He breathes law like the human body breathes oxygen. If God provides no law, he will take what God has provided and convert it into law. All of my life I have been around men who spin out their interpretations of God’s word designed to show that the Holy Spirit lied when he said we were not under law but under grace. Grace itself is a written code revealed, they argue.

The problem is that legalists always exercise selectivity. They choose some features of the law to which they willingly submit, while ignoring others. But those which they choose then become the criteria of righteousness. To these men must conform even though they utterly neglect other valid and vital provisions of God’s will. Men who live and walk by law have no idea of the restraint of perfect love. There must be a whip to crack. There must be threats issued and intimidation involved. Frequently those who bluster and abuse are insecure, walking after the flesh, hiding their emptiness with their fulminations, and in constant fear that they will be found out!

How can we keep men under control without law? How can we exercise supervision over them, and guarantee that they will cower and kowtow to the will of their spiritual superiors? Paul apparently anticipated the questions that would be engendered by the agitated souls who suddenly find out that law has abdicated and grace occupies the throne. “Now, what shall we do? Shall we go on sinning because we have no law to condemn us any more, but are living under grace? Never! Just think what it would mean” (6:15).

We shall allow you to read for yourself what it would mean in the ensuing context.

THE FREEDOM LEVEL

I am standing firm on the promises! I am not taking orders from the tempter any longer. I owe no debt to the old man. My former self is dead, buried and done for. I've moved on up to "a new plane altogether." On this level law cannot touch you. "Those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified the lower nature with its passions and desires." I'd as soon take orders from a corpse in a crypt as to be subject to the demands of my former life. Listen to this! "But now, freed from the commands of sin, and bound to the service of God, your gains are such as make for holiness, and the end is eternal life" (6:22). I believe that!

I do not intend to be ordered around by sin any longer. I shall not bow in meek subservience to the tyrant who once occupied the throne in my heart and drove me like a slinking slave. The blood of God's Son paid my price. He ransomed me. The old man has been dethroned, driven out, shot down by the shaft of grace. I am committed to the service of God. Where he leads me I will follow! It makes no difference what others do or say. I shall walk through detractors like Israel crossed the Red Sea. Every gain I make will be in the direction of holiness. And the end is eternal life.

I would not exchange the freedom I have for all the world has to offer. What a thrill to be in Christ! What a feeling of heady enjoyment comes from imbibing the Spirit. What an adventure to be able to go anywhere, to speak to anyone, to listen to anyone. My compassion reaches out to those who murmur and mumble, carp and criticize, whine and whimper. They never really died to the lower nature and are condemned to walk in a perpetual shadow, dragging along the heavy weight of their own foreboding. They are prophets of doom and presagers of evil. The sun is shining but they do not know it.

This kind of talk upsets a lot of folk. As they see it, those in Christ ought to be gloomy, alert for the worst, and alienated from sinners— other sinners that is! They mistake being somber for being serious. Instead of having happy feet on a joyous mission, they would prefer that everyone walk like a pall-bearer. But I want you to know that I have found that joy is a person. I am in that person. Don't try to sell me a bill of goods about Christianity being on the wane. Jesus Christ is not about to shut up shop and board up the windows. He is here to stay and I am going to stay with him. I am going to walk in the Spirit and not shuffle along with my head down. I have eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord. That is my gift and it is from Him.

Now, let's move on to Romans 7, where the first six verses are powerful medicine. Paul begins this account with a universally acknowledged fact. A man is subject to law— any law— only during his life span. “You cannot be unaware, my friends— I am speaking to those who have some knowledge of law— that a person is subject to the law so long as he is alive, and no longer.” To enforce his point he gives an illustration. “A married woman, for example, is bound by law to her husband so long as he is alive. But if he dies, then his legal claim over her disappears. This means that if she should give herself to another man while her husband is alive, she incurs the stigma of adultery. But, if, after her husband's death, she does exactly the same thing, no one would call her an adulteress, for the legal hold over her has been dissolved by her husband's death.”

This seems plain enough, but, in making the application a good many brethren get the illustration and miss the point. They conclude that God killed the law so we could be married to Christ. But this is not the case here. It was ourselves who died, and not the law. “So you, my friends, have died to the law by becoming identified with the body of Christ, and accordingly you have found another husband in him who rose from the dead, so that we may bear fruit for God” (7:4).

The body of Christ is the body that died on the cross. We became “incorporate with him in a death like his” (6:5). Jesus was crucified and those who were under the law, and accepted him, were crucified with him. They thus severed any relationship which they sustained before death. This included relationship with the law which was binding only until death. Jesus was raised from the dead. The crucified believers were raised from the dead. It was the resurrected ones who married, and the purpose of that union, as of marriage from creation, was to bring forth fruit unto God.

The prior marriage to law also produced fruit. But the union was on an inferior level. The parties lived in a basement apartment. The marriage was marred by sinful passions encouraged and stimulated by the party of the first part. “While we lived on the level of our lower nature, the sinful passions evoked by the law worked in our bodies, to bear fruit for death.” The law could not change the unspiritual nature of those wedded to it. Law is external. Its goal is conformation. What we needed was transformation.

Despite the good intentions of law, it only incited to sin. Its very prohibitions encouraged experimentation. Its denunciation created determination to taste the forbidden fruit. It was not the law that was weak, but the flesh. It perverted what it came to protect. Obviously a whole new plane of life had to be created with a level of life to which law could never aspire. It would not do to die to one law and then marry another one. Law has nothing to offer one who is raised from the dead. To be joined to another law would be to leap from the frying-pan into the fire! And the flames of legalism are hot.

The Christian who claims to be under law is really in bondage. He is carrying on an affair with another beneath his station. Law is only adapted to the lower nature. As Paul puts it, “We also know that the Law is not really meant for the good man, but for the man who has neither principles nor self-control” (1 Timothy 1:9). When a good person gets yoked up with one who was not meant for a good person, there's going to be serious trouble. Brethren who insist that they are going to be under law regardless of what anyone says, are like a good girl who gets taken in by a lecherous man. She isn't going to have an easy time of it.

That is why Romans 7:6 is a real fountain in the desert for me. "But now we are freed from the Law; we are dead to that which once held us fast! and so we are free to serve God in a new way, the way of the Spirit, not in the old way, the way of a written code." I confess that when I first became aware of the implications of this, I could not accept them. I didn't want it to read that way. If it did, I did not want it to mean what it appeared to be saying. I doubt that you can realize the inner turmoil churned up inside a heart which had been trained in the arrogant assumption that a certain faction contained all of the righteous people on earth, and their righteousness must be judged by their subscription to our partisan interpretation of a written code.

Such a party is always subservient to a clerical clique. The men who compose that clique are the real power behind the paper curtains. They determine for all what items belong to faith, to opinion, or to the realm of the indifferent. In their hands the word of God becomes a cudgel, a club with which to crush the skulls of brethren. By insinuation and innuendo they can ruin one who does not take his signals from their dugout. They hurl the thunderbolts of wrath through the pages of the printed media. They control the lectureships and manipulate the meetings under guise of loyalty to Christ. "They lean on the law and make their boast of God, and know his will, and understand the difference between right and wrong" (Romans 2:17, 18).

Thank God for deliverance from "The System." Thank God for grace! I do not care by what name "The System" is called. I do not care who the "some-whats" are who exercise dominion, be they popes, prelates or just plain preachers. I simply say that every sectarian attempt to enforce coercion by threat or compulsion is alien to the spirit of freedom which the blood of Jesus makes available. Infallible elders are more dangerous than an infallible pope, for they are closer at hand.

Every factional editor and leader on this earth, without exception, is erratic, inconsistent and capricious. Legalism produces that kind of character. It enslaves and degrades. It places a premium on ignorance and forbids one to learn beyond the limits of the organizational brain. The best member is not the one who thinks but the one who does not. I was in that kind of bondage. I served under it, promoted it, defended it and proclaimed it. And I am ashamed of it!

Now I am freed from law! I am dead to that which once held me fast in its talons. I am free to serve God in a new way, not under a new law, but in a new way! It was this I was afraid to acknowledge at first. I felt secure in the old way. There were no decisions to make because they were made for me. I was safe with the safety behind prison walls and bars. And then I found that God had built no walls. He had forged no bars. He had set no bounds except those of love for Him in his infinite mercy, and for my fellowmen in their infinite need.

I cannot get enough of His wonderful book. I turn to it with eagerness as a student who lays aside his textbook on jurisprudence to read again the love letters from his only beloved. I no longer search for "sermon material," but for means to share the heart-swelling, soul-stirring, blood-tingling message of a love so great human spit and iron nails and acanthus thorns and a wooden cross could not stop it until it reached down and touched me and left its brand of crimson stain.

I no longer engage in "acts of worship," which become stereotyped and conventional, prosaic and professional. Now I praise him in song and prayer and sharing. I want to give. I want to know the fellowship that enters into human sorrow and suffers with those who have not found the still waters, and whose restless souls cannot lie down because they have not discovered the green pastures.

The new way is exciting, fascinating, animating, and infectious. It is personal and persuasive. After trying for so long to find him in the pages of a book, in the letters and words and punctuation marks, I came to him fully, completely, and learned that he had found me first. I know how the disciples must have felt when they realized they had been walking with him, talking with him, questioning him, and listening to him. "Then their eyes were opened, and they recognized him." Paul's precious prayer has been answered for me. "I pray that your inward eyes may be illumined, so that you may know what is the hope to which he calls you, what the wealth and glory of the share he offers you among his people in their heritage, and how vast the resources of his power open to us who trust in him."

The great thing about the new way of serving God is that once you strip off the tattered garb of law and put on the new garment of grace, nothing else matters. You can be lied about, attacked, assailed, misrepresented, and cast out of the synagogue, but none of these move you. You can love your enemies and pray for those who spitefully use you. And you can do so honestly. That is something. Nothing that men can do will hurt you. You are not trusting in your own righteousness. "For now my place is in him, and I am not dependent upon any of the self-achieved righteousness of the Law. God has given me that genuine righteousness which comes from faith in Christ. How changed are my ambitions" (Phil. 3:9, 10). How changed are my ambitions! You can say that again, Paul.

The new way is the way of the Spirit. It is not the way of a written code. And that is a good point of contact with chapter 8. This is the magnificent chapter of the spiritual outlook which is life and peace (verse 6). It is the chapter of divine-human sharing of suffering here and of splendor hereafter (verse 17). It is the chapter of a universe on tiptoe waiting for the glorious hope (verse 19). It is the chapter of overwhelming victory, the march of the “more than conquerors” (verse 37). It is the chapter of the indwelling Spirit, directing, empowering, giving life, assuring of sonship, helping in weakness, and culminating the divine purpose in victory through Jesus!

THE POWER OF SIN

One who takes up the Roman letter and turns to chapter 8, and allows his eyes to wander over the words, is immediately confronted with the thought that he has a power-packed message of exciting encouragement in his hands. God has not simply “thrown the Book at us” and retired from the scene to watch from afar and see what kind of mess we make out of life. He invests us with a legacy of might and strength in the inner man which is incalculably greater than any force without.

And this is the most important fact on earth right now. Sin is not simply an intellectual concept with which to reason and wrestle. It is not just a skulking force without which we can overcome by flailing about us in the dark. Instead, it is a power which has seized the throne room of our hearts and through years of domineering in which we have been reduced to abject slavery, has weakened the will to resist. In fact, the inclination to give in and go along has made all of us victims of our own feebleness in the conflict.

Even though sin is driven out, and the heart washed and cleansed, it still lurks expectantly in the shadows. For sin is the weapon of a master-strategist who knows every weak spot in our character. He can exploit every fear, every emotion, every desire, with such a surge of strength that we feel resistance is useless. He can take human loneliness and use it as a wrecking-bar to tear down the strongest determination. He plants a seed and waits until it is matured and pushed out through the chinks of despair and despondency.

All of the good resolutions on earth will not offset this power. Each man is like a lost traveler in the snowy waste of the Yukon Territory, surrounded by a pack of fiery-eyed wolves. The pack awaits the inevitable moment when the fire goes out. Sleep will overcome the will of the man, or his meager fuel supply will become exhausted. The slavering jaws will move in for the bloody kill.

What is needed is for Someone to move into the inner compartment vacated by sin, someone who can man “the hot line” to heaven, who can buttress the sagging places in the dike and repair the faults and cracks with the cement of love. The relationship created must be one so personal that there is never a sense of being alone, forsaken or deserted. It must be Someone who neither slumbers nor sleeps, but who watches the battlements with unflagging zeal.

Moreover, the consciousness of this power within must be reflected to others. They must be able to tell that the house is occupied. The light must gleam through the windows. The flag which betokens that a royal guest is being entertained must be flying from the mast. There must be a change, a tremendous and startling change. Old things must pass away. All things must become new.

All things! Habits, disposition, tendencies, character! “You’ve changed,” must become the greeting of past acquaintances and accomplices. “You’re not the same man,” must be on the lips of those who still cling to sin and envy the swine the husks that they eat. It is my contention that precisely what I have described is what the Father has provided for those who become the willing captives of the Son. Anything less than this is life on the carnal level, and the person who indulges it is holding a gun against his own temple and robbing his own pockets.

It is my conviction that when Jesus left this earth to return to heaven, he requested that another helper be sent who would abide with us through the ages of his absence. That helper came! He is the Holy Spirit. He is here now and he dwells in me, empowering me to withstand the cosmic forces of evil. The Father, according to the wealth of his glory, makes me strong with power through his Spirit in the inner self (Eph. 3:16). This is the glorious promise. I accept it, acknowledge it and rejoice in it. Even though our struggle is against “unseen rulers and powers, against the lords of the darkness of this world, against the spiritual forces of wickedness in the heavenly world.” I am not even trembling. “I will fear no evil, for thou art with me.” No evil!

But what about those who say the Holy Spirit does not dwell in them, that God has furnished them a guidebook and written map and started them out on their own? I never argue with any person who says he does not have the Holy Spirit. I agree with him. I suspect he is right. Of course I feel sorry for him as he slogs along, lashing out in his own frustration at every brother who overtakes him while he is staggering along under the huge pack he is trying to carry by himself. But there is too much to do without stopping to flail away at folks who are happy in their misery and miserable because I am happy.

Romans 8 is one great chapter. It was originally written to men and women in a great metropolis sprawled along the banks of the Tiber River. Some of these were slaves, mere human chattels in a teeming, crawling, creeping mass of vice and corruption. One noted historian, after several paragraphs swimming in a depiction of unbridled degradation, writes: “But to dwell upon the crimes and the retributive misery of that period is happily not my duty. I need but make a passing allusion to its enormous wealth; its unbounded self-indulgence; its coarse and tasteless luxury; its greedy avarice; its sense of insecurity and terror; its apathy, debauchery, and cruelty; its hopeless fatalism; its unspeakable sadness and weariness; its strange extravagances alike of infidelity and superstition” (The Early Days of Christianity, by Frederic W. Farrar, page 2).

Here, in the capital of this pagan world came this word of light and hope to brighten the hearts of the humble and to make out of them a fighting force which would capture the world while shedding no blood but their own. I claim for myself that inner might which cannot be defeated by death. On the basis of this blessed chapter I expect to become more than a conqueror. And I invite you to explore it with me and savor that potential so great that it toppled the Caesars from their throne and made the name of Jesus known “from sea to shining sea.”

NO CONDEMNATION

There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.

Condemnation is the exact opposite of justification. Since the latter means to declare one guiltless, the other means that one has heard the sentence, “Guilty!” He is amenable to punishment and subject to death. One cannot be esteemed as guilty and guiltless at the same time, so those who are justified by faith and have gained access to grace are not under condemnation. There is no guilt assessed against them. They are free!

To be in Christ Jesus is to sustain an intimate relationship with him. It is not so much a matter of place or position, but of participation in a life, eternal life. In him no condemnation resides, for through faith one appropriates unto himself that righteousness which is Christ’s.

What is the flesh? What is it to walk after the flesh? We must be very careful here. There is ever the danger that we will equate flesh with the material body, and like modern gnostics, assume that matter is evil. That “the flesh” cannot refer to the physical body, its natural cravings and desires, is evident from verse 9, which says, “You are not in the flesh.” All of us are in the physical body even when we walk in the Spirit.

Nor must we associate the flesh with sex, which is a provision of God, and in no sense unclean of itself. Certainly, in its gratification it may be abused, and such abuse is a symptom of subservience to the flesh, but many other things not directly related to sexual passion are also a part of the flesh, as one may learn by reading the works of the flesh as listed in Galatians 5:19-21.

W. E. Vine says, “The flesh here stands for corrupt human nature, the dominating element in unregenerate man.”

William Barclay, in the concluding sentences of one of the most analytical treatises I have ever read, entitled, The Enemy in the Soul, has this to say: “The flesh is human nature as it has become through sin. Man’s sin, his own sin and the sin of mankind, has, as it were, made him vulnerable to sin. It has made him fall even when he knew he was falling and even when he did not want to fall. It has made him such that he can neither avoid the fascination of sin nor resist the power of sin. The flesh stands for the human nature weakened, vitiated, tainted by sin. The flesh is man as he is apart from Jesus Christ and his Spirit.”

C. H. Dodd says, “The flesh is the common stuff of human nature which we inherit.” He says it is in itself powerless for moral ends. He also affirms that “We are given a bias from the first by heredity and environment tainted with these things. Paul is right in seeking at a level deeper than individual choices for the roots of our moral malady.”

Ragnar Bring, who is an excellent example of the Scandinavian school of theological thought, and who produced the most provocative commentary on Galatians that I have ever read, says, “The flesh is therefore not conceived of as sexual desire, libido carnis, but could be described instead as a power in control of this existence which has taken possession of man’s soul and body and has perverted their activity.”

C. Norman Bartlett affirms that the flesh is unsanctified human nature, and represents all that we are apart from God.

Albert Barnes regards the flesh as human nature, corrupted by sin and selfishly concerned only with its own gratification.

My own “working definition” of the flesh is the nature of man, invaded and captured by the power of evil, which exercises the thoughts, desires and passions to produce destruction of the personality and decay of all those relationships in which man can become involved. It is man without God in the relationships of life.

Marriage is one of those relationships. Designed by a beneficent Creator for the propagation, perpetuity, protection, and happiness of a race made in his own image, under the dominance of the flesh it is often made into a living hell, ripping sensitive personality to shreds, and leaving the participants empty and wrung dry of the motivation or will to even go on living.

The social culture is another of those relationships. In a trenchant statement on this very matter, C. H. Dodd says, “But when all discount has been allowed, is it not true that the world into which we are born is under the dominion of false gods? Is it not true at this moment that, although the experts know the kind of thing which could and should be done to deal with the present world-wide depression, yet envy, hatred, greed, and fear so rule the peoples that little can be done?”

The word for walk is peripateo and it signifies “the whole round of the activities of the individual life,” as W. E. Vine so aptly phrases it. To walk after the flesh is to exist under the constant domination of the power of evil, that is, “to live on the level of our lower nature.” It is to surrender oneself to the force of evil, to simply drift with the tide, to go along with the unsanctified crowd.

It is my thesis that we do not reason ourselves out of this frightful state. We are captives and prisoners, part of the chain-gang of sin. We can no more free ourselves by thinking good thoughts, than a man can think himself out of the penitentiary dungeon. We have to be rescued. We must be saved. And that requires a savior. There must be a superior power which can invade the inner depths of the heart and throw the usurper out.

And there must be a power which takes up his abode in us, remains with us, and strengthens us with might in the inner man. Modern man is all hung up on outer space, which is merely a matter of adjusting computers and launching machines. But his real trouble is inner space, for here no machine can enter. It is the realm of the spiritual and is reserved for the Spirit.

It is all well and good to tell prisoners to do their best and try to improve their lives from day to day. What they need is to be set free and given a new life. Turning over a new leaf only gives you one more blank surface on which to scrawl your abject failures. It is here that any well-designed plan fails. After you try to dig yourself out and then come to the surface you find you are still inside the walls. We were made to be men and not moles!

FUTILITY AND FRUSTRATION

This has been the experience of countless souls of my acquaintance. They were “reared in the church” as they put it, and when they arrived at puberty, that traumatic period triggered off by the master switch of the glands, filled with vague fears and searching for stability, they went through “the steps leading to salvation.” Often this occurred in an emotional setting designed to bring them to a “response,” and occasionally there was an atmosphere bordering on mass hysteria. But they were now “in the church,” and for awhile there was a glow of inner satisfaction as they grew under the watchful care of the family circle at home.

Then it happened! Perhaps it occurred in college, perhaps not! How tragically simplistic we are when we lament, “College ruined my boy!” How easy it is to blame things, institutions and organizations, rather than to get to the real seat of the difficulty. Many of you will not like what I am now going to say. But I am weighing my words carefully and in full cognizance of facing them at the judgment.

There is no plan on this earth involving human obedience and acts of compliance which can of itself provide the power to live on the spiritual level.

There is no organization composed of human beings, membership in which can act as a force to free from the lower nature. And I mean no organization!

It is true that such membership may act as a deterrent to overt acts which are frowned on by the membership, or which run counter to “what is expected of one.” But very frequently such membership only encourages hypocrisy of the deepest dye, and develops a form of cowardice which restrains one from ever saying what he really thinks until he dies of bleeding ulcers or becomes a first-rate religious schizophrenic. And because of our neatly-contrived little plans created by playing tic-tac-toe with the scriptures, a lot of people at baptism change nothing but their clothing.

Certainly they are sorry for their past sins. Certainly they want to do better. They have resolutions firmly mixed up with their mental reservations and doubts. They are going to try and live more decent lives with their wives, their children, their neighbors, and even with “the Negroes who have pushed themselves into the factory and taken the jobs of white men.” They are going to watch television less and read the Bible more. They are going to go to baseball games only half as often and give the money to the church. They are going to get involved in “church work” and go out on “calling night” and see if they cannot talk others into being baptized. I hear about scores of them!

“Jack has started hitting the bottle and swearing again. He has quit going on Sunday and Wednesday nights, and is grumpy most of the time.”

“Bill has started staying late at the office again with his secretary. He had lipstick on his shirt collar the other night. He says the church is full of hypocrites and has quit attending with the children and me.”

“Jane gave me to understand that she wasn’t going to miss out on all of the fun since Jeff walked out on her. She has slept with three different men the last three months, and when I called her to invite her to the women’s meeting she said it was composed of a bunch of old biddies who don’t even know the game, much less the score. She still keeps the Bible on her living-room table and sometimes sets a can of cold beer on it.”

“Carl, what can I do? You remember that I wrote you three years ago how glad I was that we talked Jim into being baptized before the draft called him. Well, my heart is broken! He was placed in the stockade for defending himself when a bunch of no-good trash who are soldiers, attacked him. When he was home I found a letter from a girl when I searched his pockets. It was absolutely filthy. It seems she had made over my boy and talked him into doing something he shouldn’t. When I mentioned it to him, he flew into a rage and called me names. I am afraid the preacher and elders will find it out and want to drag him before the church, although God knows two of the elders have sons that are a lot worse than Jim!"

Empty lives will find something to occupy them. And you cannot pack in enough Bible verses to fill a human heart. Men can commit adultery who can quote every passage where the word occurs like a living concordance. They can give you the Greek so you can tell whether their acts should be classified as fornication or adultery. Packing a Bible in with your son's shirts or socks when he drives his Volkswagen off to the university will not guarantee his moral purity.

I am sorry to disillusion you, but membership in the religious clan, cult or community cannot provide the power to keep one holy when the chips are down and the fires are up and the demons are at the door. Some of the most unhappy, frustrated, bitter people on earth never miss a meeting of the church. Some of them have to go. They are the preachers! Others drag themselves in on Wednesday night even if they have had a "knock-down and drag-out" fight with the kids until they are so churned up inside they cannot even remember a thing as important as how many Philistines Samson clobbered with the jawbone of an ass, when the preacher directs the question to them!

What we must have in order to overcome is an inner dynamic which stems from relationship with the power source of the universe. And that is exactly what the Father has provided. The very Greek word for that power is dynamis. From it we derive such words as dynamite, dynamic, and dynamo. This power is the direct result of the indwelling Spirit. It is not self-generated. It is a gift. So Paul prays, "I ask God from the wealth of his glory to give you power through the Spirit to be strong in your inner selves" (Eph. 3:16).

To walk after the flesh is the fate of once-born men; to walk after the Spirit is the feat of twice-born men. This last is simply living the whole existence on the spiritual plane. The feet have been planted on higher ground. And on this level the power available to the individual is the “same mighty strength which he used when he raised Christ from death, and seated him at his right hand in the heavenly world.”

POWER AND PERSONALITY

This is a good time for me to say that I do not regard the Spirit as a nebulous mass or a gray cloud of protoplasm hanging over the world of mankind. Neither is the Spirit an attitude, temperament or inclination. Instead, the Spirit is a personality, a divine helper who understands, sympathizes with and encourages the child of God. The Holy Spirit is the presence of God in his life-giving force in the only temple he ever made—man himself! God is not an “oblong blur,” and the Spirit is not merely the corporate esprit de corps or morale of the community of saints.

Although by rational process as applied to the new covenant revelation, one can make a rather intricate and elaborate presentation in favor of the personality of the Spirit, I prefer to assign four simple grounds upon which I base my conclusion.

1. Attributes and Abilities.

The Spirit possesses a mind (Romans 8:27). The Spirit has the power of knowledge and comprehension of divine thoughts (1 Cor. 2:11). The Spirit is able to convey thoughts by speaking (1 Timothy 4:1), and to do so in words by which spiritual truths can be understood and interpreted (1 Cor. 2:13). The Spirit is capable of bearing witness to facts relating to another, on exactly the same basis as human witnesses may do so (John 15:26, 27).

Regardless of the position one may take as to the continuation of charismatic bestowals by the Spirit, no one who accepts the new covenant scriptures as authentic will deny that in Paul's day there were "varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit," and that "all these are inspired by one and the same Spirit who apportions to each one individually as he wills" (1 Cor. 12:11). One cannot give another what he does not possess, so the Holy Spirit shared with individuals what he personally possessed. It is obvious that these gifts were to be utilized by persons, and it seems just as obvious that since their possession was personal, they were bestowed by a person. The attributes of the Spirit are such as can only belong to an intelligent and communicative being.

2. Ascriptive Terms.

The personal pronouns relating to the Spirit indicate personality. Jesus told the sorrowing apostles, "I will pray the Father, and he will give you another Counselor, to be with you throughout the age" (John 14:16). There are two Greek words for another— heteros and allos. Heteros means another of a different kind. Allos means another of the same nature. Jesus requested the Father to send another (allos) Helper like himself, who could encourage, strengthen and support the saints during the age when he was absent. A great many of my friends are tripped up by the fact that this promise was made directly to the apostles. The apostles were the only ones with Jesus at the time when he spoke. But we must never forget that the apostles were also disciples, and the promise was made to them in both capacities. Whatever the Spirit was to do for them in the apostolic office was limited to them as ambassadors and envoys. But whatever was done for them as followers of Jesus, as his disciples, belongs to all of us until he returns at the end of the age. We all need help, comfort and strength! Turn to John 16:7-15, and notice the term of address used with reference to the Spirit.

“When he comes, he will convict the world of sin . . . he will guide you into all truth . . . he will not speak on his own authority, but whatever he hears, he will speak . . . he will glorify me . . . he will take what is mine and declare it unto you.” Suppose you just read these words to someone, and asked him if he thought the reference was to a person. He would be forced to answer in the affirmative. Jesus was not speaking of something, but of Someone. Certainly a person would be grinding a theological axe to reach any other conclusion.

3. Actions.

The word for Comforter is Paraclete, which means “one called to the side of another.” It expresses the purpose for which the Spirit comes. He takes our part and stays with us to help. We must not be led astray by the word Comforter. In our day it may mean one who dries our tears in time of grief, or one who speaks reassuringly when the going gets tough. But it means much more than that. The word “fort” is used of a stronghold, a place where one can defend himself against attack. So a comforter is one who comes with strength or power to enable us to hold out and to resist.

Jesus says that the world cannot receive the Comforter. The world does not know him and will not admit him. But he also says, “You know him, for he dwells with you, and will be in you” (John 14:17). I know that this is true. I have no empty apartment in my heart. There’s an “occupied” sign on the door. W. E. Vine writes: “With and in! What a power for every experience in life.”

The Spirit teaches and recalls to memory (John 14:26). The Spirit reproves (John 16:8). The Spirit guides, hears, speaks and reveals (John 16:13). The Spirit transfers things from one person to another (John 16:15). The Spirit can be grieved, and grief is an emotion which can only be experienced by rational persons (Eph. 4:30). The Spirit makes intercession, as does Jesus, thus proving that he is truly a helper like the Son (Romans 8:26). These are all the actions of a living person, not of a fuzzy mental concept. The Spirit is not a state of mind. He is a being with a mind.

4. Associations.

The Spirit is always associated with other persons and these constitute the Godhood, a much better word than godhead, embracing all that we regard as Deity. There is a great difference between recognition and definition of Deity. The first is possible for human beings, the second is not. The limitations of the finite mind make it impossible to gather the infinite up into any kind of container or enclosure, verbal or otherwise.

We are to baptize into (not in) the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit (Matt. 28:19). With reference to spiritual gifts, the three divine persons are associated. There are varieties of gifts, but bestowed by the same Spirit; varieties of service, but rendered to one Lord; varieties of working, but all motivated and inspired by one God (1 Cor. 12:4-6).

The apostle includes in his benediction the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. 13:14). God is love, this is his essence. Grace is bestowed through and in the Lord Jesus Christ. Fellowship is that state of sharing in eternal life which results from the indwelling Spirit. Man can no more create fellowship than he can create the love of God or the grace of the Lord Jesus. He can only share in them. He has no power to turn them off and on. If the love of God or the grace of Christ were subject to whims and eccentricities of men, they would not be worth having. The same thing can be said of what men call "fellowship," but which results from a coalition of the party spirit and not from the consolation of the Holy Spirit.

If you wonder why I omit 1 John 5:7 at this juncture, let me state that I think it is an interpolation. I do not wish to try and bolster or shore up a contention by employing such a shaky timber. But I have already presented enough proof to demonstrate that the Holy Spirit is associated with the Father and the Son, and upon the basis of sound interpretative rules we have no right to assume that two of these are personalities while the third is not.

It will be my position, as we study further our relationship to the divine through the Spirit, that the Spirit is a personality, and that our bodies are temples created for a sanctuary in which the Spirit may dwell. God has no holy places, holy days or holy things, in the kingdom of heaven. He has only holy persons. He is not worshiped in temples made with hands. Buildings of brick and stone may be “dedicated” to the service of God, and be empty of the power of the Spirit. Man has no power to consecrate or sanctify. That is the domain of the Spirit, and we are usurpers when we seek to capture the right.

We must now lay away the pen for another month. What a thrill to know that we are guiltless by divine declaration because of the relationship with Jesus. “There is no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.” The past holds no remorse. The future holds no fears. The present has no sense of guilt, no shadow hanging over the soul to obscure the sunlight of His blessed love. Praise God for that righteousness which is by faith, and not by legal rectitude! Praise God for the opportunity to serve Him by loving and helping all who were made in His image!

In our next issue we will explore what is meant by the law of the Spirit of life as opposed to the law of sin and death. We shall determine what the law could not do because it was robbed of its strength and power by our own lower nature. Most important of all we shall study the difference between life in the basement and life in the penthouse, life on the lower level of nature and life on the spiritual level. William Barclay writes:

The Spirit-controlled life, the Christ-centred life, the God-focused life is on the way to life. Daily it is coming nearer heaven even while it is still on earth. Daily it is becoming more Christlike, more one with Christ. It is a life which is such a steady progress to God that the final transition of death is only a natural and inevitable stage on the way. It is like Enoch who walked with God and God took him. As the child said, 'Enoch was a man who walked with God— and one day he didn't come back.'"

And let me add in closing that when a Christian dies he does not leave home, he goes home!

The Spirit of Life

Mission Messenger (March 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

“For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death” (Romans 8:2).

What is “the law of the Spirit of life?” A law is a rule of action, a governing principle. In Christ Jesus the animating principle is the Holy Spirit and the life we share is the life of the Spirit. It is the Spirit who quickens. In this passage, W. E. Vine says, “The phrase ‘the Spirit of life’ is not subjective, ‘the Spirit who has life;’ but objective, ‘the Spirit who gives life.’”

In the physical body, the spirit is the vitalizing or animating principle. All that I am able to accomplish in physical existence is dependent upon that spirit. Without it the body is dead. By the same token, it is the Holy Spirit which makes possible my functioning as a spiritual being. Without the Spirit I am merely an automaton, a mechanical doll, a puppet, going through religious motions, but with no real life or power. It is possible to have a form of godliness but deny the power thereof (2 Tim. 3:5). This is the state of millions. They are dolls, not children. They toy with life but have never really lived!

What is “the law of sin and death?” It is the principle which is described in the previous chapter, by which evil exercises dominion over the desires and prompts one to sin even against his own wish. It is described as “sin that dwelleth in me”

(7:17), overpowering the will and rendering personal resolve as helpless. “I find then a law, that, when I would do good, evil is present with me” (7:21). Paul declares, “This is in continual conflict with my conscious attitude, and makes me an unwilling prisoner to the law of sin and death. In my mind I am God’s willing servant, but in my own nature I am bound fast, as I say, to the law of sin and death.”

Barclay says that Paul is here describing “an experience which is the very essence of the human situation.” He declares, “He felt himself to be a split personality. It was as if two men were inside the one skin. He felt himself pulled in two directions. He knew himself to be a walking civil war. He was haunted by this feeling of frustration, the ability to see what was good, and the inability to do it; this ability to recognize what was wrong, and the inability to refrain from doing it.”

I know, both from personal experience and from observation, the frustration which comes from trying to find your way out of the labyrinth which sin has constructed. I know how, when one is bounded and harassed by his own inner compulsions, he resorts to false bravado and arrogantly seeks to throw his weight around to project an image which is really a shadow. No one is a bigger hypocrite than the preacher who leaves the impression that he has thought out all of the answers to the problems of life, while on the inside he is a seething mass of his own unfulfilled desires, some of which would hardly bear exposure to the light.

Paul said, “It is an agonizing situation, and who on earth can set me free from the clutches of my own sinful nature?” Human nature can take a lot of beating and we keep trying. Preachers, counsellors, doctors, psychologists, astrologers, soothsayers— we frantically run here and there every time an acquaintance mentions a new guru. In reality, none of these can help. They bring temporary relief because we have to talk and anyone who will listen provides respite from the ghastly emptiness within. But inevitably we have to go back home, and we are not fit for ourselves to live with.

There's no use getting a new moral prescription. Morality is simply trying to live up to a code, whether devised by one's own thinking or dreamed up by someone else. But we cannot free ourselves. And no one on earth can free us. Not until we come to realize the staggering implications of this fact will we ever be free. We can listen to sermons every Sunday morning from now on and be no better off. Sermons can be preached to prisoners. They can also be preached by slaves. We need to be free from ourselves. The old man of sin is a rotting, decaying putrefying corpse to which we are chained.

THE WAY OUT

Paul says there is a way out! "I thank God there is a way out through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 7:25). This is the greatest news ever brought to a man lost in a cave, a man behind bars, a soldier held captive by the enemy. There is a way out! And that way is provided by the indwelling Spirit. The Spirit does not simply cut one strand of the rope which binds me to my lower nature. He cuts the rope. He frees me from the unending cycle of sin and death! I am infused with new life, not confused by the old one. Love supplants carelessness, joy supplants despair, peace supplants inner turmoil. It is not a new way of life, it is the new life of the Way! The way out is the way in— to Christ!

"The law never succeeded in producing righteousness—the failure was always the weakness of human nature. But God has met this by sending his own Son Jesus Christ to live in that human nature which causes the trouble. And, while Christ was actually taking upon himself the sins of men, God condemned that sinful nature" (8:3).

This is a fascinating statement of two things— the utter incompetency of law and the magnificent provision of grace which stops at nothing in the rescue mission of the ages. The law could only succeed in condemning man even while seeking to condemn sin. It could never produce a right relationship with God, for by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified.

Law demands absolute obedience in every particular if it is to justify. There can be no deviation, not even in the slightest issue. Perfection in conformity is demanded and the very moment one falls short he is under condemnation. Thus, before one can keep law he must be perfect, but in such a state he would need no law. The giving of law is postulated upon man's weakness, and he is thus condemned by the very thing which was to save.

The lower nature makes it impossible for man to achieve righteousness by law-keeping. Regardless of how powerful law may be, man is powerless to obey it in perfection. He continually suffers from remorse, guilt and fear, as he lives in the three dimensions of time— past, present and future. There was no need for God to repeal one law and then impose another. What was needed was a transformation of nature. God did not send a new law. He sent his Son. The first covenant was one of law. The second was a person.

Jesus adopted our human nature. He emptied himself and took upon him the form of a slave. He was made in the likeness of man. He was tempted in all points as we are. He tested the strength of law and triumphed over it. He fulfilled the law and in doing so earned the right to adopt men unto himself rather than adapt them to the demands of law. Because he was sinless he could take our sins and he did so. By his own blood he purchased our freedom from the guilt of sin.

It is sin which is now under condemnation, not persons who are in Christ. They are free from condemnation, being declared guiltless in Him. What does this mean to me? It means the difference between slavery and liberty. I am no longer under the dominance of sin. Sin is now the prisoner in the dock. I am free! The culprit who sought to destroy me has been apprehended and found guilty. I have been declared guiltless. Praise God that sin no longer has dominion. Its reign has been broken. It has been dethroned, disgraced and degraded.

“That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit” (8:4).

The righteousness of the law is the state or condition at which the law aimed. Law was intended to provide justification by creating a code of conduct to which a man must subscribe and by unremitting obedience earn the right to be guiltless. But there was “a fly in the ointment,” and a flaw in the system. It was human nature, the lower nature, in which dwelt no good thing. The will was there “but how to perform that which is good I find not.”

It was for this reason that the law which was intended to work good actually became an instrument of death. As we learned before, the very prohibitions of the law became suggestions and invitations to sin. What God did was to send Jesus to redeem us from the power, as well as from the guilt and consequences of sin. In order to accomplish this our old man of sin was crucified and we were made partakers of the divine nature, a nature which rises above the need of law.

Through this means, the righteousness which the law attempted to produce was made possible. The law was a failure because the lower nature was a failure. We were elevated to another and superior plane in which we were no longer under the dominion of the flesh and sin could not exercise dominion over us. On this spiritual plane, and through the power of the Spirit, man was able to attain unto justification.

“For they that are after the flesh do mind the things of the flesh; but they that are after the Spirit the things of the Spirit” (8:5).

There are two kinds of persons who will read what I am writing. One is described as “after the flesh;” the other “after the Spirit.” They may both have their names on the same church roster. Indeed they may be husband and wife. Those who are after the flesh live in the domain of the corrupt human nature. They are directed and controlled by it in every phase of existence. It determines what their reaction will be to any facet of life. They respond on the animal level.

The word for mind is phroneo. It means to think, to set the mind in a certain direction. It is not mere acting upon impulse or casually. Instead, it involves reflection and determination. Those who are governed by the flesh have surrendered themselves to the lower nature. They are guided by the things of the flesh.

In Galatians 5 there is a catalog of the things of the flesh. Included in the works of the flesh are sexual immorality, impurity of mind, sensuality, worship of false gods, witchcraft, hatred, quarreling, jealousy, bad temper, rivalry, factions, party-spirit, envy, drunkenness, orgies, and things like that. Satan has cleverly disguised some of these and deadened our sensibilities to them.

“For to be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace” (Romans 8:6).

I know a man who lives in a moral sewer. The fingers of his mind grope in the muck and he feeds his soul on slop and garbage. Every sentence he utters is sprinkled with profanity. There is nothing sacred to him. He will twist any statement in his warped mind and give it a suggestive slant. His throat is an open sepulcher. The poison of asps is under his lips. His mouth is full of cursing and bitterness.

One day a friend said to me, “What will happen to a man like that when he dies?” I replied, “He is already dead.” We make a mistake when we always equate death with the cessation of the intake and expulsion of air through the nostrils, or the failure of a muscular organ to palpitate. There can be an insensitivity of the heart to the purer things of life. Rigor mortis of the soul can occur while fleshy tissue walks about. God speaks of those who have “hardening of the heart” even when there may be no hardening of the arteries.

There is a lower level of the human nature in which one exists as in a state of living death. It is a penal colony in the dark jungles of corruption. Here the understanding is darkened and the dwellers are alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that is in them, because of the blindness of their heart. Being past feeling they give themselves over to lasciviousness and work all uncleanness with greediness.

Death is a separation, a disintegration, an alienation from life, and one who is alienated from the life of God is dead in trespasses and sins. He walks according to the evil ways of this present age. He obeys the commander of the spiritual powers of the air, the spirit now at work among God’s rebel subjects. This is the realm of sensuality where men obey the promptings of their own instincts and notions. It is a fearsome valley of the dead, and over it hangs the dark cloud of God’s impending dreadful judgment. One who is given over to self-indulgence is dead while he lives (1 Timothy 5:6).

I am not so irrational as to think that this is a dominion without a ruler or a kingdom without a monarch. The “kingdom of darkness” has its sovereign as does “the kingdom of light.” There are evil ones, but there is also “an evil one.” “We know that we are God’s family, while the whole godless world lies in the power of the evil one” (1 John 5:19). “Everything the world affords, all that panders to the appetite, or entices the eyes, all the glamour of its life, springs not from the Father but from the godless world. And that world is passing away with all its allurements, but he who does God’s will stands for ever more.”

This I believe!

The evil one has no greater weapon at his command than confusion of terms and values. The faithful prophets have always known this and cried out against it. “Woe unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter” (Isaiah 5:20). It is noteworthy that in this context there are five specific woes pronounced.

One is against syndicates, combines and monopolies, organized to build houses and apartments so close together that there is no room for privacy and meditation (verse 8). Another is against those who turn day and night into feasting coupled with hard drinking and blaring music (11, 12). Another is against those who are so tied to sin that they openly flaunt it while challenging God to do anything about it (18, 19).

The fourth is against intellectual snobbery which causes its victims to parade their learning as the ultimate in wisdom and prudence (21). The last is against those who brag about their ability to hold liquor, and who concoct new recipes for mixing their whiskey, wine and vodka (verse 22), and defend the wicked for political prestige. Human nature has not changed, and for this reason the need and nature of the prophetic message has not changed.

But I hold that in our day the most deceptive trick employed by “the dark ruler” is to confuse the minds of men as to what constitutes freedom. By this they are led to feel that they are free to sin, while sin is the greatest enslaving force of the universe. The flattering of the ego by a false use of the word “free” is the very technique employed by the spider to entice the fly into his death lair. Men who heed the siren call to this freedom are free only to die. To be carnally minded is death—death by one’s own choice, suicide!

To be spiritually minded is life and peace. To be “spiritually minded” is not simply to think nice things, but to live on the upper level where the Spirit controls. It is to be in the dominion of the Spirit. It is to be made new in mind and spirit, to put on the new nature of God’s creating, which shows itself in the just and devout life called for by the truth. It is important to see that it is not merely cleaning up the old life, but the reception of a new nature, a complete transformation. Man can no more create himself again than he could create himself originally. Creation is a work of God, not of creatures.

To live on this new level is to be constantly renewed in the image of the Creator and to come to know God. It is to be incorporate with him, and thus to pass beyond the reach of the elemental spirits of this world, to be no longer subservient to the flesh and its demands. Having been raised to life with Christ, we are enabled to aspire to the realm above, that is still higher, where Christ is seated at the right hand of God.

In this present thought-realm one is able to project his thoughts still higher, being freed from the quicksand which formerly sucked at his feet. One who is being pulled into the mire can only concentrate on the mire. The apostle writes, “Let your thoughts dwell on the higher realm, not on the earthly life. I repeat, you died; and now your life is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, is manifested, then you too will be manifested with him in glory” (Col. 3:3, 4). The reason the spiritually minded have life is because in the Spirit they have Christ, and Christ is our life!

They also have peace, peace with God. This is also through Christ. It is his peace, and we share in it. “Let Christ’s peace be arbiter in your hearts: to this peace you were called as members of a single body. And be filled with gratitude.” An arbiter is an umpire, one who rules and regulates the game. Those who are not in Christ are playing without a referee. They are also playing without a ball, and merely kicking each other.

The field of action is the heart. When decisions must be made the peace of Christ makes them. When peace blows the whistle it is always right and just. Peace settles things and inner serenity is the result. There is no taking a chance, no losing the game, no failure to score. There is no remorse, no weeping in the dressing-room, no second-guessing, no wishful thinking. In Christ one cannot lose. “If God is on our side, who can be against us?” (Romans 8:31). “It is God who pronounces acquittal: then who can condemn?” (verses 33, 34).

“Because the carnal mind is enmity against God: for it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be.” So reads Romans 8:7.

We have already learned that “the flesh,” as Paul uses it, does not refer to the physical body composed of tissues and cells, and carrying out its various organic functions designed to exhibit life. Now we must learn that “the carnal mind” does not refer to the brain with its cells and convolutions. The flesh and the carnal mind are the same. They are terms used to designate the lower nature, which is under captivity to sin. It describes man as a sometime unwilling slave condemned to do the bidding and bow to the whims of a harsh and cruel master.

On the plane of this servitude one cannot rescue himself. That which is righteous is always beyond his grasp. Man is like Tantalus, condemned to stand in a stream whose waters always receded when he stooped to drink, while the fruit on the branches dangling above always remained just out of reach. There was ever the growing intensity of agony created by the sense of helplessness and futility. “I discover this principle, then: that when I want to do right, only the wrong is within my reach” (Romans 7:21).

It is at once apparent that on this level of hatred, recrimination and growing bitterness, a mind incapable of thinking its way out of the predicament, stymied in every move, will be at enmity with God. Driven by passion, motivated by lust, and with only wrong within reach, there will be only depraved reason. In such a state there is no recognition of or subjection to God.

Here is a description of what the carnal mind, alienated from God and shrouded in a dark curtain of blackness, produces. “Thus, because they have not seen fit to acknowledge God, he has given them up to their own depraved reason. This leads them to break all rules of conduct. They are filled with every kind of injustice, mischief, rapacity and malice; they are a mass of envy, murder, rivalry, treachery and malevolence; whisperers and scandalmongers, hateful to God, insolent, arrogant, and boastful; they invent new kinds of mischief, they show no loyalty to parents, no conscience, no fidelity to their plighted word; they are without natural affection and without pity.”

It is specifically declared that those in this condition are not stupid or unlearned fools. Quite the contrary, they are informed in the lore of this passing age. But “their thinking has ended in futility, and their misguided minds are plunged in darkness. They boast of their wisdom but they have made fools of themselves.” The carnal mind is a misguided mind, that has sought to eliminate God from his universe, a mind that postulates existence and order without a Creator, and ends up creating disorder which threatens its own existence!

Spirit and Word

[Abstract]

It is my intention, if God wills, to share with all of you the answers to certain questions raised by readers and related to the Holy Spirit. I concur with the feeling of the ancient Athenaeus, who said, "We feed on questions." I also recognize the truth of the statement of Publius Syrus, "Not every question deserves an answer." I am not at all interested in binding my views upon anyone. You are under no compulsion to agree with me. I shall love you just as much if you do not as if you did.

The subject of the power and working of the Holy Spirit is a live issue in our day. This is as it should be. However, the human mind is so constructed that it often clamps down upon a conclusion and after that no fact is strong enough to pry the jaws open. A recognition of our fallibility should cause us to be a little less dogmatic. One need not have an empty head because he has an open mind.

We have already had one question a dozen times. The wording is not always the same, but boiled down and simmered away it is this. "Do you think that the Spirit operates independent of the word of God?" Most of you will at once recognize this as a "Church of Christ question." Every religious party has its own peculiar questions. This is true of Adventists, Baptists and Catholics. I just chose those three because their special titles begin with A, B, and C. I could have substituted “Church of Christ” for the latter, but our brethren do not like to be placed that close to Baptists.

Peculiar questions grow out of particular views and interpretations, and it is these which separate and herd us into various corrals. You can generally tell which sect one is identified with by his questions. If you meet a Baptist in Timbuctoo he will ask you the same leading questions as one in Topeka or Toledo. Members of the Church of Christ ask the same things in California as in Connecticut. It requires no great amount of wisdom to determine why this is so.

All sectarians must be able to categorize and pigeon-hole those with whom they speak. They at once begin sorting persons and filing them in various slots. The easiest way to do this is by asking certain “basic questions.” The Jehovah’s Witness cult is almost as adept at this as personal workers for the Church of Christ. I get a real kick out of the fact that I do not give the answer the “Witnesses” expect. They become fumblingly frantic because I keep my feet on the ground and smile when they expect me to run up a tree and growl.

What do my brethren mean by “not operating independent of the word of God?” Do they think that the Holy Spirit is now captured in and contained by the book we call the Bible? Did the Holy Spirit write himself out of existence and render himself into the “cracklings” of words, so that he is now bound in morocco, nylon-stitched and stamped in gold? Do they imply that the only help I can derive from the Spirit in time of severe temptation and deep distress is to stumble on to a verse which, if properly understood and applied, will serve as a crutch on which to hobble out of the problem area and clamber out of the danger zone? If that is what they mean (and in a lot of cases it is), I do not need prayer as much as I need an exhaustive concordance and time to search it before the Devil closes in and breathes his sulphuric breath down the collar of my Arrow shirt.

We need to face up realistically to the fact that many people in the Church of Christ do not really believe in the Holy Spirit at all. This will be protested to high heaven. There will be agonized denials, but when you sort out all of the factional verbiage and burrow through the pile of cliches and traditional explanations you will see that this is true. The Spirit is equated with the word. He is a book. It isn't a question of how he works because he doesn't really work at all. You do the work. You search the scriptures. You try to live up to them. You sink or swim. And Jesus and the angels look down to see whether you can beat the sharks off with the right quotations, or whether they will cut you to ribbons because you are "a brother in error."

I believe the holy scriptures are the product of the Holy Spirit. I recognize in them the revelation of the divine mind. They constitute a weapon in the use of which I must become proficient because I enlisted to fight an enemy and not just fuss with the brethren. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, but there is as much difference between the Spirit and his sword as there is between a man and his pocketknife. That sword was supplied for me to use and not for the Spirit to use. The Holy Spirit existed before one word of revelation was given. He was active in creation of this universe before man ever came into being.

The Spirit did not retire when sixty-six documents were gathered up after a considerable debate and bound in a single cover. And the Spirit possesses unlimited power. He did not reveal himself out of existence. He ante-dated the revelation of the first word beamed to a human mind and there is no indication that he later "passed a law" to handcuff himself to the fence he built around men. Certainly he functions in harmony with the word. He will not contradict what he revealed. The word is God's word. The Spirit is the divine agent of its transmission.

I believe that the revelation of God's purpose in word was completed with the apostles and prophets whom he prepared as qualified human vehicles. I do not believe the Spirit is revealing additional material today. We have in the scriptures all the revelation we need and all God wants us to have. It will do until the Lord shouts and we rise to meet him in the air. And what I know about what the Spirit does I learn from the word. However, I believe it all, every bit of it. This is a little embarrassing to some of the brethren who are specialists and who jump over what they don't like.

There are two kinds of people on earth as respects the kingdom of heaven— aliens and citizens. And there are two messages, one for each, and addressed to their particular needs. The gospel is for aliens. When they have obeyed it they are no longer aliens. The gospel is the good news about Jesus. The Spirit operates on the heart of an alien only through this. No one was ever led to receive Jesus as Christ and Lord by the Spirit where the gospel was not proclaimed. Men must be born again of the incorruptible seed of the word of God. That word is the gospel which is proclaimed. It consists of facts about Jesus.

But the function of the Holy Spirit in the saints of God is different. The world cannot receive the Spirit because the world does not see him or know him. But the disciples of Christ know him because he dwells with them and in them. And he was in them before the first apostolic letter was written. They were filled with the Spirit and empowered by the Spirit from the day the good news was first announced as a fact. It was twenty years before Paul wrote to the Thessalonians. The Spirit did not suddenly switch over and start operating in Christians "solely through the word," because the new covenant scriptures were not collated and compiled for a hundred years.

Do you want to know what the Spirit personally does for me? Let me tell you. He sheds abroad and pours forth the love of God in my heart (Romans 5:5). That love is a fruit of the Spirit, and it enables God to love through me. It creates within me a divine nature, a sharing in the very life and essence of God, for God is love.

The Spirit puts to death all of the base pursuits of the body (Rom. 8:13). He makes it possible for me to cry “Abba! Father!” and this is one of the splendid blessings of our relationship (Rom. 8:15). This does not mean that he makes it possible for me to pronounce these words. Any one in the third grade could say them. A vile sinner could utter them. But the Spirit brings me into a genuine relationship with the Father, so that these words become meaningful as a cry of praise and gladness, and as a call in time of need.

The Spirit comes to my aid in times of weakness in prayer and when I do not know how to ask. He pleads for me when I am not articulate. He translates my very groanings into words which reach the ear of heaven as the unburdening of deep yearnings (Rom. 8:26). He conveys to me strength and power in my inner being (Eph. 3:16). I have often experienced this, making me utterly unafraid in conditions under which I would be frightened if I had to rely upon my own strength. He provides that eternal life which I share, since he is the very source of life to God’s children (Gal. 5:25).

All of this the Holy Spirit does in conformity with the word of God and not in contravention of it. But he does it personally, and not simply through my feeble human mind, grasping and groping for the significance of words and sentences. The theory advanced and adopted by a lot of brethren actually argues the Spirit out of existence. He becomes a mere anomaly. Instead of being a powerful helper he is powerfully helpless. I do not buy that kind of thinking. It negates and makes void a great part of the new covenant scriptures.

I am thrilled that I have been made a partaker of the Holy Spirit. I have experienced the goodness of God’s word and the spiritual energies of the age to come. I know the power which dwells within my physical frame, this tent which I must some day discard. I know the surging strength which comes to help me be more than a conqueror when the enemy comes in like a flood.

I am resolved that no one will revere the scriptures more than I do. They mean more to me every day that I live. I love to wander through the mental vistas which they open to my wondering eyes. I love to gaze at the far-off horizons of intellectual comprehension to which they beckon. I revel in the ideas which the words kindle within my rational powers. But my covenant relationship is a personal one, living, throbbing, pulsating with hope and joy. It is not written with pen and ink but with the Spirit on the fleshy tablet of my heart. I am joined to the Father through the indwelling Spirit.

The glorious faith did not begin with a book but a baby. The Lord was not a body reduced to words. He was the Word received in a body. And the Spirit cannot be trapped and shut up in a library, not even a divine one. Yet he dwells in me as a royal guest visiting a rude tenement of crumbling clay. He invests me with a divine nature so I can love as God loves and respond as Jesus would to the stark agonies and screaming heartaches of this life.

And my reaction must be spontaneous and natural, not plotted, planned, or perpetrated for personal gain or political prestige. If I have to run home and get my lawbook and look up what I should do every time I am confronted with an emergency I am a legal puppet and not a living person in Christ Jesus. The Spirit helps my weaknesses. The Spirit furnishes the power that I need. And he does this because he is the helper and the comforter which my precious Lord promised.

Let men quibble and dispute about whether the Spirit operates only by citing a passage, or quoting a scripture. I have no time for such debate any longer. I have given up the thought that my human comprehension will ever enable me to be strong enough to even overcome myself. I am surrendered absolutely and unreservedly to Christ Jesus. I am trusting in His righteousness and not in my own. I am looking to him for life and light. As the Spirit within opens up new insights when I hold the sacred book in my hand and read it, I am drawn ever closer to him who left heaven to become closer to me.

Let me answer the question boldly and unashamedly. Yes, the Spirit operates in my heart and in the inner man directly, personally and powerfully. This makes it possible for me to experience how great is the breadth and length and height and depth, and to know, though it is beyond all knowledge, the love of God. That is why I can truly say without reservation, “To him who is able by the power at work in us to do more than all, far beyond all that we ask or think, to him be glory in the church, and in Christ Jesus, through all ages, for ever and ever.”

Re-Baptism

Mission Messenger (March 1971)

[Abstract]

All that we can rationally and scripturally say of those who believe in Jesus on the testimony of the apostles, and who understand not the doctrine of Christian immersion (of which there are very many persons, I presume, immersed and nonimmersed), is that they cannot here have that confident enjoyment of the remission of sins, that “peace of God which passes all understanding,” enjoyed by the primitive Christians and by those who now understand and obey the apostolic gospel; but we cannot say that they never can be pardoned here nor hereafter. This can be said of those only who despise the salvation of God, and who know, but will not do, the will of our heavenly Father.

Let me once more say, that the only thing which can justify re-immersion into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, is a confession on the part of the candidate that he did not believe that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God— that he died for our sins, was buried, and rose again the third day, at the time of his first immersion— that he now believes the testimony of the apostles concerning him, and desires to be buried and rise with Christ in faith of a resurrection to eternal life.

The instant that re-baptism is preached and practiced on any other ground than that now stated— such as deficient knowledge, weak faith, a change of views

— then have we contradicted in some way and made void the word of the Lord, “He who will believe and be immersed shall be saved,” then have we abandoned the principles of the present reformation, instituted experience meetings, committees for examining candidates, changed the bond of union, and made something else than the belief of the gospel facts the faith of the gospel.

A scene of confusion, such as was never excelled in any community, will obtain in our churches: persons with whom we have communed at the Lord’s table for seven or ten years will occasionally take it into their heads that they did not understand baptism at the time of their immersion — that they were hypocrites all the while, and must now get up from the Lord’s table and go to the water, confess the Lord, and be immersed. Thus all confidence will be destroyed; and these twice and thrice immersed persons, fond of making converts to their practice, will be agitating the minds of other brethren, urging the weak and credulous to be baptized as a substitute (in fact) for walking more closely with God: for every member of a church who thinks of improving his experience, or increasing his enjoyments by going to the water of baptism, has been living in disobedience or wilful neglect of his duty, not coming daily and constantly to the throne of grace, not walking with God, not keeping his commandments. Reformation, and not immersion, is wanting in all such cases.

Editor’s Note:

The above quotation from the pen of Alexander Campbell appears on page 63 of Volume 7 [1836] of the Millennial Harbinger. The entire article will bear reading by those who, in our generation, un-christianize all who have not been baptized by “one of our preachers” as it is sometimes stated. This reminds me of a statement made by David Lipscomb, as follows:

To single one motive or blessing and make the understanding of this the one necessary condition of remission, to the neglect of others, is on a par with selecting faith as the one condition of salvation, ignoring all others. Indeed, it is worse, because faith is the great leading principle of all obedience, and more fully embraces all the duties man owes to God, and obligates to all acts of obedience, than any other requirement of man. So if any one act alone justified, it would be faith. But to take one promise that involves what God obligates himself to do and make the understanding of it the sole condition of acceptable baptism, ignoring other ends and promises embodying man's duty to God, is to do violence to the word of God and become a factionist. I repeat that a baptism submitted to because some preacher or church thinks you ought to be baptized is not a whit better than infant baptism performed because the parents think it right. To get every one to have a faith of his own, and to act upon it, is the end to be sought.

The Indwelling Spirit

Mission Messenger (April 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

“But ye are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit, if so be that the Spirit of God dwell in you. Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his” (Romans 8:9).

Once more we must remind you that to be “in the flesh” has no direct reference to being in the physical body. It is contrasted with being “in the Spirit.” One of these is antithetical to the other. But the Spirit dwells in or abides in the body as in a living organism. “Do you not know that your body is the sanctuary of the indwelling Spirit, and the Spirit is God’s gift to you?” (1 Cor. 6:19). We must abide in the body to provide a temple for the Holy Spirit, but we dare not be “in the flesh,” that is, on the lower level of the human nature. That is the plane in which sin rules as a tyrant and moral anarchy is the order of life.

This passage is important because it uses the terms Spirit, Spirit of God, and Spirit of Christ in one verse. All apply to the same personality. Peter declares that the prophets were motivated and instructed by the Spirit of Christ, even before Jesus came (1 Peter 1:11). He informs us that this was the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven to prompt the apostles. The term Spirit refers to the nature, Spirit of God to identification with Deity, and Spirit of Christ to his affinity to the Word who became the Messiah. The Anglo-Saxons employed the word “ghost” for the inner man, while the Latins used spiritus. Thus, the Authorized Version uses these interchangeably. But because of the way the word “ghost” is used in our generation it should no longer be applied to the Holy Spirit, although it was legitimately so used by King James, who commissioned the translation which often bears his name. The Spirit is a holy guest, but not a holy ghost.

Thus, the Spirit is said to dwell or abide in us. This is not a brief stay by a passing friend, but tenantry for life, or so long as we permit. The proof that we are living on the higher plane of spiritual existence is the indwelling Spirit. God moves into a meaningful personal relationship with us on the upper level and rules over our life. The dominance of sin is broken. It has no more claim upon our members. We are set free by the grace of God.

Regardless of what claim may be made or what acts are performed, one simply does not belong to Christ if he does not have the Spirit of Christ. Man is an earthen vessel, a pot of clay, and the indwelling Spirit gives him value. Without the Spirit man is an empty jar occupying space on life’s shelf, but providing no real contribution to the world. The value of a jar is determined by its content.

We have been tricked into thinking that if we go through certain motions on particular days of the week, reciting rituals, fiddling with forms, and piddling with platitudes, this proves that we are alive and in tune with God. But Walt Disney Studios produced a mechanical Abraham Lincoln who duplicates in every lineament and feature the Great Emancipator. You purchase a ticket and take a seat before him and when the clock reaches the proper minute the robot gets up, steps forward and recites the Gettysburg Address.

A lot of awe-struck tourists think this is wonderful. But I’ve been accustomed for years to seeing men and women arising mechanically on Sunday when the clock struck a certain hour and moving to a meetinghouse where they woodenly recite “The Lord’s Prayer.” Then they retreat to their original position as if it were all over until the clock strikes again a week later. They are no more real than Disney’s Lincoln. The spirit is absent from the latter and the Spirit is absent from the former. Regardless of what else one may have, if he does not have the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. Every person who is Christ’s has the Spirit of Christ, every person who has the Spirit of Christ is Christ’s. It is just that simple.

“And if Christ be in you, the body is dead because of sin; but the Spirit is life because of righteousness.” (Romans 8:10).

Christ dwells in us in and through the Spirit. This union is spoken of from two aspects. We are in Christ and Christ is in us. This means that the attributes which belong to the divine nature are ours in which to share. They are available unto us. Paul wrote to Corinth, “All things are yours, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come; all are yours, and ye are Christ’s: and Christ is God’s” (1 Cor. 3:21-23).

It is difficult for most of us to accept this. We are so conditioned to thinking about what we “give up” to follow Jesus, that we never think of the gains which accrue. There is deposited for us in the bank of heaven tremendous resources upon which we can draw, but often we do not know the account has been opened, or we are reluctant to draw upon it. We want to keep it for “a rainy day.” We forget that things to come are ours as well as things present. In Jesus there is no rainy day.

God has provided us a book of prayer checks. The supply is as inexhaustible as was the oil in the widow’s cruse (2 Kings 4:1-5). There is sufficient to meet every need. Unfortunately, we think of Christ as a mere historical figure in the past, or as a far-off ruler who is coming again. Both of these describe him, but they ignore the “things present” facet. Christ is in us. He is the same Christ he always was. His power has not eroded away or become depleted.

He is “made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30). Whatever is implied in these glorious terms we have in Christ. He is our peace (Eph. 2:14). Our peace is not based upon a creed, concordat or conciliar agreement. It is not a pact, proposal or prepared document. If Christ dwells in me I am at peace with God. And I am at peace with every other person in this universe in whom Jesus dwells. That is why it is a universe and not a multi-verse. Versus means to turn, and universe means to “to turn or bring together in one.” The Spirit of God which originally brought order out of chaos in creation, brings the new creation together in one body. This is the action of the Spirit and not the result of human arrangement.

That is why the only unity of which God speaks is “the unity of the Spirit.” It is a gift. It can neither be achieved nor attained. It must be accepted. Our responsibility then is to guard and keep it with the bond of peace. It is silly for men to hold conferences and arrange conventions to promote unity. Unity does not need to be promoted. It has already graduated. Our task is not to promote it but to appropriate it. If Christ is in you, peace is in you, because He is our peace.

This does not mean that you will not die a physical death. It is appointed unto men once to die. We must either all die or all be changed. Flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom that is everlasting. Sin has taken its toll. Death has passed upon all men. So we must either be resurrected or reconstructed. The trumpet will sound and the sound will not be uncertain. The fact that Christ is in me is no guarantee that my body will not die. It simply removes the venomous sting of death. If Jesus is in me while I am awake and alive, I will sleep in Jesus when I die.

Jesus did not remove physical death. He simply conquered the one who wielded the power over it, and delivered those who were all of their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death. Death is not a monster any more than sleep is a monster. It is not a tragedy but a transfer. “Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord.” To die in the Lord means that the Lord lives in you!

If Christ be in you, the Spirit is life. It is eternal life. “He that hath the Son hath life” (1 John 5:12). “And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son.” If the Spirit dwells in you, eternal life is yours now. You do not have to die to collect it. The life of God is the gift of God to His children. It is our present possession.

The Spirit is life because of righteousness, just as the body is dead because of sin. My body is not dead because of my sin, but because of sin, the sin of one man. So the Spirit is life, not because of my righteousness but because of the righteousness of another which is imputed unto me. “As by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation, even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life.” It is not my righteousness which makes life, but his righteousness. I could never be righteous enough to merit eternal life, but thank God, it is not on the natural plane that I receive it. This is the promise of God. I do not stagger at this promise through unbelief. I accept it, thrill to it, and rejoice in it, as one who is strong in faith, giving glory to God. The Spirit is life! Praise God for that!

“But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you” (Romans 8:11).

The most momentous fact of history was the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. On this fact all else in our relationship to God depends. If Christ was not raised the Christian message is empty and there is no content to faith (1 Cor. 15:14). If Christ was not raised the apostles are liars (15:15). If Christ was not raised those who died in him are gone. They have perished (15:18). If Christ was not raised all hope is limited to this life and we are miserable above all men (15:19).

Jesus did not prove he was the Son of God by dying on the cross. That proved he was the Son of man. He proved divine Sonship by his resurrection (Romans 1:4). It is true that Jesus said no man could take his life from him. He had power to lay it down and he had power to take it again. But he also said that he had received this commandment from the Father (John 10:18). God raised him from the dead as the first fruits of the great harvest of those who are asleep.

The same power that was exercised in raising Jesus from the dead dwells in us through the Holy Spirit. “How vast the resources of his power open to us who trust in him. They are measured by his strength and the might which he exerted in Christ when he raised him from the dead, when he enthroned him at his right hand in the heavenly realms” (Eph. 1:19, 20).

God will quicken our mortal bodies by the Spirit. To quicken means to make alive, to empower with life. The word “mortal” means subject to death. Its root form occurs in such words as mortician, mortuary and post-mortem, all of which relate to death. Of course God will raise us from the dead, but he will give us life and power now. The “resources of power” which were employed to raise Jesus are now available to all those who live in him.

It is a great source of comfort and reassurance to realize that whatever God demands of us he furnishes the power to accomplish. We need not be hesitant about moving into any situation to which God calls us. He is able to bring us safely through. We need not fear what men shall do unto us. The shield of faith is capable of deflecting all of the fiery arrows of the evil one. Most of us are defeated by our own doubts.

A great watchword of the faith is found in these words, “The Lord is near; have no anxiety, but in everything make your requests known to God in prayer and petition with thanksgiving. Then the peace of God, which is beyond our utmost understanding, will keep guard over your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus” (Phil. 4:6, 7). The encouragement to allow God to deal directly with every problem of life by making our requests known to him in everything is a powerful incentive. All that we need he will supply, richly and fully. Life itself is the gift of his Spirit.

“Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh” (Romans 8:12).

The lower nature, the old life of sin, has no further claim upon us. We have been ransomed from its grasp. We have been redeemed from the slavery and bondage in which it held us. I owe nothing to my unregenerate nature. I have been born again. Old things have passed away. All things have become new. My previous concerns “I count so much garbage for the sake of gaining Christ and finding myself incorporate in him” (Phil. 3:9). “Circumcision is nothing; uncircumcision is nothing; the only thing that counts is a new creation! Whoever they are who take this principle for their guide, peace and mercy be upon them, and upon the whole Israel of God.” If the only thing that counts is new creation it is obvious that what belongs to the old life is no longer to be valued at all.

Paul said he wrote off all supposed assets of his past because of Christ. He did not merely discount them. He counted them sheer loss. He took out bankruptcy on his past and placed all of his hopes in Christ Jesus. There was nothing left but Jesus. This is not just a good way to live, it is the only way to live!

Fully understood this means, for instance, that the former alcoholic needs alcohol no longer as an inward booster. Alcoholism results from fear of inability to cope with problems. The alcoholic feels a sense of rejection and compensates for it by leaning upon liquor as an escape. This settles nothing because he must return to reality or drink himself into oblivion. Good resolutions will not solve the problem. When the going gets rough there is an overpowering temptation to take a drink to fill up the emptiness. Preaching and counseling will not overcome it. There must be a real vital sense of relationship to God including a recognition of an indwelling Helper who is the power source for conquest of self.

Paul knew the reason for alcoholism, so he wrote, “Do not make yourselves drunk with wine; that leads to loose, wild living; but be filled with the Spirit” (Eph. 5:18, 19). One who is not filled with the Spirit is empty and vacuous. But filling with the Spirit is the alternative to drinking for the man who is insecure. I do not share the view of those who talk about “intoxication of the Spirit,” for the very word means to poison. There is no toxicity of the Spirit. One cannot drink of the Spirit too deeply. The more he drinks the better off he is. We are stimulated by the Spirit in the inner man but not drugged by him.

Indeed, I am quite thoroughly convinced that an acceptance of the Spirit as a result of genuine faith in Jesus Christ can recover one from the clutches of drug addiction. There is a physical aspect to the problem which means that Satan must be conquered and thrown out of his stronghold. This means that the frightful symptoms of withdrawal must be undergone and the living hell involved must be faced. One can be helped through the awful ordeal by those who once had the clawing monkey on their backs but who won through to victory. (Here I must mention that at least two college people who were addicts and who came to know Jesus testified that they escaped the withdrawal symptoms through prayer. I am sure that it will not always be this way).

The devil does not turn any of us loose easily. He fights for his territory where he staked his claim. But “the Son of God appeared for the very purpose of undoing the devil’s work” (1 John 3:8). It is affirmed that Jesus has overcome the world. This includes the power structures of the world. The fact is that we need no longer be under the dominance of any sin. Even drugs, which distort brain images and disorient life can be thrown out by the Holy Spirit. Best of all, the indwelling Spirit can give meaning to life so that the factors which led to drug addiction can be alleviated and corrected.

Many of our social problems are related to the sense of loneliness which accompanies our computerized culture. It is true that man is in a crowded world, pushed and shoved about by the teeming mass. But it is also true that there is a lonely crowd. It is evident in the gigantic mass of tranquilizers and soothing drugs, plus pain relievers, consumed every year. Our society is dependent upon foreign substances introduced into the body to enable men to eat, to refrain from eating, to sleep and to stay awake.

A realization of the closeness of God, a sense of the power provided from on high, a positive acceptance of the Spirit to dwell within, can change all of this. The Holy Spirit is not provided as an esoteric or mystic influence, but as a positive helper, enabling us to love ourselves and to love others, including our enemies. Thus we can share in the creative force of the universe which can re-create our personalities. Much of what we call recreation only fatigues us more and wears us out. It saps our strength and vibrancy.

It is not enough “to feel like a new man.” We must become new men. And that is exactly the function of the Spirit of God. It is unfortunate that a lot of pseudo-sophisticates in our day dismiss what we have been saying as a species of wishful or fanciful thinking. They are content to believe that they are big enough to bear all of the problems of life without help from God.

They think that “all of this talk about the Spirit” has been concocted and dreamed up by mental weaklings.

But life has a way of catching up with us. When we played marbles as boys we spoke about “taking roundings,” which meant that we moved around the ring and got into a position from which we could shoot a rival out of the ring. And life does not remain static. It “takes roundings” on us. The cumulative tensions stretch us taut on the inside and break us. The rug is jerked out from under us when we think we are standing firm. We are kicked out of the plane without the parachute of faith. We wanted to be free and now we take a free fall!

The wisecracks about religion fail us when we crack up ourselves. In his book Modern Man in Search of A Soul, Dr. Carl Jung writes, “I should like to call attention to the following facts. During the past thirty years, people from all civilized countries of the earth have consulted me. I have treated many hundreds of patients . . . Among all my patients in the second half of life—that is to say, over thirty-five— there has not been one whose problem in the last resort was not that of finding a religious outlook on life.” But the great psychoanalyst was unable to help a lot of his patients because of his own denial of the factuality of the testimony concerning Jesus of Nazareth. When you hand people a rope with which to pull themselves up it will do little good if it is not fastened to something above.

As I write I cannot forget a girl in a midwestern college. When I first met her on a speaking trip she was a gay drop-out from Christianity. She came up to taunt me and tell me that she thought I was a quaint throwback to medieval times, and she didn’t think there was anyone else like me on earth. She couldn’t understand why I was so positive and unrelentingly certain about God and why I insisted upon an ethical soul slant and mental bent which was based upon an absolute.

She went the route and had her fling, laughing at old fuddy-duddies who still talked about such things as faith and hope, as if they were real. Drinking, gambling, toying with sex and using her body like a passport to the dream world of popularity, she came to the end of life's alley. And it was bricked up and she was walled in. Jilted by the man who had impregnated her, disillusioned, bitter, helpless and hopeless, sick and vomiting, she decided to end it all.

But she decided while her eyes were red with weeping and the sobs were catching in her throat, that she would call and confess she had been wrong and now it was too late. She then expected to gulp down a handful of "goodnight" capsules and go the way of all flesh. But I convinced her that man's extremity was God's opportunity, and prayed for her over the telephone, talking to God for her while she listened. She is now back in the fold. She came in out of the cold. Here's a brief quote from one of her letters:

I'm home again, home with God and the angels, with the Spirit in my soul and heaven in my heart. I'm home with my parents, with Dad and Mother, and it is wonderful to have peace and a clear conscience from God's forgiveness."

She is right, so right, and I am glad that she found the way home through the Spirit! Home is where the heart is!

The Spirit of Adoption

Mission Messenger (May 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

“For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live” (Romans 8:13).

I know a man who is on “Skid Row.” He is unkempt, unshaven and filthy. The cast-off clothes which he wears hang loosely upon his gaunt frame. His sockless feet can be seen through the holes in his worn shoes. He is a “wino,” a human derelict cast up like a piece of driftwood on the littered beach which is a city street. Each evening at dusk he shuffles into Lighthouse Mission and sits stolidly through a religious service so that he will be entitled to the bowl of steaming stew and the mug of hot coffee. If he has the thirty-five cents, panhandled from passersby earlier in the day, he pays it for a place to “flop” and sleeps in a stupor, oblivious to the groans and snores and sodden curses of the roomful of men who often snarl at one another like so many caged beasts.

The man was not always thus. I knew him in better times. In fact I baptized him many years ago. He was one of a number of people whom I led out into a clear Ozark stream one Sunday afternoon for the purpose of immersing them into Christ. It was at a spot of such natural beauty that the angels must have smiled upon it. I heard of him again when I got a letter from his anguished parents telling me he had run away from home in a violent rage when they had tried to thwart some of his wild tendencies. They wanted me to find him and talk with him. I did so. He seemed to respect me— in a detached sort of way, but he told me he was going to have his fling and he did not want anyone standing in his path.

I went to see him later when he was in jail. He was ashamed and he could not understand why I would come. He told me he was not in my class and that I should not waste my time on people like himself. I pointed out that we were two sinners talking together and that both of us were in need of God's mercy, and neither of us had anything to brag about. I asked him if I could pray with him, and although it embarrassed him, he replied, "I guess so." But before I prayed he said, "It won't do any good. I've tried and I haven't got what it takes. I'm too weak. You might as well forget me and let me go to hell!"

It was by sheer accident I saw him again. I parked close to a liquor store downtown and I saw him coming out. I hardly recognized him. He was bleary-eyed and had a raw inflamed cut on his face where he had fallen and struck his cheekbone on a rock. He had a bottle of the cheapest wine and he was fumbling with it trying to open it. I stepped in front of him and he shuffled to a halt. I said, "Do you remember me?" He shook his head in negation. I said softly, "Do you recall when I baptized you in the creek down home one Sunday afternoon?" For a moment it appeared that he would strike me or shove me out of his way. Then he turned and walked away. He did not look back and he said no word.

I have often wondered if it could have been different. When I baptized him I knew little about the Holy Spirit. I was concerned about getting people into "the right church" and having them go where the correct slant of doctrine was taught. I wanted them to be sheltered under an umbrella where the issues which seemed of such tremendous importance to us were emphasized always. I think now, although the thought is abhorrent to me, that baptism may have been an end, instead of a means. I am persuaded that all too often converts were so many “scalps” to dangle from the poles of our factional tepees. We were interested in getting people into the water. We may have thought that mere performance of an act automatically brought them into a vital relationship with Christ Jesus.

I am not sure that we talked a great deal about mercy, lovingkindness and grace. To us grace had but one office to perform, the writing and imposition of another legal code, the least infraction of which would damn us. Certainly, as I look back on the meetings which I conducted, I have little recollection of delivering messages about the empowering of the Holy Spirit from within. So those who “came forward during the invitation hymn” were left to go it alone in an unfriendly world, still beset by the same desires, drives, urgings and fleshly compulsions as before.

We gave them a sense of forgiveness for their past transgressions and they often wept in the knowledge that the old things had passed away. But it was not true that all things had become new. Some things became new. They had a new set of duties. They had to “attend church” three times per week. They had to give money into the treasury on Sunday so the church could “get the glory.” They had new people to whom they had to be hostile, friends and neighbors who went where they had instrumental music or opposed Sunday Schools. Before they became identified with “the loyal church” they could attend meetings with any of these, but now that they had been made free by the blood of Christ they must show their “loyalty to the church” by spurning invitations which others mailed to them.

We created conformists but they were void of life. They were puppets who acted when we pulled the strings. They responded automatically, like a congregational machine. If one objected to our procedure, or questioned our right to prescribe life like a factory schedule, we circulated word around that he would have to be watched. He was a potential troublemaker. If he insisted on thinking for himself we charged him with “rebellious against the elders,” some of whom never had an original thought in their lives. Then we withdrew from him. This made it scriptural to ignore him and insult him, to treat him like “a heathen man and a publican.”

We left people empty. There was an inner void, a vacuum, a secret chamber created for the Spirit of God to occupy, to fill with divine love, to flood with power. Unoccupied, it became a dark dungeon of futility and despair. The black bats of doubt flew in and out. Dusty cobwebs of moral weakness, woven by poisonous spiders of suggestion, hung from the rafters of the soul, filtering out the gentle sunlight of divine concern. And a spirit of languor and lassitude made the muscles of the inner man flabby. He became unable to resist the whispering of the demons, the burning desires, the flaming darts of the wicked one. The shield of faith lay rusting on the floor of life's closet, buried beneath the soiled clothing flung off in moments of remorse created by times of indulgence in gray yesterdays which were all alike, times of battles halfheartedly fought and always lost.

“I’ve tried and I haven’t got what it takes. I’m too weak. You might as well forget me and let me go to hell!” He was staring at me through bars when he said this. His face was puffed and bloated. He was not at all the same fresh-faced country lad who took his turn and waded out to where I was braced in the swirling waters of a stream so clear that I could see the darting minnows as I gently laid him back and buried him in the liquid sepulcher. That day he was not thinking of going to hell. He was starting on the road to heaven. He was strong in determination and resolute in his promise to God.

But I knew little to tell him about the Spirit who would come in and help in time of need when the adversary was pressing hard and the going was rough. Even when I visited him in jail I was still trying to encourage him to reform on his own, to lead a better life, and to behave differently. So I wonder what might have happened if I would have told him at the beginning how we can become more than conquerors through that inner power which is a blessed gift from above. It might not have made any difference, but I wish I had known.

If you live a certain life you will die. If you die a certain death you will live. That is what Paul is saying. If you live on the lower plane of your natural life, down on the ground level, the end is death. Sometimes it is a living death, agonizing and drawn out like that of the one whom I have described. It is possible to walk around dead. The world is a living charnel house, a place of ghosts and corpses, masquerading as men. But they are dead — dead in trespasses and sins.

The road to life lies in the mortification of the deeds of the body, that is, the flesh. We sometimes use the word mortify as a symbol of embarrassment or shame. We say that a person was mortified by his mistakes. But Paul is not talking about that. The word means to kill, to visit death upon. To mortify is to put to death, and one can kill the deeds of the flesh only through the assistance of the indwelling Spirit. The New English Version has “base pursuits” for “deeds of the body.” That seems like a good translation. In any event, we cannot maintain the works of the flesh. The spirit of carnality must die if Christ rules!

SONS OF GOD

“For all who are led by the Spirit of God are sons of God”
(Romans 8:14).

The original for led is ago, and there are two things that may be said of its usage in the new covenant scriptures. First, it generally applies to persons, and has to do with their motivation to go in a certain direction or to accomplish a certain thing. Second, it implies willingness and cooperation on the part of those who are led. The leading is not by force. It is not against the will.

To be led by the Spirit is to surrender to the influence and guidance of the Spirit, that is, to walk after the Spirit, as previously indicated. This is a proof of divine sonship. Only sons of God will be led by the Spirit, and thus, when one is so led it is indicative of his personal relationship with God. This is quite different than the measuring-rods employed by men.

Jesus placed the term “son of God” on a higher moral plane than a mere tie of relationship with the Father. There are certain characteristics stated as conditions. For example, only peacemakers can be truly regarded as children of God (Matthew 5:9). If one belongs to a religious organization and has a good knowledge of scripture, yet is guilty of sowing discord among brethren, or of refusing to labor for peace, he cannot be called a child of God. True children of God wage peace as actively as others wage war.

Again, Jesus postulates love, even for those who spitefully use you and are enemies, as the criterion of sonship. He says, “Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, so that you may be sons of your Father which is in heaven.” It is our contention that this love is a fruit of the Spirit. It is shed abroad in our hearts by the Spirit. It is at once obvious that sons of God must be led, directed, motivated by, and filled with the Spirit of God.

SLAVES AND CHILDREN

“For you did not receive the spirit of slavery, to relapse into fear, but you have received the Spirit of adoption, enabling you to cry out, ‘Abba, Father!’ And the Spirit himself testifies with our spirit that we are children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and fellow heirs with Christ, provided that we suffer with him in order that we may be also glorified with him” (Romans

It is difficult to understand the spiritual implications of a term if one is not familiar with its natural relationships. In our culture, “the spirit of slavery” may be passed over lightly by a modern reader. We have never experienced the agony of physical slavery and cannot fully appreciate “the spirit of slavery” as applied to sin. On the contrary, we may regard the life of sin as a pleasant time of indulgence which we are called upon to give up or “sacrifice” for Jesus Christ. Thus, the life in Christ is actually regarded as a bondage to which we surrender ourselves, more or less reluctantly, in order to secure a reward.

This was not the case with the citizens of Rome. One writer of note says, “The epoch which witnessed the early growth of Christianity was an epoch of which the horror and degradation have rarely been equalled, and perhaps never exceeded, in the annals of mankind.” Of the state of things in Rome at this time. Canon Farrar writes, “At the lowest extreme of the social scale were millions of slaves without family, without religion, without possessions, who had no recognized rights, and towards whom none had any recognized duties, passing normally from a childhood of degradation to a manhood of hardship, and an old age of unpitied neglect.”

The French historian Du Page declares that it can be fairly well authenticated that there were sixty-million slaves in the Roman Empire when the gospel was first proclaimed. We are indebted to Cornelius Tacitus, the Roman historian who was born the year Paul began his third preaching tour, for the information that the slaves were so numerous that they were divided and registered according to their nationalities. And Seneca, the philosopher, who was the brother of Gallio before whom Paul was brought (Acts 18:12), writes that every slave was under a constant cloud of suspicion as a potential enemy.

To illustrate the fear which was associated with slavery I need mention only one incident recorded by Tacitus. The Roman Senate was debating the murder of Pedanius Secundus by one of his slaves. C. Cassius Longinus arose and gravely argued for enforcement of the Silanian law, which made it mandatory to kill all of the slaves owned by a master who was murdered. One after another of the senators came to the rostrum and cast their votes for this sanguinary law. When it is remembered that such masters often owned hundreds of slaves and that these were in constant jeopardy by the act of one hot-head or brutal criminal, it can be seen how cheaply life was regarded by the patricians or ruling classes.

The citizens of Rome could make an immediate application of Paul's statement to the fear of slavery and degradation of sin. The fact is that his letter to the Romans was written just the year before the meeting of the Senate described by Tacitus. There was nothing glamorous about slavery. Slaves were sustained only by the faint hope of some day being free, or by the certain hope of death. And while we are a long way from the conditions which then obtained we can still offer a few suggestions about "the spirit of slavery" to sin from which we have been set free by the grace of God. Praise His holy name!

1. Slavery to sin destroys human dignity, reducing one to the animal level and making him a victim of passion and inordinate desire. Peter writes, "But these men, with no more sense than the unreasoning brute beasts which are born to be caught and killed, scoff at things outside their own experience, and will most certainly be destroyed in their own corruption."

2. Slavery to sin demands all of our powers and resources and places every faculty under tribute. When sin reigns in our mortal bodies it exacts obedience to the body's desires. It forces us to put all of our parts at its disposal as instruments for wrong doing (Romans 6:12, 13).

3. Slavery to sin reduces us to abject servitude and then pays off with death. “When you were slaves of sin you were free from the control of righteousness; and what was the gain? Nothing but what now makes you ashamed, for the end of that is death” (Romans 6:20, 21).

4. Slavery to sin brings only misery and despair. “We know that the law is spiritual, but I am not; I am unspiritual, the purchased slave of sin . . . Miserable creature that I am, who is there to rescue me out of this body doomed to death?” (Romans 7:14, 24).

5. Slavery to sin forces its captives to breathe the polluted and poisonous atmosphere of fear. They are all of their lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death (Hebrews 2:15), and fear brings with it the fear of judgment (1 John 4:18).

Against the frightful state conjured up in the mind at mention of “the spirit of slavery” is brought to bear another term “the spirit of adoption.” No more significant expression could be used to indicate a complete transformation in the Roman mind. From slavery to adoption would be like a Horatio Alger book “From Rags to Riches.” Only if we understand the legal adoptive process can we ever grasp what the apostle is really saying.

Fortunately, there has been preserved in Roman annals and laws a great mass of material related to the adoption process which was a very serious business in Rome. I trust that you will forgive me if I present to you the fruit of my own research and study for which I am indebted to many sources.

Notice my use of the expression “very serious business” with reference to Roman adoptive procedures. It was made especially serious because of the law called patria potestas. This was the law which gave a father absolute authority over his offspring so long as they lived. It conferred upon the father the right to punish a son regardless of the age of that son. He could kill his son and no one could lift a finger against him. Gains, a respected interpreter of Roman jurisprudence said, "The right of dominion which we have over our children is peculiar to the citizens of Rome, nor is there any race of men who have a dominion over their children similar to ours."

In 450 B.C., there was a revolt of the plebs, or common people, against the patricians. It was alleged that the latter abused the unwritten law and took advantage of the former, denying them their civil rights. The magistrates, in order to avoid a revolution, were commissioned to draw up a code, which they did, inscribing it upon ten tablets which were accepted by the popular assembly. Later two more tablets were added to make the great body of laws known as Lex Duodecim Tabularium, the law of the twelve tablets. The laws were enshrined in the forum and became the supreme law of the land.

The patria potestas stemmed from the second stipulation of the fourth tablet which provided for "the control of the father over his children, the right existing during their whole life to imprison, scourge, keep to rustic labor in chains, to sell or slay, even though they may be in enjoyment of high state offices." A son could not own a foot of land in his own name while his father lived.

I do not want to bore you with details, but we must try and catch the atmosphere in Rome when Paul wrote to the Romans of slavery and adoption. In order to do this I want to insert a quotation from Dionysius of Halicarnassus. His testimony is especially valuable because he was a Greek historian living in Rome at the very time when Augustus issued his decree for the whole Roman Empire to enroll in the census for taxation purposes. Dionysius wrote Roman Antiquities, a history of his adopted city from its inception to the year 264 B.C., in twenty volumes. Nine of these have been preserved in their entirety, and in one of them is this description of the patria potestas.

“The law-giver of the Romans gave virtually full power to the father over his son, whether he thought proper to imprison him, to scourge him, to put him in chains, and keep him at work in the fields, or to put him to death; and this even though the son were already engaged in public affairs, though he were numbered among the highest magistrates, and though he were celebrated for his zeal for the commonwealth. Indeed in virtue of this law men of distinction while delivering speeches from the rostra, hostile to the senate and pleasing to the people, and enjoying great popularity on that account, have been dragged down from thence, and carried away by their fathers, to undergo such punishment as these thought fit; and while they were being led away through the forum, none present, neither consul, tribune, nor the very populace which was flattering them, and thought all power inferior to its own, could rescue them.”

Adoption involved the transfer of a person from the absolute control of his whole life by one man to the absolute control of his life by another. There had to be a complete surrender of the power of life and death by one and a complete assumption of that power by another. So drastic was this change that the one who was transferred to another patria potestas, was looked upon as a wholly new creature. He was said to be born again, or born anew. A whole new existence for him began on the day that the transfer of allegiance was ratified. Never again would he be subject in any sense to his former relationship. It was as if he had literally died to his past.

THE ADOPTIVE CEREMONY

The ceremony of adoption was very exacting. It was always public and required at least five witnesses. There were two parts to it. The first was called mancipatio. From this we get our word emancipate, which means to transfer ownership. It derives from manus, hand; and capere, to take. In a sale, an article was taken in hand by a new owner. In mancipatio, the father, the child, and the prospective father, took their places upon the dais in the forum, with five witnesses. One of these, called the libripens (scales bearer) held a pair of balances in one hand and a short brass rod in the other.

The prospective father said, “This day I purchase your son for my own.” He then placed a coin in one pan of the balance. The father placed the son’s hand in the other pan, but before the sale could be completed he removed the boy’s hand, and the other removed his coin. This identical procedure was again enacted. But the third time the father did not remove the hand of the son. The scales were struck with the brass rod as a sign that the sale was completed. The coin was given to the boy as a sign that he would inherit from the new father. It was a seal of his relationship. Even to this day we say, “The third time is the charm.”

There remained one more step called vindicatio. In Roman law this meant to affirm and assert one’s legal right to a thing. The new father took the adopted son to a magistrate and had his new name properly inscribed in the census tables and the right of patria potestas, of life and death, passed into his hands. All of this is most interesting to me, but it is secondary to the purpose of the apostle. His primary desire is to impress upon the Romans the great blessings which accrue to us in Christ.

Let us point out then the privileges that were bestowed by adoption in Rome. (1) The one adopted was ushered into a whole new family relationship, with a new father and new brothers and sisters, and this was the direct result of the father’s choice. He was a chosen one, an elected person. The very word “adoption” means to choose, as our word option indicates. (2) The one adopted was given a new name clearly indicative of a new relationship. (3) He was permitted to eat at the father’s table, a privilege never accorded slaves. In the Greek world such eating together was an expression of koinonia, fellowship, the sharing of the common life of the father and family. (4) He became heir of the estate of the father. If there was an elder brother, he became a joint-heir with him. He shared in both the vicissitudes and rewards which were the lot of the family, for this was part of “the common life,” the fellowship.

(5) When one was adopted by Roman law his past life was literally blotted out. It was removed from the roster of citizenship. All debts were cancelled, all obligations deleted. The adopted person began a new life with the slate wiped clean. Even his education began anew, and Cicero said its aim was to produce “self-control, combined with dutiful affection to parents, and kindness to kindred.”

Paul speaks of the Spirit in connection with the cry “Abba, Father.” There are two passages in which this expression occurs. In Romans 8:15 the Spirit enables us to say these words. In Galatians 4:6 it is the Spirit which does the crying out. In both cases our divine sonship is under consideration. We are adopted, that is given the place of a son. Adoption is from huiiothesis, to place as a son. Because we are inducted into the glorious family we are able to cry “Abba, Father.” That is, we are able, through the Spirit, to recognize our real relationship to Christ.

There is more to it than this. The word abba could not have been translated “father.” It is an Aramaic word, and was the first expression of a little child in the East. In our country little children say “Da-da” or “Pa-pa” and we must transliterate with “Daddy” and “Papa” to indicate that these are the simple, unaffected, and spontaneous expressions of love in early life. It would not capture this meaning to translate by supplying the word “father.”

Paul well knew that the Jews had a strict law forbidding a slave to use the word “abba” in addressing a master or the head of a household. So when he wants to show that we are sons, not slaves, he makes it clear that the indwelling Spirit identifies us as children of God and makes it possible for us to speak to the Father in a fashion that slaves were not allowed to use. And so close is the union between the Holy Spirit and my own spirit that it cannot be distinguished from the cry which one is calling out to the Father.

THE CONFIRMING WITNESS

But the Spirit not only makes it possible for me to cry “Abba,” but also “Father.” The first is the cry of emotion and feeling, the second that of a maturing person. W. E. Vine says about the latter, “It is another mode of address. It is a relationship intelligently realized by the one who utters it, a word of filial confidence, communion, and obedience, answering to, and expressing the enjoyment of the complacent love of God the Father. The two expressions together indicate the love and intelligent trust of the child.”

We are told that “the Spirit himself bears witness with our spirit that we are children of God, and if children, then heirs, heirs of God and fellow heirs with Christ.” What does this tremendous statement mean? Remember that Paul is contrasting the servile state of slavery with the superb experience of sonship. We described for you the public ceremony of adoption. The sale of a slave had many of the same aspects. It also was in the presence of witnesses and involved a pair of balances and a deposit of money in one of the pans of the balance.

Suppose that the father of an adopted child died and the natural sons hated the one who was adopted and wanted to debar him from his inheritance. They could claim that he was never adopted at all but simply purchased as a slave. The adopted son would have to bring a witness to corroborate his own testimony. If he could find the librepens, the scales-bearer, that one could say, “I know he is a son because I was the one who struck the brass ingot and sealed the transaction.”

The Holy Spirit is in me for that very purpose. He is a seal of my redemption. “And if you and we belong to Christ, guaranteed as his and anointed, it is all God’s doing; it is God also who hath set his seal upon us, and as a pledge of what is to come has given the Spirit to dwell in our hearts” (2 Cor. 1:22).

The indwelling Spirit is God’s guarantee that I am going to inherit every provision of grace. I am not a slave. I am a son. My spirit testifies of this. The Holy Spirit testifies the same. I am even a joint heir with Christ. This establishes the quality of our sonship. Whatever is the lot of Jesus is to be my lot. We are “sharers together” with all that sonship involves. This is the thing to which the Spirit witnesses. I hope that you will forgive me for a lengthy quote which I am going to insert here. I want to share it with all of you. It is found in The Local Colour of the Bible, by Charles W. Budden and Edward Hastings (Vol. 3, pages 275-277).

St. Paul is the only one of the New Testament writers to use the term ‘adoption.’ This is not surprising, because adoption was not a custom among the Jews, and, in a legal sense, was absolutely unknown. On the other hand, the custom was a common one among the Greeks and Romans, and as a Roman citizen Paul was familiar with it and with the legal ceremonies which belonged to it.

Under Roman law an entire stranger by blood might be adopted into a family and become a member of that family, holding the same position in it as a son born in marriage. According to Dr. Ball, he even became a member of the family in a higher sense than some who had the family blood in their veins, than emancipated sons or descendants through females. He assumed the family name, and took part in its mystic sacrificial rites. He could not any more marry in the family of his adoption within the prohibited degrees than those related by blood. He severed his connections completely with his former family, and in the eyes of the law he became so entirely a new personality that even his debts were cancelled.

Let us look at the process. In the presence of five witnesses and the libripens (one who held the balances, as if to weight out money, at nominal sales), the son about to be adopted was sold three times by his father. According to the law of the Twelve Tables, if a father sold his son thrice he lost his paternal rights over him (patria potestas). A fictitious law-suit then followed, by which the person to be adopted was surrendered to the adopter, and the act was ratified in a set form of words.

As the form of adoption and that of sale into slavery were very similar, the presence of witnesses was essential to testify to the real nature of the ceremony. That is why the Apostle says, 'Ye received not the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, 'Abba, Father.' Suppose that the adopter has died and that the adopted son lays claim to the inheritance. His claim is refused; his status as a son is denied; it is declared that he was sold as a slave and that he has no legal right to the inheritance. So the son seeks the aid of the law-court. 'No,' he pleads, 'the ceremony was that of adoption, the deceased claimed me by the name of son. He took me to his home. I called him father and he allowed it . . . I sat at his table where the slaves never sat. He told me the inheritance was mine.' But the law requires corroborative evidence. One of the witnesses is called. 'I was present,' he says, 'at the ceremony. It was I who held the scales and struck them with the ingot of brass. The transaction was not a sale into slavery. It was an adoption. I heard the words of vindication, and I say this person was claimed by the deceased not as a slave, but as a son.'

And who is the witness to that spiritual adoption which makes us sons of God? It is the Third Person of the Trinity. 'The Spirit himself beareth witness (along) with our spirit, that we are children of God.'

CONDITION OF GLORIFICATION

I have just finished reading again the story of the persecution and death of Rawlins White, as described in detail by his friend, John Dane, who was almost constantly with him until he died at the stake, at Cardiff, Wales, in March of 1555. Dane actually held the hand of the dying martyr “till the flame of the fire rose and forced them to sunder” as he puts it.

Rawlins White was a fisherman at Cardiff for twenty years. During the reign of Henry the Eighth he was an ardent partaker of the superstition and idolatry of Catholicism, but when the accession of Edward the Sixth made possible the proclamation of the gospel again, he “began partly to dislike that which before he had embraced, and to have good opinion of that which before, by the iniquity of the time, had been concealed from him.” Dane writes, “He began to be a diligent hearer, and a great searcher-out of the truth.”

However, White was ignorant and unlearned. He had to have help, so he took his little son and started him to school to learn to read English. “Now after the little boy could read indifferently well, his father every night after supper, summer and winter, would have the boy read a piece of the holy Scripture, and now and then, of some other good book; in which kind of virtuous exercise the old man had such a delight and pleasure.” Dane further says, “Within a few years, through the help of his little son, and through much conference besides, he profited and went forward in such sort, that he was able not only to resolve himself touching his own former blindness and ignorance, but was also able to admonish and instruct others, and therefore, when occasion served, he would go from one place to another, visiting such as he had best hope in.”

I like this statement which follows. “And to this his great industry and endeavor in the Holy Scripture, God did also add to him a singular gift of memory, so that by the benefit thereof he would and could do that, in vouching and rehearsing of the text, which men of riper and more profound knowledge, by their notes and other helps of memory, could very hardly accomplish; insomuch that he, upon alleging of Scripture very often would cite the book, the leaf, yea and the very sentence; such was the working of God in this simple and unlearned man.”

After traveling five years with his son, White learned that King Edward had died. Mary succeeded to the throne, motivated by a passion to ruthlessly stamp out all opposition to Catholicism. White testified even more diligently of the grace of God and converted many. His friends sought to have him desist, but he refused saying, “I will, by his favourable grace, confess and bear witness of him before men, that I may find in him everlasting life. I must suffer with him here if I would be in his glory.”

Finally he was arrested and charged with heresy before the bishop of Llandaff. He was committed to the castle of Cardiff for a year, during which John Dane often visited him, taking him money and food prepared by his (Dane’s) mother. At the end of the year he was summoned for trial before the bishop, who accused him in a diatribe about his “obstinate and wilful opinions” for several hours. After listening quietly to the end. White replied, “My lord, I thank God I am a Christian man, and I hold no opinions contrary to the word of God: and if I do, I desire to be reformed out of the word of God, as a Christian man ought to be.”

Dane quotes, “From thence he was, by the bishop’s commandment, carried again to Cardiff, there to be put into the prison of the town, called Cockmarel; a very dark, loathsome and most vile prison. Rawlins in the meantime passed away his time in prayer, and chiefly in singing of psalms, which kind of godly exercise he always used, both at Cardiff castle and in all other places.” While in prison, his writ of execution on the charge of heresy, was read to him. It was to be “speedily carried out.”

On the day before he was to die he sent a messenger to his wife requesting her to send him a long white shirt which he called his “wedding garment.” Attired in it, he was taken from prison the next morning. Dane records, “So he came to a place in his way, where his poor wife and children stood weeping and making great lamentation; the sudden sight of whom so pierced his heart that the very tears trickled down his face.” When he saw the stake and the wood piled near, he fell down upon his knees, and kissed the ground, saying, “Earth unto earth, and dust unto dust: thou art my mother, and unto thee I shall return.”

Arising, he went boldly to the stake, and a blacksmith fastened a huge chain of iron about his body. As the officers began to lay the wood mixed with straw and reeds about him, he reached out as far as he could and gathered the straw and reeds and tucked them in closer about his body. He was forced to listen to a harangue on the authority of Rome given by a priest. He gave such good attention that all were astonished at his composure. When the fire was kindled he held his hands in the intense flame and watched the sinews shrink and the fat drop away. He continued to cry out, “O Lord, receive my spirit!” until his mouth would no longer open.

The recorder ends his account with these words, “Thus died this godly man for the testimony of God’s truth, being now rewarded, no doubt, with the crown of everlasting life.” Fifty-six years later the version of the scriptures authorized by King James was first printed and given to the world. Really, this is not quite all. I want to add that I expect to meet Rawlins White. I would like to tell this simple man what an influence his life and death have had on me.

The apostle writes that we are joint-heirs with Christ “if so be that we suffer with him that we may be glorified together.” He personally rejoiced in his sufferings for the saints and longed to fill up that which was behind in the afflictions of Christ in his own flesh. I do not expect ever to be called upon to suffer as did Rawlins White, who was just my age when he met Jesus in the burning bush of his own body. But whatever it is my lot to share with Jesus, I want to be strong enough to “go forth unto him without the gate, bearing his reproach.”

I want that power of the Spirit which will flood my soul with such unquenchable love for my enemies that I can pray for them in spite of taunts and false accusations. When reviled I want to bless and not revile again. I want that fierce courage which can make me smile and thank God when I am accused and branded as a heretic or an apostate by those who cannot read my heart but would play God with my life.

May the blessed Spirit grant to me that same patience which sustained others in dark dungeons and vile prisons and made it possible for their tongues to form the words and sounds of hymns of praise. God help me to overcome the temptation to feel self-pity when it seems that I am deserted and must stumble along lonely in the darkness.

May I have that greater love for Christ which will impel me on to my destiny with him, though I see my wife, my children and my grandchildren, weeping and lamenting at the crossroads. And although I taste the brine of my own tears, and see dimly through the misty curtain of my own sorrow, let me not turn back from following the Galilean carpenter, to cling even to those who are the very substance of my earthly dreams.

May I be able to walk boldly to whatever my stake may be. There are many kinds of stakes. There are many kinds of fires. Sometimes the literal stake is easier to embrace than the mental. There are chains which cannot be formed on an anvil by a blacksmith with clang of hammer— fetters of hate and hostility which bind you while others burn you. I want to be bold enough not to shrink from either heated metal or white-hot words of wrath which sear the soul.

I want to be forgiven for the time wasted in trivialities, debating those senseless and foolish issues which cannot matter in eternity. I want to purge my very consciousness of those molehills elevated into mountains by the partisan and factional spirit. I want to scale the far-off peaks and not wallow forever on the low ground where men wade through the miasmatic swamps of their own stagnant minds and fever-ridden hearts. How weak I am! How unworthy to be an heir of God! How unworthy to be a joint-heir with Christ, my redeemer! But what triumphant reassurance I find in the blessed words, “My grace is all you need; power comes to its full strength in weakness.” I want to be able to say, “I shall therefore prefer to find my joy and pride in the very things that are my weakness; and then the power of Christ will come and rest upon me” (2 Corinthians 12:9).

“The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit, my brothers. Amen” (Galatians 6:18).

[Abstract]

“For I reckon that the sufferings we now endure bear no comparison with the splendor, as yet unrevealed, which is in store for us” (Romans 8:18).

One can never explain the tremendous impact made upon the Roman world by the good news concerning Jesus unless he takes into account the condition then existing in the hearts of those who composed the Empire. And no word better describes that condition than hopelessness. The historian Freeman writes, “From Mummius to Augustus the Roman city stands as the living mistress of a dead world, and from Augustus to Theodosius the mistress becomes as lifeless as her subjects.”

A black pall of fatalism hung like a lowering cloud over the hearts of slaves, freemen and patricians. As Canon Farrar puts it, “Gluttony, caprice, extravagance, ostentation, impurity, rioted in the heart of a society which knew of no other means by which to break the monotony of its weariness, or alleviate the anguish of its despair.”

It is difficult for the student to determine whether prevailing vice struck a death blow to religion, or whether loss of faith in the gods produced the heathen cruelty and unfathomable corruption. Sometimes cause and effect are closely interwoven. Of one thing we can be certain, and that is that when the restraints of religion were most needed they were not apparent and undisciplined hearts were left to grope unhindered in the stinking muck of unbridled licentiousness and degradation.

The historian writes, “The upper classes were destitute of faith, yet terrified at skepticism. They had long learnt to treat the current mythology as a mass of worthless fables, scarcely amusing enough for even a schoolboy’s laughter, but they were the ready dupes of every wandering quack . . . The mass of the populace either accorded to the old beliefs a nominal adherence which saved them of giving any thought to the matter, and reduced their creed and their morals to a survival of national habits, or else they plunged with eager curiosity into the crowd of foreign cults.”

Many of the intellectuals espoused the Stoic philosophy which was derived from that of the Cynics, and was established at Athens by Zeno about 300 B.C. His most famous pupil was Cleanthes of Assos, from whose Hymn to Zeus, Paul quotes in Acts 17:28. Among the famous Romans who later adopted this philosophy, our readers will probably recognize the names of Cato the Younger, Seneca, Epictetus and Marcus Aurelius. Now read this historical quotation.

“But the Stoicism on which they leaned for support amid the terrors and temptations of that awful epoch utterly failed to provide a remedy against the universal degradation. It aimed at cherishing an insensibility which gave no real comfort, and for which it offered no adequate motive. It aimed at repressing the passions by a violence so unnatural that with them it also crushed some of the gentlest and most elevating emotions . . . It made a vice of compassion which Christianity inculcated as a virtue; it cherished a haughtiness which Christianity discouraged as a sin . . . Its marked characteristic was a despairing sadness, which became specially prominent in its most sincere adherents. Its favorite theme was the glorification of suicide, which wiser moralists had severely reprobated, but which many Stoics belauded as the one sure refuge against oppression and outrage. It was a philosophy which was indeed able to lacerate the heart with a righteous indignation against the crimes and follies of mankind, but which vainly strove to resist, and which scarcely even hoped to stem, the ever-swelling tide of vice and misery. For wretchedness it had no pity; on vice it looked with impotent disdain.”

Both Zeno and Cleanthes committed suicide, and one historian informs us that by the time of Trajan, who became emperor shortly after the death of John, the apostle, suicide had become a “national usage.” One of the remarkable things noted in the Roman writings of that day is the great variety of Latin phrases for suicide, indicative of the frequency of the crime. The way of life had become the way of death in Rome. Men mused by day and night on how to “end it all.”

It was to those living in such an atmosphere of crushing sorrow and complete despair that Paul wrote this one great chapter. In doing so he met the problem of human suffering and gave the answer to it. God had invaded the earth in the person of a Son to share our lot. He suffered in all areas of life as we suffer. By his identification with us he made it possible for us to also be partaker of his “all things,” as he partook of our “all things.” And this includes his eternal splendor. All that goes with the life of God is mine. I am an heir of glory!

In the flesh I cannot grasp all that is involved in everlasting splendor. I am caught up in the human predicament. I am inhibited while in the body by a time-space sequence. In such a state the glory cannot be revealed. But I can be sure of one thing. Temporal suffering (sharing with the Son on earth), is not to be compared with the splendor (sharing with the Son in the glorified body). There is something else, something outside, something beyond. The drawn curtains will not open on oblivion, but upon splendor. I shall come into my own.

No wonder this concept swept the tired, weary, jaded and despairing hearts of the Roman Empire. It will also revive the “unlaughing generation” of our own time. Never in recent centuries have the eyes of the young been so listless and staring, never have their countenances been so blank, as of late. This is the effect of a neo-pagan culture, of a meaningless treadmill existence, of a worship of false gods which have again proven to be vanities. Once again it is either the Spirit or suicide. Either the Light must come in or men will go out like lights. Ancient Rome has been re-incarnated in our western world. Once more the Letter to the Romans is as fresh as the morning newspaper. It is God’s Life and Time issued in one cover.

“For the created universe waits with eager expectations for God’s sons to be revealed” (Romans 8:19).

This is a concept so vast and profound that it completely overshadows the sufferings of this present life. Not only will the sons of God march in the great triumphal procession of the redeemed but the entire universe is involved and is eagerly awaiting this tremendous event. It will signal the culmination of God’s magnificent plan of the ages.

The original term for “eager expectation” is one which literally means to stretch out the neck in an attempt to see. J. B. Phillips translates it to read that creation is “standing on tiptoe,” looking down the road and waiting for the appearance of the glorified host.

I never read this without remembering the coming to town of the circus when I was a little lad. In those days the performers always staged a parade to the big top. Everyone for miles around gathered along the route. The air was vibrant with expectancy. I would stand on tiptoe, craning my neck and looking for the appearance of the first unit, the resplendent bandwagon. Finally, in the distance could be heard the strains of marching music. A great cry went up, “Here they come,” and we stood in awe as one colorful contingent after another went by.

The Romans knew what was meant by a triumphal procession. They had witnessed the return of famous generals, heading great armies which took hours to pass a given point. They had listened to the accolades accorded in the forum, and seen the honors heaped upon the victors who had overcome the hardships of the battle.

Now the apostle portrays Jesus coming as a conquering hero, the super-star of all time, leading the long line of saints. He rides a white horse. His eyes flame like fire. On his head are many diadems. On his robe and on his leg are written the name, “King of kings and Lord of lords.” Stretching far off to mingle with the blue haze crowning the mountains of infinity are the armies of heaven, following on white horses, clothed in fine linen, clean and shining. They come from every nation, language, tongue and people.

Suddenly every created thing in the universe— in heaven, on earth, and under the earth, all that is in them— bursts into a great cry, “Praise and honor, glory and might, to him who sits on the throne, and to the Lamb for ever and ever” (Revelations 5:13). I am going to be there. I am going to join in the shout. And when the sons of God come into their own, the entire universe will share in their ultimate and glorious destiny. What a scene! What a triumph!

“It was made the victim of frustration, not by its own choice, but because of him who made it so; yet always there was hope, because the universe itself is to be freed from the shackles of mortality and enter upon the liberty and splendor of the children of God” (Romans 8:20, 21).

Every phrase in this quotation is a thrill to my heart. The created universe is the victim of frustration. The root word is the Latin frustra, in vain. That is why the King James version renders it “subject to vanity.” Man was made to be the ruler of the material universe. When he sinned, the dominion over which he held sway became the victim of his dereliction. Its original purpose was thwarted and defeated.

Man fell by his own choice. As a rational being he made a decision, and his guilt demanded just punishment. But the realm of nature had no choice. The ground was cursed for man’s sake. Thorns and thistles were borne profusely in contravention to the original design of producing useful herbs and fruits.

The creator found it necessary to deflect the universe from its pristine purity out of love for man. Instead of a relationship of joy in a synchronized system, it was said that man should eat the produce of the earth in sorrow all the days of his life. No longer would the earth sustain man upon it. Now it would open up its jaws to swallow him from sight. The decomposition of his frame would feed the crawling skin worms. His dust would mingle with the elements of the earth. Far from being a realm of beauty the earth would become a vast charnel house, polluted with the vapors and stench from decaying matter.

The decision to thus subject the earth to a perverted purpose so that sinful man might live upon it until the ravages of death claimed him was made by God. But it was for a limited time. When man was redeemed from corruption the earth would be also. When man was given a new body there would be a new earth. And there would be no more curse. Neither could sin or anything that defiles ever enter.

Always there has been hope. The curse of the created world was co-extensive with the curse upon man. The hope of the universe is identified with the hope of man. Man will be freed from the shackles of mortality by the resurrection from the dead, the great revival; or by the Magnificent Change, the Triumphant Transfiguration. But just as sinful man could not live in a sinless state, so sinless man cannot reside in a sinful and accursed domain. Creation will share in the liberty and splendor of the children of God. We will be raised in glory although sown in humiliation, and there will be a new heaven and a new earth in which to dwell in righteousness.

“Up to the present, we know, the whole created universe groans in all its parts as if in the pangs of childbirth” (Romans 8:22).

The created universe is not a conglomeration of unrelated units or circumstances. It is so closely integrated that it can be personified and considered as a body. The sin of man could affect the whole structure and frustrate it “in all its parts.” The interrelationship of all the parts so that the universe is said to groan as one body is an argument for origin by intelligent design rather than by sheer chance.

So long as the physical body of man suffers and is tormented by pain, so long will the universe be subjected to corruption, crying out, moaning and groaning because of its ignominious state. But the pains are like those of childbirth. They betoken the advent of new life. There is a spirit of hope despite the agony. God’s purpose will be realized. Suffering is not the normal way of existence for the universe. Some day the purpose of it will be seen, exactly as in the case of childbirth.

“And not only so, but even we, who have received the Spirit as the first-fruits of God’s promised inheritance, are inwardly groaning while awaiting the culmination of our adoption through the redemption of our bodies” (8:23).

Suffering is the lot of all who are in the flesh. All of creation is forced to agonize because of sin. Not only is this true of the universe as a whole, but even the children of God, while in the flesh, are not exempt. It is true that these have received the Spirit as a pledge from God that glory awaits, but the indwelling Spirit is no guarantee that they will not suffer from maladies in the flesh. The outward man of the Christian will perish the same as that of the skeptic or unbeliever.

For this reason we cannot assume that because one suffers, he is out of harmony with God. Saints endure pain the same as other sinners. The difference lies in the fact that the latter suffer hopelessly. Their hope resides in death and not in what lies beyond. The Spirit does not prevent aging nor offset its natural twinges and discomforts, although a knowledge of the Spirit will strengthen one to endure and provide him a happier outlook on life here and hereafter.

The indwelling Spirit is a divine deposit given to us as a constant reminder that God does not forget. He will not “scrub out the mission” upon which we are dispatched from the day of our birth from above until we enter into slumber and the spirit returns to its source. There will be frustrations and distresses along the way. These link us to the created universe. But there will be an undying hope that none of this is useless. It acts to produce for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.

Our adoption is not yet completed. It involves the whole man, and the physical part has not yet been redeemed. By his death on the cross Jesus ransomed the spirit, the inner man. He purchased the body, but did not redeem it because it is mortal and therefore still subject to degeneration, decay and death. We were bought with a price. We belong to God in body and spirit. But so long as we are in the flesh we cannot inherit or possess the kingdom of God. The perishable cannot possess immortality.

Our bodies will be redeemed by the resurrection. Then we will not be in flesh and blood. God will give us a body according to his own design or choice. It will be adapted to life in an immortal and incorruptible state. Our present bodies, in which we groan, are designed for functioning in a material realm, an elemental environment. We are now awaiting our transformation. It will be a glorious release from pain and irksome toil.

The faithful child of God is destined to dwell in three states, or kingdoms. These are the kingdoms of nature, grace and eternity. Each is entered by birth, but the birth can only adapt one for the state into which it inducts him. To enter the first he is born of his mother's womb. To enter the second he must be born of the water and of the Spirit. To enter the third he must be born of the grave. All three, being a birth, involve a coming forth, but the coming forth is limited to the realm into which one is deposited.

The first birth results from generation, the second from regeneration, and the third from resurrection. In each case there is a freeing of one from the previous condition which held him captive, a victory over that which enshrouded him. The first results in victory over the womb, the second in victory over sin, and the third in victory over mortality. When one gains the victory over sin through the blood of Christ, his adoption papers are filed. When he gains the victory over mortality they are completed. Then the saying of scripture will come true. "Death is swallowed up, victory is won." And "as we have worn the likeness of the man made of dust, so we shall wear the likeness of the heavenly man" (1 Corinthians 15:49). Praise the Lord for such a glorious hope!

The Power of Hope

Mission Messenger (July 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

One of the great differences between being in Christ Jesus and being on the outside is hope. It isn't that those on the outside do not have hope for all men do. The difference lies in the varying degree of intensity. Those who know the Lord find their hope increasing as they grow older, those who do not know him find their hope waning, and frequently being supplanted by those two malign evils to personality—dread and despair.

Every rational person realizes that he is not going to get out of the human predicament alive. All of his plans for postponing the inevitable are doomed. His string is going to run out. The thread is going to be snapped. The Christian, "sustained by an unfaltering trust," is able to "wrap the drapery of his couch about him and lie down to pleasant dreams." Not so the one who sins away his day of grace and suddenly faces the blackness of darkness. Without hope we are of all men most miserable.

Then, what is hope? The simplest definition is that it is "a joyous anticipation of the future." Although it is related to expectation they are not the same. One may expect bad as well as good, storm as well as sunshine. It is only when expectation is accompanied by desire that it is an ingredient of hope. We desire some things we do not expect, and expect some things we do not desire, but when we have desire and expectation in equal proportion we possess hope.

Hope is not a retreat for the cowardly or inadequate. Instead, it is a resilient and powerful quality of the soul, lingering on even when the rationalization argues that it is futile. Long after others have given up the search for one who is lost, a mother keeps the light burning in her heart, reacting inwardly to every step on the porch, and every knock on the door. Like Abraham we hope “when hope seems hopeless” (Romans 4:18).

My faith and my hope are grounded on the same foundation as the faith and hope of Abraham. It is a firm conviction of the validity of every promise of God, because “God makes the dead to live and summons things that are not yet in existence as if they already were.” The first is the ultimate in power, the second the ultimate in knowledge. God raised Jesus from the dead. So God can raise men from the dead. And he has promised me I will share in eternal life on a more magnificent scale than I can ever imagine now.

The fact is that Jesus made sense out of death by making sense out of life. By showing me how to live he taught me how to die. And the last gasp of oxygen into my collapsing lungs is of no real consequence. It is not lifting the latch that is important but what lies beyond the door. I am convinced that ineffable joy awaits in the other room. Jesus has begotten me to a living hope. “And the God of all grace, who called you into his eternal glory in Christ, will himself, after your brief suffering, restore, establish, and strengthen you on a firm foundation. He holds dominion for ever and ever. Amen” (1 Peter 5:10).

Beginning with Romans 8:18, the apostle places suffering and splendor in proper perspective. Suffering is for awhile, splendor is after awhile. It is the splendor which really counts. The whole created universe, now writhing in agony, is standing on tiptoe, looking down the long road, waiting for the spectacle of triumph when the sons of God come into their own. It is the people of God who give meaning to the whole creation. Man was at the peak of God's creation. His fall subjected his whole domain to despair. His final victory will bring rejoicing to all. Hope is written in shining letters across the face of the whole order.

“For we have been saved; though only in hope. Now to see is no longer to hope: why should a man endure and wait for what he already sees?” (Romans 8:24).

This does not mean that hope is an agent or cause of our salvation. We are not saved by hope as an operating principle. The point at issue here is that we have been saved, but there is more to come. In our flesh and blood we are not adapted for existence in a celestial realm. We have not yet shared in all to which our salvation makes us heirs. There is something for which the universe is expectant— joyfully and triumphantly expectant.

When hope becomes reality it ceases to function as hope. The sight of the goal renders hope unnecessary. The endurance test is over. The waiting period is ended. Expectancy gives way to experience, anticipation becomes enjoyment. This is the essence of the Christian life. Tears and trials today, smiles and splendor tomorrow.

“But if we hope for something we do not yet see, then, in waiting for it, we show our endurance” (Romans 8:25).

This is a confirmation of the statement in Romans 5:3-5, which says, “Let us even exult in our present sufferings, because we know that suffering trains us to endure, and endurance brings proof that we have stood the test, and this proof is the ground of hope. Such a hope is no mockery, because God's love has flooded our inmost heart through the Holy Spirit he has given us.”

Hope is validated by God's love. The heart flooded with love is the heart that can be filled with hope. It is useless to expect hope to provide its bounty when there is no love, for love is the soil in which hope grows and blossoms. The heart is merely a vase and hope is a cut flower where there is no love in which the roots may be put down.

“In the same way the Spirit comes to the aid of our weakness. We do not even know how we ought to pray, but through our inarticulate groans the Spirit himself is pleading for us, and God who searches our inmost being knows what the Spirit means, because he pleads for God’s own people in God’s own way” (Romans 8:26, 27).

Hope comes to our aid in counteracting despair and makes it possible for us to endure and hold on in spite of suffering. But we have another helper, for the Spirit comes to the aid of our weakness. He does so in many departments of life, one of which is mentioned, that of prayer.

We are all ignorant of many things with regard to prayer. It is far easier to theorize about prayer than it is to practice it. Often we develop stereotyped words and phrases which we repeat monotonously and with little consciousness or real concern. Sometimes we cannot express the real concern. Sometimes we cannot express the real burdens nor find words in which to couch our deepest longings. All of us have found occasions when we wanted to pray and could not really do so.

For just such emergencies God has given us the indwelling Spirit as an intercessor. We have only one mediator, one bridge-builder, the man Christ Jesus. But we can have many intercessors. Indeed we are all to make intercession for one another (1 Timothy 2:1). And we have two divine intercessors, one dwelling in us and the other in heaven. The Holy Spirit intercedes from within (Romans 8:26), and Jesus intercedes at God’s right hand (Romans 8:34).

The Spirit translates our inward inexpressible desires into prayer, taking the intangible and inarticulate groanings of the inner man and putting them in the words of heavenly language. Thus we can be sure that we are on a direct line to the throne room in glory if we are in Christ Jesus. Let me illustrate what I mean.

I know a precious mother who could neither read nor write. She was placed at field work by her immigrant father when she was a mere girl. She was denied any formal education. Later she married and bore six children whom she dearly loved. She and her husband were found by the Shepherd and entered the fold. They sought eagerly to rear their children to God's glory. With her little brood by her side she never missed a meeting of the saints, listening intently to words she could not read.

One day a message was received that her husband had been killed in an accident at work. Stunned by the tragic news she locked the door of her room and kneeled down by the bedside. Later she told me that with breaking heart and gushing tears she had tried to pray but no words would come. For a long period she kneeled in the glowing dusk, dumb in her anguish. Then it seemed to her that she could feel strong arms about her shaking shoulders. There stole over her an indescribable sense of inner peace. She arose from her knees ready to face life with new courage. Although she had been unable to utter a sound except her choking sobs she had the distinct feeling that she had prayed and that God had heard. Of course she was correct!

Then there was an elderly brother, confined to a nursing home where he had but little privacy. Once an elder in a rural congregation, he had faithfully served God's heritage entrusted to his care. He had prayed by the beds of the gravely ill and by the gravesides of the dead. His life had been a veritable life of prayer, daily offered to the God whom he loved. Now his mind often wandered and he lost the thread of thought completely.

When I visited him he confided to me how at night when the patients were tucked into bed, he talked to God for comfort. But he said that frequently he had a lapse of memory and could not recall what he had said. He would even fall asleep not knowing if his prayer was finished. He felt relieved when I told him that the Spirit carried his inmost secrets to the ear of God, and God understood.

I have often found relief in prayer, especially when I was in deep need of forgiveness and divine understanding. And the greatest consolation comes when I realize that all does not depend upon human vocabulary. The Spirit decodes my impulses and desires and transmits them in rational language. And God hears and grace takes over. I do not so much need to learn how to pray as I need to learn how to trust.

God searches and penetrates the recesses of my being. He knows my every thought and intent. He also knows the mind of the Spirit. The communion between God and the Spirit is absolute. It is perfect. And the Spirit makes intercession for the saints according to the will of God. He pleads for God's own people in God's own way. If nothing else prompted me to be one of the people of God this alone would be sufficient motivation. I must be one of the saints because I desperately need the Spirit as an intercessor.

Let others fill their journals with argument and debate about how the Spirit works, or if he works. I prefer to fill this little paper with the grace of God and my own gratitude that my Lord did not leave us as orphans. I am happy that he came to us in the Spirit and the Spirit moved in to live with me in my frail tent. I am overjoyed because of the warmth, the understanding, and the power which he furnishes day by day. In short, I am thrilled beyond my poor ability to express that God has adopted me and that I am a member of His majestic family.

Quenching the Spirit

Mission Messenger (July 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

I have before me a letter from a reader who wants to know what it means to quench the Spirit, and how this may be done. The term is found in 1 Thessalonians 5:19, and I strongly suspect from the context that it relates directly to the exercise of spiritual gifts, and especially to that of prophecy, which means to speak under divine impulse, or by inspiration. The New English Version reads, “Do not stifle inspiration, and do not despise prophetic utterances, but bring them all to the test and then keep what is good in them and avoid the bad of whatever kind.”

The spirit of the prophet is subject to the prophet (1 Cor. 14:32). He did not have to speak and it was within his power to withhold a message and thus stifle the Spirit who sought to use him as a channel for revelation. But the prophet also spoke to men to build, stimulate and encourage them (1 Cor. 14:3). They might thwart the Spirit’s purpose by refusing to receive the message or to heed it. So the Spirit could be stifled by the prophet or the recipient to whom the message was addressed.

While this seems to be the direct import of the expression, we should be reluctant to limit it solely to this, for any sublimation of the Spirit’s work and influence would certainly come under this admonition. The word “quench” is used with reference to fire or flame, and means to cause a flame to lose its intensity or to die out.

This is a particularly apt metaphor because the Spirit is alluded to in conjunction with fire or flame, as well as with water. When the bubbling up and flowing forth of the influence of the Spirit is alluded to, water is used to describe it (John 7:38, 39). But when the motivating intensity which threatens to consume one unless he gives vent to it is under consideration, the experience is described in terms of fire or flame. Thus Jeremiah regarded the prophetic influence as fire in his bones, and Timothy was told to “Stir into flame the gift of God which is within you” (2 Timothy 1:6).

A fire can be quenched in three ways. One of the simplest and most effective is by pouring cold water upon it. The licking tongues of flame recede and die down and soon only cold gray ashes remain. It has been the fate of many congregations to thus suffer. Bitterness, complaining, bickering and backbiting have driven out the Spirit and left only a vacant burned-out shell where once a group of saints acted as a lighthouse to the community.

All men have not the faith. Some in despotic arrogance must have their own way, and brutally tyrannize others, using the community of saints as a tool for their own ego-gratification. They will “rule or ruin, boss or bust!” Any suggestion by others is vetoed, and a sterile conformity in which there is neither peace nor passion for souls results. The congregation settles into a rut of meaningless tradition and composes itself to await death.

A second way to quench a fire is to smother it with non-combustibles, to heap up in the heart a pile of extraneous matters which are like asbestos to the soul. How often men have started out in the livid glow of the Spirit, only to become involved in the affairs of this passing age until the fervor died down and the ardor cooled.

Perhaps it was secular employment with its mad scramble for power, position or pelf. Perhaps it was pleasure, innocent in itself, but becoming an obsession. Boating, golfing, pro-football, television— innocent relaxation until the winding coils of inordinate concern drive the Spirit into the background. “That which fell among thistles represents those who hear, but their further growth is choked by cares and wealth, and the pleasures of life, and they bring nothing to maturity” (Luke 8:14).

“Nobody lights a lamp and then covers it with a basin or puts it under a bed.” These are the words of Jesus. He spoke them to show how incongruous it is for men to conceal or snuff out a light under something that defeats its very purpose. All of us have known men of great spiritual potential who have washed out under an avalanche of worldly philosophy and increasing knowledge of this world. They have quenched the Spirit by degrees— scholastic degrees!

A third way to quench a fire is by neglect. One can smother it with noncombustible materials which make a great show of smoke but never burst into flame, or he can simply refuse to refuel it and it will go out. While dealing with a slightly different theme, Solomon wrote, “Where no wood is, there the fire goeth out.” Flames are like people. They must be fed to live. I have found in my own life that I must nourish the inner man. Shakespeare wrote, “Self-love is not so vile a sin as self-neglecting.”

I require regular communion with God in fervent prayer. “Fervent” is another word allied with fire or heat. The root word means to glow. I am like Moses on the mount, when my hands begin to droop and are not lifted up toward heaven, the tide of battle goes against me. I must stoke my spiritual flame with study of the word. Nothing else stimulates and fires my imagination like gaining new insights into the revealed truth.

Another factor which kindles enthusiasm is the fellowship of the saints. Enthusiasm means “God indwelt.” It is from en and theos. Madame de Stael correctly writes, “The sense of this word among the Greeks affords the noblest definition of it; enthusiasm means, ‘God in us.’” To create enthusiasm by kindling the Spirit is to allow God to work in and through us, and we thus edify and comfort one another. A coal of fire which becomes separated from the mass is soon extinguished and dies out. I need all of my brothers and sisters.

It is my fond and fervent hope that all of our readers who have been stifling the Spirit will open the draft and let the wind of God blow upon the coals of fire and become aflame for God. May we all be filled with the Spirit and speak the word in boldness. And may His glory be our aim!

Answering the Buzzer

Mission Messenger (July 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

George G. Beazley, Jr., is the ecumenical officer of the Christian Church (Disciples of Christ). He is also my brother in Christ. It is as a brother, not as an enemy, that I write this. In The Christian for February 14 of this year, appears a news item entitled, “Beazley ‘Lashes Out’ at Attacks on Ecumenical Groups.” It provides quotes from a regular report to the churches called “The Beazley Buzz.”

In the January issue of his report our brother reveals that for the first time in his life he believes ecumenical institutions “are in real danger of being destroyed.” His newly-developed fears match my long-held convictions. Not being an ecumenical officer and having no organization to defend or protect, I am not perturbed. Our brother has a right to be frightened. He is president of the Disciples Council on Christian Unity, and chairman of the nine-denomination Consultation on Church Union.

A great many brethren who are antagonistic to the Disciples’ wing of “the restoration brotherhood” have accepted it as a foregone conclusion that COCU would be pushed through like a pro-football team on a quarterback sneak through a bunch of high school freshmen. They have found it hard to swallow in question forums when I have suggested that they not get heart failure in happy anticipation of being able to say, “I told you so!” There are some fairly sectarian attitudes toward “the sectarian attitude” of the Disciples of Christ.

At the same time, the latter have thought of me as a kind of Neanderthal throwback, a sort of reactionary fuddy-duddy, out of tune with the Now generation. They have spoken positively of the “ongoing Spirit,” and have sought to make it appear that the Holy Spirit planted the idea of ecumenical institutions in their minds and they are just carrying out the will of God in promoting them. This doesn’t really bug me. I’ve spent a lifetime with good folk who sincerely think that anything they dream or drum up is the will of the Spirit. And the Spirit is given credit for some pretty “hairy experiences.”

Brother Beazley is a little wild in his thinking— I think! He asserted that the destruction of ecumenical institutions would kill the Christian unity movement and leave the church “not the church our Lord brought into being.” It is talk like that which turns off those who love Jesus and the One Body. Our brother is a victim of that institutional virus which always creates a feverish state and influences one to speak incoherently and irrationally. I know! I was afflicted with the malady for years.

The fact is that the real Christian unity will not be affected one whit if every ecumenical institution on earth curls up and dies. In some cases, it could be a help. Christian unity has enough problems without being swaddled in institutional red tape and conventional gobbledygook! Christian unity is not a federation of sects, a confederation of parties, or a pantheon of congregations, each worshiping its own image. It is individual, and a creation of the Holy Spirit. “You are one body, and all of you are individually members of it.” That is what the Holy Spirit once said, and I doubt he has changed his mind since he became “ongoing.”

Brother Beazley needs to re-study the apostolic letters to see what kind of church “our Lord brought into being.” I am interested in his concern to restore that church. I had been led to believe from some rather intensive reading that a goodly number of brethren couldn't care less about really perpetuating it. Our brother is in a strategic position to bring a real witness to the Consultation for Church Union if he is sincere in wanting to preserve the church "our Lord brought into being."

Our brother "lashed out" at attacks from both right and left. He called upon every Disciple "to become a soldier in the battle to overcome polarization, to attain balance and comprehensiveness and to preserve the ecumenical movement and the institutions which carry it." I do not want to appear hyper-critical but it seems to me that the admonition to overcome polarization may be slightly tinged with poor grace. I do not intend to be sarcastic, but I attended several of the convention sessions when restructure was on the agenda, and it appeared to me as an "outside observer" that some of the brethren from Indianapolis were not worried about polarization if they could ride the program through.

Really, I think the great problem is that the ecumenical movement arrived on the scene too late. This is one reason I doubt that the Spirit originated it. He is not generally that far off on his timing. There is a great spirit of lassitude toward movements which have to create institutions to sustain and carry them. Men are sick of institutions. They are "fed up to here" with them. At the same time the Spirit of God is cutting through artificial and sectarian barriers like a buttered knife through hot fudge. After letting the brethren demonstrate the futility of human wisdom and planning, God may do a little restructuring of his own and frustrate all of our movements. Since I no longer belong to any sect, segment, fraction or fragment, I can say "Praise the Lord!" There are tremendous values in being a Christian only, after having pretended to be one for so long.

Brother Beazley says, "This battle, as you well know, will take place, or is already taking place, in every congregation. As you also realize, no one can engage in it without risk. Unless he is willing to take the risk, no local pastor or lay leader is really giving leadership.”

This is an admission that the brethren are not going to surrender their birthright of autonomy lightly. Our brother says the attempt to infiltrate the congregations with the ecumenical structures is a battle. Apparently there are resistance fighters in every locality. This ought to come as a surprise to a bunch of folk I know who have dismissed the Disciples as a group of apathetic, lackadaisical, devil-may-care compromisers. I am not sure that ecumenical institutions are really worth taking such a “frightful risk” as our brother projects. About all that could happen would be the loss of a job. And sometimes that is a blessing rather than a disaster.

In any event, I hope the freedom fighters will encourage all of the saints to examine the Word of God, to look to heaven rather than to Indianapolis for salvation, and to make up their own minds about their congregational future. We need more than anything else in this age to get back to a real, genuine, vital, and personal relationship with God through the blood of his Son and the power of the indwelling Spirit.

There may be nothing particularly wrong about institutions but when men begin to think of them as indispensable to the purpose of God, Ephraim may have to be separated from his idols. There was nothing wrong with trees but when men began to carve them into stocks and confuse them with God they became dangerous. Some of the prophets took the risk of pointing this out and were stoned to death for “really giving leadership.”

Brother Beazley says, “The ecumenical bodies are not without mistakes, some of them serious, but cutting off funds is not the way to deal with mistakes, because local congregations make mistakes too.” I disagree with my good brother. He knows as we all do that ecumenical bodies have thrown money down a lot of rat-holes, and when the rats did not dig enough holes, the ecumenical thinkers helped them out of the shortage by digging some of their own. Obviously, a great deal of good was done in some places, but it is also true that every fuzzy-brained cause imaginable has been supported under guise of serving Christ in our world.

Cutting off funds is exactly the way to deal with repeated mistakes in spending money! Why should I be called upon to invest repeatedly in that in which I have no faith? Why should I turn my hard-earned cash over to an institution to sow to the winds when I am not in favor of the winds? I am going to have to answer to Jesus in the Great Confrontation for the way I use my time, talent and treasure. I will not be able to wiggle out of responsibility by pointing the finger at an ecumenical institution when I knew ahead of time what use would be made of my contributions. The best way to solve the problem of institutional chickens multiplying is not to wring their necks one by one, but to close down the hatchery.

Our brother equates ecumenical bodies with local congregations and points out that they both make mistakes. He is right on his last observation and wrong on his original equation. There is a great difference. If the local deacons repeatedly use funds for projects that are detrimental they can be removed from office by the very ones who supply the money. But an “ecumenical body” is a long way off from little Pleasant Valley Christian Church (Disciples of Christ) down in the hills. And the folks who supply the oil never get to see the complex machinery and wouldn’t know how to turn it off if they did. About their only recourse is to stop sending oil and keep it for their lamps in case the Lord comes sooner than the ecumenical institutions expect him to arrive.

Perhaps the brethren will think that I should keep my nose out of “their business,” but I no longer think in terms of “us and them.” I do not beam my love to brethren because they are in the Disciples of Christ, Christian Churches or Churches of Christ. I am interested in brethren and not in their structures or corrals. My association with the brethren in Indianapolis and Saint Louis has been fraternal and amicable. They have always been kind and considerate, helpful and understanding toward me. When we have appeared together on forums there has always been a proper respect and dignity manifested.

But I am persuaded, after much study and personal soul-searching, that I must speak my honest sentiments about the Consultation on Church Union. I think it is a tragic error. I am convinced that it would forfeit every principle for which our fathers fought. I believe in Christian unity but “church union” as our brethren envision it is not in God’s program.

In closing, permit me to say that this little review is not in any sense a personal reflection upon my brother in Christ, George Beazley, Jr. He is a personable, erudite and qualified man. His address to the saints simply provided an opportunity for me to set forth my own personal convictions. When Brother Beazley “buzzed” I felt that I should respond to the buzzer. I pray for him as eagerly as I pray for all of the rest of us!

The Spirit at Work

Mission Messenger (July 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

An Oklahoma brother, who is an excellent writer and a researchist of no mean ability, expresses his commendation for the current series of articles on the influence of the Spirit of God in our lives. He poses two questions. “Is there any scriptural teaching that the Holy Spirit will not or cannot lead a child of God into contact with an open-minded soul in need of salvation? Or, bring to memory a scripture appropriate for the occasion?”

Although most of us in the Churches of Christ tend to avoid and evade such pointed questions, it is probably a little bit dishonest to do so. We cannot always talk in the realm of theory and never get down to the practical aspects of the Spirit’s work. Even an eagle must stop soaring occasionally to find rest upon a tree branch or rocky crag. And such questions as our brother poses tend to bring us down to earth.

One reason for my reluctance to write in regard to these matters is due to the fact that one must relate personal experiences to justify his position and I do not believe the Spirit of God is limited to working through any two of us in the same fashion. For this reason, too, no man can ever use his personal experience as a criterion by which to measure another. To do so would be like Paul insisting that no one could find Jesus anywhere except five miles south of the Damascus city limits, and then only at high noon.

The God who made us all unique personalities can also do some unique things in our lives. I believe, as you know, that the Spirit is active in the children of God. I am conscious of his abiding presence in my own life constantly. Really, I hold that God is interested in every phase of my existence. When I am completely surrendered to his purpose he can providentially shape my destiny and “mould me and make me after his will!” For that reason, regardless of what transpires, I look around to see what divine purpose is to be served.

God took some pretty frustrating experiences in the life of Joseph and turned them into ultimate good. He used pagan kings, murderous conspirators, and other shady characters to put Esther into a place where she could serve his people. I serve the same God who saved Daniel in a den of lions, and three young Hebrews in a fiery furnace. If he could make a path through the Red Sea to get his host out of Egypt, he can clear a path through campus atheists and ecumenical doubters and I can march through and never get my feet wet. The Holy Spirit has always been interested in keeping the saints out of where they are not needed and getting them into places where they are. “They made their way through Phrygia and Galatia, but the Holy Spirit prevented them from speaking God’s message in Asia. When they came to Mysia they tried to enter Bithynia, but again the Spirit of Jesus would not allow them.” The result is they went into Europe and opened up a new continent for the Lord. If they had stayed in Asia they might have become bogged down with people who were not ready for the message. Many a man has stubbornly sawed away at some “Bithynia” and made no dent in it, while a “Philippi” was waiting for someone who did not come.

Paul had always wanted to go to Rome. He planned a trip there after he took assistance to the poor in Jerusalem. He ran afoul of some street demonstrators who beat him up and would have killed him if the national guard had not come out and rescued him. Then he was made the pawn of scheming politicians who tried for two years to get a bribe from his friends. Finally he contested the case on the ground that his civil rights were being violated so he was sent to the supreme court on appeal. On the way he was shipwrecked and suffered a snakebite.

But while he was in prison he wrote, “Now, concerning myself, I want you to know, my brothers, that what has happened to me, in effect, turned out to the advantage of the gospel. For, first of all, my imprisonment means a personal witness for Christ before the palace guards, not to mention others who come and go.” A lot of things have happened unto me that also turned out to the advantage of the gospel.

I well remember when I first began to pray that the Lord would open up “a great door and effectual, though the adversaries be many.” Up to that time I had been planning everything on my own, and didn’t feel any real need for God’s help. Actually, of course, I wasn’t really fishing but merely seining minnows. My life was not very exciting or adventuresome. Dabbling around in the shallows with stereotyped sermon outlines will not really create waves. It is a fairly safe way to kill yourself.

But when I could no longer endure my own emptiness, I resolved to cut the chains which provided both slavery and security. Immediately things began to happen! Since that day I have been in all kinds of thrilling, breathtaking encounters—scores of them! And I have just begun. I love every minute of it! There is never a dull moment, not one. There is no time for remorse over the past. God leads to where the action is!

Let me cite examples of how the Spirit brings one into contact with hungry souls who are unaware of where the bread supply is located. I fly a great deal, crisscrossing the continent many times per year. I began to pray months ago that the Lord would make it possible for me to be seated next to persons who needed my witness. Since that very time I have talked by the hour about Jesus to all kinds of people— an Oriental professor of history, a young Russian and Japanese-speaking linguist who is a United Nations interpreter, a black militant, a stockbroker from the West Coast who was contemplating suicide when he reached his destination. I have witnessed to college athletes, soldiers, sailors and a professional dancer. God's grace knows no favorites!

Not long ago there was only one vacant space on the plane, the center seat next to my aisle seat. A handsome businessman took the seat, and before we were off the ground I asked him what he thought about Jesus. He turned out to be a prominent officer in the Church of the Latter Day Saints in Salt Lake City. It was an animated two hours we spent together and we parted in the terminal as close friends despite our theological differences.

Let me tell you how God used a sleet storm to make it possible for me to reach some people I would never have otherwise touched. I was on a speaking program at a college. A youthful black inner city worker appeared on the same program.

He wanted to talk with me about how I felt that Jesus related to minority groups who were culturally deprived. I was booked solid for interviews and could not see him. He was leaving immediately after my final night speech to drive back to Kansas City, which was 150 miles away.

That night the air terminal notified me that a storm was moving in and all flights were cancelled the next day. The next morning I found the young man with a white schoolteacher in the lobby of the motel. Some inner urge had prompted the young black man to remain overnight. I rode to Kansas City with the two of them and we did not miss a minute in talking about the Lord. I emphasized that social work without Jesus was like a cut flower in a vase as opposed to a growing one. We must sink our roots down deep in the soil of faith if we are to continue to bloom. It had a profound effect upon the three of us to be drawn thus close in the bundle of life, because of Jesus Christ.

The men took me to the Kansas City terminal where I tried in succession Trans World Airlines, Frontier and Braniff, in regular order. I secured a reservation on each, only to have the flight cancelled before boarding procedures began. Finally Braniff secured a Greyhound Bus to transport us to Saint Louis, a four-hour journey. Again there was just one vacant seat. It was next to mine and the bus was backing out of the terminal stall when someone banged on the side, and was admitted to sit down beside me.

The man was using profanity about our plight but I told him it could be much worse and that I knew a friend who could turn it all to our good. I then gave him the story of how Jesus had moved into my life and changed my attitude until I could love even my enemies. We talked the whole way. He had been a Roman Catholic in his earlier days and had lost all faith. He told me that his visit with me was the most interesting and profitable four hours he had ever known. He thanked me profusely. I learned then that he was a Vice-President of Humble Refining Company, wealthy and empty inside.

The same Spirit who prompted Philip to meet the Ethiopian Secretary of the Treasury from one of the richest nations on earth, can make it possible for me to contact someone who is ready for a new dimension of life. I have no doubt at all that he has done so and will continue to do it. Through his instrumentality during the last year I have shared the good news with dropouts from society in hippie communes and with associations of ecumenical ministers from religious establishments. I have spoken on college and university campuses, and to thousands of high school students. It has been my privilege to address ethnic groups of all kinds and speak at sectarian gatherings of many varieties.

I simply turn my life over to God and offer to go into any situation where he calls me. If he gets me in he will get me out. One who has only a sword as a weapon cannot choose his ground. If he fights at all he must engage in eyeball-to-eyeball encounter on the grounds chosen by his opponent. Truth asks no favor. It craves no advantage. The Spirit is my strength and my helper. I want to go everywhere as Paul went to Thessalonica. “We came on to you only because God gave us courage. We came to tell you the gospel, whatever the opposition might be.” Right on! Anywhere with Jesus I can safely go! Anywhere he leads me in this world below. That isn’t just a song with me. It is a motto!

God Works for Good

Mission Messenger (August 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

I hold that Jesus is Lord over life. I mean the whole life—all of it. I do not go for the kind of fragmented personality which “saves Sunday out” to serve God. One does not turn the grace of God on and off like a faucet in the kitchen sink. God is interested in everything that I do. He wants me to mow the lawn, trim the shrubs, and roast wieners in his name and to his glory. Certainly he wants me to sit down with the saints at the Lord’s table, but when Nell and I bow our heads and thank him for our food, the kitchen table also becomes the Lord’s table.

God does not just smile when everything is going along happily for me, and turn his head when it isn’t. He sees me when I bruise my arm falling off the bicycle I’m learning to ride. He also knows when I carelessly take my eyes off the road and hit the bridge railing. He even knows to what hospital I am taken, and the number of my room. He knows my temperature before the nurse reads the thermometer. It is destructive of his role as a father to think that he is only interested in the “big things” that I do. Often character is revealed more by some of the little things which are done thoughtlessly than by those which demand a good deal of study and rationalization.

And the greatest thing about his being Lord of all is that the Spirit can so order and arrange everything that it will work out for ultimate good. Even my foolish mistakes and asinine blunders can be fitted into a pattern of life. Sorrow and suffering can be woven into the warp and woof until they actually enhance instead of wrecking the design. This does not mean we ought to deliberately do a lot of silly things so there will be more depth and shadow in the picture called life. As humans caught up in the earthly predicament we will furnish enough hazy background without daubing more in on purpose.

My God is Lord of suffering! He knows how to place my physical agony and mental travail into proper perspective. Since I believe this with all of my heart I do not have to worry or fret about the future. I do not have to be anxious about tomorrow. He is the God of tomorrow as well as of today. I can glorify him by the way I endure hardship as well as by clapping my hands and singing when I feel exuberant over what we call “good fortune.” There is no such thing! It is not fortune, but faith!

Everything is going to work out to his praise. Everything! If you are one of the sad skeptics who want to go around pricking balloons of faith, don’t bother with me. I am not flying a balloon filled with hot air. I’m not blowing bubbles. My faith is substantial. That word means “to stand under.” It is as firm as concrete. You can no more puncture it than a bumblebee can drill a hole in the sidewalk. I brush doubts aside like flies. I am seeking the kingdom of God and his righteousness. When you do this all else will be added. God will take care of the addition. Just keep on seeking and let heaven operate the computer.

“We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him, who are called according to his purpose” (Romans 8:28).

I consider this rendering superior to that of the Authorized Version. The apostle asserts it as a certainty that God works with us for good, and does so in everything. “We know” is positive. It lifts the matter out of the realm of wishful thinking and speculation. And it excludes no area of life from God’s direction or cognizance. I am personally convinced that God is concerned with every thought and action of my life.

Shakespeare wrote, “There’s a divinity that shapes our lives, rough hew them how we will.” Henry Ward Beecher said, “Everything that happens in the world is part of a great plan of God running through all time.” Thomas Carlyle said, “In the huge mass of evil as it rolls and swells, there is ever some good working toward deliverance and triumph.”

Jesus buoys up my spirit by drawing lessons from the whole panoply of nature. He does it so casually that one might think that God had in mind my own reassurance when he made things as they are. “Look at the birds . . . your heavenly Father feeds them. Are you not of more value than they?” “If God clothes the grass of the field . . . will he not much more clothe you?” “If you then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?”

My part is to love him. This is the way I show that I am “called according to his purpose.” Love is my response to the divine call. It is God’s purpose in calling us to arouse and engender within us that love which will provide harmony between ourselves and him.

There is a purpose behind this universe, and purpose implies design, intent and determination. Actually it is quite close to the word propose, and what God purposes in mind he proposes to accomplish in fact. He has called me. I heard that call and I have answered it. And I know that in Him all things will fall into place for my good. That is why I intend to honor him by life or by death. I have no time to stand around and argue about how and when God works in my life or accomplishes his purpose. I shall just do my part and trust Him. He will not fail! My little universe is not as great as the one He made.

It makes a great deal of difference to me when I realize that I do not go it alone. Life is not lived in a spiritual vacuum, devoid of real meaning or purpose. If God is working in everything to produce order and good for those who love him, I can look for his hand in anything that happens. Thus, life takes on new dimensions as I work to achieve his purpose and he works to the same end. And sometimes what appear at first to be perplexing detours turn out to be highways to success and happiness.

“For whom he foreknew, he also predetermined to be of a form like the form of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren” (Romans 8:29).

It seems a little incredible that this verse and the following one have been made the ground for the most bitter theological conflict in the Christian realm. Little did the apostle realize when he wrote this brief section what would occur as the result of it. Moses E. Lard wrote, “It has been the theme of the most voluminous and conflicting criticism. It forms the creed of the Calvinist and the puzzle of the Arminian; and hot and long has been the battle they have waged over it. It would not be true to say that no good has come of this strife; but I must think that the good has been fearfully disproportionate to the evil.”

Obviously the passage is inserted merely to demonstrate the truth that God’s concern is to “bring many sons unto glory.” The divine design will not be frustrated. God foreknew and predetermined the destiny of the called ones, those who respond to his summons in love.

To foreknow is to know beforehand, and it must relate to some period of time, either real or assumed. Whatever date or time is accepted, foreknowledge precedes it. The Bible locates the time as the beginning of the world as we know it, the inception of the universe of mankind. Before the foundation of the world the infinite mind conceived the idea that men would respond to a divine call, and by their own choice be motivated to share in a fellowship with him, a koinonia of eternal life, the life of God.

Accordingly, God not only foreknew this, but destined in advance that such persons would become like the image of his Son. This did not obligate any individual to obey God. In the matter of obedience all were left free. It is not that I share in God's grace because it was destined that I obey, but because I obey it was destined that I share in His grace. And sharing in his grace makes it possible for me to be made after the likeness of his Son!

The reference is to the resurrection. God ordained that Jesus be made in the image of man to share our suffering before his resurrection, and he determined that we be made in the image of Christ, to share his glory after our resurrection. The resurrection completes our adoption. The redemption of the body removes the last obstacle to becoming like Jesus. "He will transform the body belonging to our humble state, and give it a form like that of his own resplendent body, by the very power which enables him to make all things subject to himself" (Phil. 3:21).

I do not know what I shall be like, because I am not sure what form he now has. "Here and now, dear friends, we are God's children; what we shall be has not yet been disclosed, but we know when it is discovered we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2). I am convinced that it will be a glorious experience, a tremendous spiritual adventure. Jesus is the firstborn from the dead to die no more. He must have the pre-eminence in all things. But he does not share his glorified state in isolation. He is the firstborn among many brethren. We shall be like him. We will receive the form of his glorious body. As Moses E. Lard wrote, "His body is the type, and all the bodies of the redeemed will take shape after it."

“And whom he predetermined, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified, and whom he justified, them he also glorified” (Romans 8:30).

William Barclay writes, “This is a passage which has been very seriously misused. If we are ever to understand this passage we must grasp the basic fact that Paul never meant it to be an expression of theology or philosophy; he meant it to be the almost lyrical expression of Christian experience. If we take this as a philosophy and theology and if we apply standards of cold logic to it, it must mean that God chose some and did not choose others, that there is a strange and terrible selectiveness in the love of God. But that is not what the passage means.”

When Dr. Barclay penned those words he did so as a Presbyterian scholar and a professor in the aged and respected Glasgow University. His words show how remarkably the creed of Calvinism is being rejected in our times. They also demonstrate how the concept of a loving God permeates our consciousness and gives us a thrilling hope.

As an “expression of Christian experience” the foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justification and glorification of the saints is a wonderful thing. It meets the needs of my soul-hunger and confirms my own inner feeling. I am ever conscious of my own inability to devise a means of my own salvation, and of the futility of trying to attain to glory by my own power. I must be lifted out of myself by one from outside. I cannot lift myself because I have nothing upon which to stand while I pull and tug to free myself. Indeed, my real struggle is to be free of myself, for “in my flesh dwelleth no good thing.”

What Paul writes, therefore, is not a cold exposition of theology, but a warm reassurance of a divine purpose which includes me. And it is not something devised or dreamed up as an emergency measure to rescue me at the last moment. It has always been a part of God’s plan, from before the foundation of the universe, and it is now available to me through the Spirit. All I need to do is to plug in. The power is there. It has always been there since the Spirit came.

1. This fact provides me with strength when I realize that God knows no failures. He launches no ships which are lost at sea, no capsules which disappear into untrackable space. Even before we were made he saw us safely in the eternal harbor, floodlighted by the beams of eternal love. I can trust the purpose of God. I need no life-preserver of my own construction, no boat drill to abandon ship in mid-ocean.

2. This fact provides me with a sense of confidence, because I know I am involved in a purpose which has unvaryingly kept its course despite all the vagaries of human history and the plots of demonic invention. "In him is no variableness, not even a shadow cast as by turning or veering." As the song puts it, "In Jesus I'm safe evermore!"

3. This fact provides me with incentive to meet the trials and temptations of each day. I can ride out the storm because I know that tomorrow the winds will have subsided. Although tempests rage and roar "there will be peace in the valley for me."

I have been called of God. All of the divine mercy, kindness and grace which makes up God has been involved in that call. And I have heard it, responded to it and embraced it. Now all I am and all I have is in his hands. As Frances E. Gardner says in God is Fabulous, "And it's a peculiar thing, it doesn't really make any difference what he shows me now that I'm waiting on him, because since I asked Christ to live his life through me, what I do is inconsequential, but I am really eager to see what he is going to do."

I have been justified by God. It would be the height of arrogance and boasting to claim that one was justified if it was assumed to be an attainment of his own. But one cannot achieve justification. He must be declared guiltless. This is the work of God whose majesty is offended by every sin. All sin is rooted in the displacement of the will of God by the will of man. Only God can forgive the thoughtless attitudes which cause men to seek to usurp divine prerogatives.

I will be glorified. When glory is used to describe our future, beyond this period of existence in time, it refers to that state of blessedness in which we will share all of the majestic life of God. Of course it is unknowable and indescribable here and now. It is the eternal heritage which awaits at the end of the road, the splendor for which the King has destined his children. So precious is the thought of participating in that dazzling brightness that it overshadows all of the suffering and pain which our present state entails.

I eagerly urge you not to give up or grow weary. Do not faint under criticism. Do not allow any root of bitterness to spring up and defile you. Do not be beguiled by devious doctrines nor stumble because of the shortcomings of others. Wait for the dawn. The sun will rise when the Son descends!

The Backlash

Mission Messenger (August 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

Every amateur fisherman who has fooled around with a casting rod knows what a backlash is. When one sends the line flying through the guides, he must use his thumb to apply pressure to the reel, or the spool will continue to revolve after the line has reached its maximum thrust. If it does, the line remaining on the spool spills off to create an ingloriously tangled mess. One of our Canadian guides always referred to a backlash as “a bird’s nest.” Another called it “spaghetti,” while still another referred to it as “a can of worms.” You do not need to be experienced to realize that all three of these have in common the intertwining of their chief ingredient in a snarl or tangle.

But there is another usage of the word not related to the mechanical. The dictionary defines it as “a sudden, violent recoil or reaction, as of a wave of popular opinion.” It is in that sense I use it in this article and I refer to the current unrest and resentment which characterizes “the Church of Christ.” Of course it is manifest in other religious establishments as well, even the Roman Catholic, but I want to discuss it in the particular frame of reference which I know best.

One would have to be completely insensitive to reality if he did not recognize that “the Church of Christ” is in difficulty. Of course this will be denied by the partisan publicity purveyors whose task it is to defend the institutional image, but they are not especially noted for objectivity, and will probably go down with the ship, still waving the flag and insisting that all is well, even to their final gurgle.

We have gloried so long in the cleverly-contrived fiction that we are “the fastest growing religious movement” in this age, that it will be difficult for most brethren to admit that we are not as big as we boasted of being. How would you determine the membership of the Churches of Christ? Dr. DeGroot said it was done by the editor of the Gospel Advocate, who multiplied his subscription list by the size of his hat. Who is counted in the “rough estimate” supplied as being “reasonably authentic”? Does the figure include all two dozen antagonistic parties which do not recognize one another as “loyal,” and will not even call upon rival adherents to pray to the one God and Father of us all?

Regardless of who is included, the whole factional mess is seething with unrest and discontent. Young people in college are abandoning it in droves. Others of their number are waiting for the chance to “go over the hill” in a way that will not “upset the folks.” What a lot of them do not realize is that “the folks” are holding on by the skin of their spiritual teeth rather than to “upset the children.” A lot of this has to do with the tenor of the times which are times of general revolution, but a great deal of it stems from the fact that institutional arrogance and insolence have had their day, and the members have had their fill of it. They are sick and tired of the fighting, squabbling. Jealousy and hostility which passes for loyalty to the Christ who died for our sins.

This kind of frank appraisal brings deep resentment from some quarters. It subjects us to a barrage of verbal attacks. Nothing is said if one points out the shortcomings of our Baptist and Methodist friends. There is an open season on them. They are always fair game. But to reveal our own sectarian attitudes is to “speak against the Lord’s church.” And right there is one of the problems! We have confused the religious scene which developed from an early nineteenth century restoration attempt, sparked primarily by good Presbyterians, with the one body. And we have cultivated a spirit of hostility and exclusivism which is worse than that of many groups under our fire.

I should like to go on record as saying that I do not equate any of our two dozen factions with “the Lord’s church.” For that matter, I do not consider that all of them jammed together constitute the bride of Christ. There are members of the one body, known to God, who have never heard of us. Every saved person on the face of this earth is in the one body. Not all are in “the Church of Christ” by any means. Some of them have never heard of Alexander Campbell or Barton W. Stone. One can reveal the sordid facts about the division and strife in “the Church of Christ” and never say a word in derogation of the church of Christ. Satan never pulled a more thorough “con job” in history than when he befuddled the minds of some otherwise wonderful people until they cannot tell the difference between what the Lord created and what they have invented.

To brand a particular movement, with its multiplied squabbles and schisms as “the Lord’s church,” in opposition to all of the other children of God upon earth, caught up in the same kind of problem, smacks of a kind of bigotry which will effectually isolate us and force us to retreat deeper within our monastic walls. “The Church of Christ on earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one.” So wrote Thomas Campbell, while still a Presbyterian. He was correct then as he faced up to sectarianism, and his pronouncement is just as true now as we face up to our own sectarianism. I should like to analyze our present state and tell you why I think that a lot of sincere brothers and sisters are gritting their teeth because of what has happened unto us.

OUR UNWRITTEN CREEDS

We set out to convince the world that all who believe in Christ Jesus on the basis of apostolic testimony could be united on a foundation consisting of one provable fact, transcending all others in the universe. That fact is that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God. Alexander Campbell said,

The grandeur, sublimity and beauty of the foundation of hope, and of ecclesiastical or social union, established by the author and founder of Christianity, consisted in this— that the belief of one fact, and that upon the best evidence in the world, is all that is requisite as far as faith goes, to salvation. The belief of this one fact, and submission to one institution as expressive of it, is all that is required of Heaven to admission into the church.

Note that Campbell said that belief of this one fact is the foundation of “ecclesiastical or social union.”

Walter Scott wrote, “Christianity, therefore, has a fixed, fundamental, constitutional truth for its creed— forever the same.” He also said, “It is no doctrine that Christ taught, nor any action that he performed, that forms the article of faith in the gospel. It is himself— as God’s Son.” Again, he wrote, “Every party creed is exclusive, and, therefore, has no proof, as such, for its truth and authority but the party formed and raised upon it. But the true creed— the divinity of the Messiah— has the vote of God, of the Son, of the Holy Spirit, and of all the holy apostles and Christians of the first ages.”

Regardless of what opinions, deductions, rationalizations and speculations a man may hold, these in no sense nullify his relationship to God if he firmly believes in the testimony afforded to the Messiahship and divine Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth. It is none of our concern, and we have no right to engage in an inquisition to determine his orthodoxy. Alexander Campbell aptly stated it thus, “Whether he believes the five points condemned, or the five points approved, by the Synod of Dort is not so much as to be asked of him; whether he holds any of the views of the Calvinists or Arminians, Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, or Quakers, is never once to be asked of such persons, in order to admission into the Christian community called the church.”

This simply means that men of divergent views, ideas and opinions may come together in Jesus and on Jesus, as the one foundation and there be built into one holy temple in the Lord. To elevate any opinion or deduction to a test of union or communion is to formulate another creed and create another sect. No point of view and no view of a point can ever be elevated to a test of fellowship for those in Christ. The penalty of creed-making is schism and its logical train of consequences. And that is our problem now!

The non-instrument Churches of Christ were betrayed into becoming a sectarian party when they elevated an opinion or interpretation related to music to a condition or test of fellowship. Regardless of whether such mechanical accompaniment to praise may eventually be proscribed, endorsed or ignored by heaven, is not the question. It was made an article of faith and elevated to a creedal status. And it caused a schism, a party, as such things always do.

Once a movement suffers such a cleavage it ceases to be a force for unity among the sects and only aggravates the condition by contributing to the existing hostility and partisan wrangling. It is silly to think of those who cannot stay together as having any appeal to others to come together.

In our case a veritable Pandora's box of evils was unleashed and we now have at least two dozen unwritten creeds. Every party among us is built upon a foundation, and that foundation is a creed. It is something to which one must subscribe in order to be accepted and recognized as in good standing in the party. The only authority for such a creed is the party erected upon it. It comes by rationalization, not revelation.

It is human in origin and without eternal or universal merit. The creed is validated only by the party “somewhats.” They constitute the sole authority for it. It must be accepted upon their interpretation. Every party, segment and faction in “the Church of Christ” today rests its partisan existence upon the wisdom of men, and not upon the wisdom from above.

This does not say that every person in this historical framework rests his faith on men’s wisdom. Many are like myself, they no longer support a partisan position, nor pay lipservice to a narrow and exclusive creed. They belong only to Christ Jesus. They have extricated themselves from the toils of inferior creeds. Obviously they are under suspicion and attack by those who are still in the bonds of creedal slavery, but this is always the price of freedom, and it is always worth the price.

There is a great wave of growing dissatisfaction among the brethren. Many of them have long been better than their narrow creeds. They are becoming better educated. Authoritarian structures always depend to a great extent upon ignorance and apathy. When the constituency begins to think and act the establishment is in danger. That is the problem with the Roman Catholic Church in our day, a monolithic system with which we have had much more in common than we have been willing to admit.

A lot of folk are going A.W.O.L., being filled with frustration and baffled by the power politics of the powers-that-be. Since the word “discouragement” isn’t really a part of my spiritual vocabulary I am “staying put.” There isn’t so much use of swapping parties and exchanging one set of problems for another. If I do not live for Jesus where I am I’d probably not set the world on fire for him in a strange environment. Fly-by-nights reveal much more about themselves than about those from whom they flee. A dog does not really better himself by changing the fleas to which he has become accustomed for a new batch with which he will have to become acquainted and which may not understand his temperament.

Is there any hope for “the Church of Christ”? Will it ever get back on the track again and out of the blackberry bushes along the right-of-way? I am a little reluctant to make any prediction since I do not have the gift of prophecy. I know what we need to do, but to get brethren to do it is not going to be at all easy. After you have debated a position for years, drummed up a lot of arguments, and misapplied a number of scriptures to sustain them, it is hard on your pride to haul down your flag and admit that you have been so nearsighted you could not tell the difference between your enemies and your brethren. It is sometimes a little complicated by the fact that they are the same!

But we need to be brave and daring enough to go back to the fork in the road where we became schismatics and candidly admit that we were wrong in setting up a “non-instrument creed” as the basis of our hope of eternal life. We can argue, fuss, debate and quarrel about all of the trivia which has occupied our time since, but we will never again be a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects until we can unite the Christians in the restoration movement. We must declare all of our own sects null and void, and cease to even think that we will ever convert the believing world to our little parties, and also cease to think that God wants us to do it!

Even if we were to settle “the Sunday School question,” the support of Herald of Truth, the problem of individuals cups, and all the rest of our factional hangups, we would still be a divided people, and a laughing-stock to the thinking world. Unless we cultivate vision as opposed to division, and foresight as opposed to hindsight, we will have no real influence. We cannot truly lay the foundation of God because we are so busy defending our own partisan foundations.

Let me emphasize again that the question is not the right or wrong of using instrumental music. Important as that may seem to you, it is purely secondary and inferior. The question is whether any opinion or view should be elevated to creedal status and be allowed to displace the noble confession which God himself made and upon which Jesus said he would plant the community of the called and chosen ones.

Just as the adoption of our first partisan creed paved the way for succeeding schisms, so each new division lays the groundwork for another. We will continue to divide until we renounce the whole insane tendency which causes the body to tear at its own flesh and rend its own tissue. It is useless to continue the fabric of false argument contrived under the duress of debate. It offers nothing to a tired and jaded world except more of the same sterility, stupidity and insecurity. It is time to go back, all the way back, and recapture the foundational principle of unity and offer it to the whole sectarian world as the one hope for oneness in Christ Jesus, our Savior and Lord!

Let us forget the silly and asinine pride which causes us to bicker like immature children over who was to blame originally. The question is not about who split the log, but who is going to glue it back together again. While we are pointing accusing fingers at one another about what our fathers did, the world is dying and going to hell. How much longer will we stand hurling verbal insults at brethren while Satan takes a holiday and the angel of death thrusts his sickle in and cuts down the grain of the earth?

I do not propose that we “patch up our difficulties.” The time is too far spent for that. I propose that we strip off the whole ragged garment, splashed with the fratricidal blood of God’s other children and put on the new robe of righteousness. I propose that we abandon our pillboxes to the moles and the bats, and cease to man our artificial bastions, and all of us move back into the true fortress of God, where we can sing together, “We have a strong city whose walls and ramparts are our deliverance. Open the gates to let a righteous nation in, a nation that keeps the faith.”

Banish every creed but Christ Jesus! Chop down every party standard! Eradicate every test of fellowship except the one God enunciated. Use justice as a plumb-line and righteousness as a plummet! Rise up out of the dust of ignominy and shame. Cease to fight over opinions. Ignore them and love the brethren — all of them, those who disagree with you as much as those who agree. Stop trying to be of one opinion. Such oneness cannot save. Its absence cannot damn. Alexander Campbell wrote thus:

“Reason and experience unite their testimony in assuring us that, in the same proportion as individuals labor to be of one opinion, they disagree. The greater the emphasis laid upon opinions, the more rapidly they generate. The nearest approaches to a unity of opinion which I have ever witnessed, have appeared in those societies in which no effort was made to be of one opinion; in which they allowed the greatest liberty of opinion, and in which they talked more and boasted more of the glory and majesty of the great facts, the wonderful works of God’s lovingkindness to the children of men, than of themselves, their views and attainments.”

In the exercise of a wisdom that has long since been lost by those who are historical heirs of the movement with which Campbell was identified, he went on to make these sage observations:

If I were to attempt to produce the greatest uniformity of opinion, I would set about it by paying no respect to opinions, laying no emphasis upon them, admiring and contemning no opinion as such. But if I wished to produce the greatest discrepancies in opinion, I would call some damnably dangerous, others of vital importance; I would always eulogize the sound, and censure the erroneous in opinions. We all know that strife is like the bursting forth of water, it always widens the channels; and many a broil in churches, neighborhoods and families, would have been prevented if the first indication had been sympathetically attributed to the infirmity of human nature.

I think it can be said, without exaggeration, that many brethren are far ahead of the leadership in knowledge and in desire for peace. They are sick of being treated like little children playing in the marketplace, tired of being the pawns in religious political maneuverings. They are ready to divest themselves of factional garb and don the garment of reconciling love. Our sympathies are with those who rebel at the idea of being kept in the dark by those whom they pay huge sums to enlighten them.

The day of the whip-cracking hierarchy is drawing to a close. If brethren cannot meet without being subjected to party propaganda and hostility they will meet in their homes, and welcome all of their brethren, without catechizing them as to their opinions. They will receive one another in Christ Jesus as God has received us all. The Church of Christ has a dismal future unless it renounces its sectarian stance and seeks to be what it has always professed to be.

More Than Conquerors

Mission Messenger (September 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

“What shall we then say to these things? If God be for us, who can be against us?” (Romans 8:31).

What is included in “these things?” Of one thing we can be certain, and that is it is of such a nature as to provide complete assurance for the believer that God will not fail him in time of need, and no foe will be powerful enough to overcome him who is shielded by divine love. The prophet Isaiah wrote, “No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper, and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of me, saith the Lord” (54:17).

Paul wrote, “Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ” (2 Cor. 2:14), or as another rendering expresses it, “Wherever I go, thank God he makes my life a constant pageant of triumph in Christ” (Moffatt). “These things” which contribute to our strength and hope are those which have just been enunciated by the apostle in the three preceding verses. They begin with the tremendous declaration, “We know that to those who love God, everything fits into a pattern for good” (Phillips).

If everything fits into a pattern for good, then nothing that happens can work our ultimate defeat. Victory is a foregone conclusion for those who march to the clear sound of the glorious trumpet. So the conclusion based upon these things must be that if God is for us no one can really stand against us. Adam Clarke makes an appropriate comment at this juncture. “He who is infinitely wise has undertaken to direct us; he who is infinitely powerful has undertaken to protect us; he who is infinitely good has undertaken to save us. What cunning, strength or malice, can prevail against his wisdom, power and goodness?”

Isaiah records the challenge of God to those who would seek to thwart his purpose. “Who would set the briers and thorns against me in battle? I would go through them, I would burn them together” (27:4). In ancient times a hedge of thorns was considered to be an effective wall, and an impenetrable barrier. But God will not be hindered or frustrated by barriers thrown up by his enemies. All I need to do to overcome is to stay behind God and go through with him!

“He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?” (Romans 8:32).

The problem of doubt about future victory is settled for the believer from the moment in which he accepts intellectually, emotionally and unreservedly that God actually and purposely delivered up his own Son for us all. The force of the apostolic argument will be lost upon those who deny the pre-existence of the Word who was made flesh, or who have been snared by the subtleties of theological liberalism and whose mental meanderings lead them to explain away the divine Sonship of Jesus. It makes all the difference in the world whether God simply watched “another man” die on a Roman cross, or saw his own Son agonize and know that he was “smitten for transgressions which were not his own.”

I reject as wholly unworthy of my time or thought the misled and misleading mouthings which seek to explain away the sacrifice of God's own Son, or to water down the fact that it was the working of the divine will. Agape is the love which knows no bounds. It is affirmed that "there is nothing love cannot face" (1 Cor. 13:7). It is that active and beneficent goodwill which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object.

And it was this love which caused God to give his only begotten Son. It is a dynamic so great, a motivation so powerful, that it holds back nothing in the pursuit of its goal. It "endures without limit" (1 Cor. 13:7), and will certainly "bring forth judgment unto victory." Those who do not grasp the intensity of agape can never understand how God could "spare not his own Son." Those who do grasp it can realize that what happened was inevitable, a corollary to the nature of such love.

He was "delivered up for us all." The expression "delivered up" involves more than the crucifixion. It conveys the thought that he was handed over to men who would mock and abuse him, and then kill him. Peter said, "Him being delivered in accordance with God's definite plan and with his previous knowledge, you with the help of heathen men, nailed him to a cross and put him to death" (Acts 2:23).

This was done for all, regardless of ethnic origin, national identification, social standing or previous condition of servitude. Jesus was the free gift of God to rescue men from the bondage of sin. He is thus a veritable exemplification of divine grace, that undeserved kindness which assumes that all else which is essential to our wellbeing and ultimate glory will be forthcoming from God. The whole thing is very simple. If God did not forbear to give his own Son, surely he will not hesitate to bestow all else that is required to fulfill the divine purpose as relates to all of us.

"Who would dare to accuse us, whom God has chosen? It is God who acquits us?" (Romans 8:33).

This is legal language, the terminology of the courtroom. With such language the apostle was, by training, thoroughly familiar. If the judge of all the earth has acquitted us and pronounced us guiltless, if the Supreme Justice has actually chosen or adopted us, then who would have the audacity to appear and file an accusation against us?

I need not be at all concerned about what men may say or do. If I am in Christ, wholly trusting in his righteousness, I am impervious to their attack. Even if my motives are assailed, and my name maligned, I will be vindicated. God will have the last word. The divine purpose in my life will be victorious. What a thrill it is to know that only God can justify. For this reason only he can condemn. But he cannot condemn one whom he has justified, for justification is the antithesis of condemnation.

Justification is a judicial act. It takes place in heaven. It is a pronouncement of the divine mind. It cannot be earned, purchased, or procured by works. It is solely the gift of grace, and having been accorded, it is not subject to reversal by virtue of additional testimony from an outside party. Justification takes into account all of the factors, and the case will not be re-opened. In Christ I am free. I am safe. I am made to be guiltless by divine fiat.

“Who is he that condemneth? It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us” (Romans 8:34).

The only one who could possibly pass the sentence of condemnation upon God’s chosen ones is Christ. The Father committed all judgment to the Son, and gave him authority to execute judgment also because he is the Son of man (John 5:27). Because he is the Son of God he is entitled to judge the universe, and because he is the Son of man he is eminently qualified to judge all men. If Christ will not condemn the chosen ones of God, no one else is in position to do so. And there are four reasons why Christ will not condemn us:

(1) He died for us in order that we might believe in and accept him as the atonement for our sins. Thus he has said, “Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life” (John 5:24).

(2) He is risen again, and the apostle declares in this very letter that the justification granted Abraham on the ground of his trust in God, is “for us also, unto whom it will be reckoned, if we believe on him that raised up Jesus our Lord from the dead, who was delivered up because of our offences, and was raised to life for our acquittal” (Romans 4:24, 25). The very purpose of the resurrection was for the justification of those who trust in the righteousness of Jesus.

(3) Jesus is at the right hand of God, a position of eminent majesty, power and authority. And he is there as the sovereign head of the whole ekklesia, the very body of the called out, the chosen ones. That body of the elect is “the completeness of Him who everywhere fills the universe with himself.” Certainly Jesus will not condemn the very body of which he is the head, and if he does not there is no power in the universe which can do so. He is above all rule, authority, power and lordship (Eph. 1:21.-23).

(4) He also makes intercession for us. In verse 26, we learn that the Holy Spirit makes intercession for us, and in the passage we are considering it is affirmed that Jesus does also. The Spirit makes intercession from within us, while Jesus does so in heaven. Instead of condemning us, Jesus pleads our case, and assists us, presenting our interests and interceding in our behalf. “He is able to save absolutely all who approach unto God through him, because he always lives to intercede for them always” (Hebrews 7:25).

“Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?” (8:35).

The first question can be taken in either of two ways. It may relate to our love for Christ, or to his love for us. I gather from the context that the former is the correct interpretation, and that the question deals with the power of the love we have for Jesus who has cleansed and justified us. My reason for believing this is that the things which are enumerated are those which might cause us to grow weary of serving the Lord, but I do not see how tribulation or persecution would cause Jesus to cease from loving us.

Albert Barnes says, “The argument, therefore, is drawn from the strong love of a Christian to his Saviour; and from the assurance that nothing would be able to separate him from that love.” Adam Clarke writes, “The question is not, Who shall separate the love of Christ from us? or prevent Christ from loving us? but, Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Who or what shall be able to remove our affection from him?”

We must never forget that this letter was written to followers of Christ in Rome and that Rome, driven to desperation by the spread of the faith, used every kind of persecution and duress to separate Christians from Christ. Indeed, there was a real test between the pagan love for power and the Christian power of love. Rome was struggling to survive while the saints were surviving to struggle, and it was a real question as to who would win the battle.

Tribulation is from thlipsis, the root of which means to compress or oppress. The English word is from the Latin tribulum, a threshing instrument. Suffering and trials tend to separate the grain from the chaff. The argument of the apostle is that such tribulation cannot break the bond we sustain with Jesus.

Distress is from stenochoria, which signifies a strait or narrow confine. It is from stenos, strait, and choros, a place. It was sometimes used for a mountain passage so restricted that one had to literally worm his way between the rocks. Both tribulation and distress indicate pressure, but the first has to do with pressure from without, the second from pressure within. The import of the original for distress is to be hemmed in on every side. We use the expression, "Everywhere I turned I ran into a wall!" This is the mental state of distress.

Persecution is from diogmos, to pursue or chase, with a view of destroying the object of hostility. Famine is from limos, to fail. It refers to the failure of crops or food supply and the consequent hunger which results. Nakedness is from gumnotes, the word whose root gives us our own modern terms gymnasium and gymnastics. The Greek athletes engaged in physical exercises wholly in the nude. In Paul's use of the term he refers to one who has no clothing, having been divested of every stitch of clothing, stripped by his persecutors.

Peril is derived from kindunos, the danger which continually surrounds or hovers over one, affecting the mental state with alarm and constant fear of calamity. There is about it the idea of impending disaster, so that one is left in a constant condition of foreboding and genuine unrest. Sword is from machaira, and stands for the taking of life, especially by beheading, at the order of the civil magistrate.

As one reads the gloomy catalog of suffering, degradation and jeopardy, he becomes aware of what a tremendous force is found in that love which these things cannot crack or shake loose. No wonder Paul says of that love, "It gives us power to endure anything" (1 Cor. 13:7). Armed with such love the Christian is impervious to all attack by the world, the flesh and the devil.

"As it is written. For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter” (Romans 8:36).

This quotation from Psalm 44:22 is introduced to show that faithful followers of the Messiah would be harassed and persecuted by a wicked and unbelieving world. The forces of a dissolute and pagan society will make those who are loyal to the true and living God their daily sacrifices. It is worth asking if the lack of persecution today results from the improvement of the men of the world or from the spirit of compromise on the part of the church which has become the very symbol of the status quo, the image of respectability and the guardian of the caste system. It is questionable whether the institutional church is a garrison of troops eager for the encounter and fervent for the fray, or if it is an expensive stable for sheltering the sacred cows which must be fed, curried, pampered and protected.

Lewis Mumford in Faith for Living, says, “The divine discontent has been replaced by a complacent pedestrianism.” Pierre Berton in The Comfortable Pew writes, “The church to its opponents has become a straw man, scarcely worth a bullet.” Nothing should frighten us quite so much as being accepted by the pagan culture. When those in the church are bored to death and those outside are wholly indifferent, we are no longer an effective movement, but an attractive monument. And monuments are made to visit and cause momentary reflection upon past accomplishments and glory. Soldiers under fire have little time to reflect upon history. They are too busy making it!

We are not in a great deal of danger now for we are no longer plowing the seas with banners flying and guns trained on the enemy. We have sailed into harbor and tied up at the wharf as if the war was over. Our activities are mostly on shipboard and consist of entertainment for the apathetic and indolent troops who have never smelled the smoke of battle and have only engaged in games with wooden guns. We are no longer killed all the day long. We are not accounted as sheep for the slaughter. We are sheep, but we will die in the pasture, from fat which makes it difficult for us to waddle to the feeding trough.

“Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him that loved us” (Romans 8:37).

This is a powerful statement in which Paul once again draws from an arsenal of terms in a military vocabulary to write to persons in a city which had developed the mightiest military machine in the world. Tribulation, persecution, distress, peril, the sword— these are the shock-troops thrown at the forces of faith. And those forces are not only able to overcome the onslaught, but actually to use the opposition to help produce a glorious victory.

The story is told of the captain of an invading force who was asked what he would do if a superior army of defenders came out to block his attempt to storm a city wall. “Climb over them,” was his reply. It is a very homely saying that, “It is not the size of the dog in the fight, but the size of the fight in the dog which counts.” Men are not overcome by externals who do not first surrender inside themselves.

To be a conqueror is honor enough, to be more than a conqueror is to be invincible, or unconquerable. This is our lot and destiny through him who loved us! “Thanks be unto God which always causeth us to triumph in Christ” (2 Cor. 2:14). “Our sufficiency is of God” (2 Cor. 3:5). “Therefore I take pleasure in infirmities, in reproaches, in necessities, in persecutions, in distresses for Christ’s sake: for when I am weak, then I am strong” (2 Cor. 12:10). The man who trusts in his own strength and power is a fool. He is like a bushman with a crude homemade bow and arrow attempting to overpower an enemy equipped with sophisticated long-range rifles. There is a difference between humanistic bravado and the humble bravery which results from complete trust in Jesus.

The apostle now enumerates a list of things of powerful and frightening aspect which acted as real enemies in the minds of the superstitious Romans and Greeks of his day. These were things which were commonly regarded as in conspiracy to thwart the will of the gods, or which forced the pantheon of deities to engage in devious methods to circumvent them. Thomas Bulfinch referred to them as “gorgons, hydras and chimeras dire.”

But Paul confidently affirms that none of these can overthrow the purpose of the living God. The love of God is not dependent upon the Three Fates— Clotho, Lachesis, and Atropos, whose task was to spin the thread of human destiny, and to cut it off with their shears when they pleased. The filament of each man’s life is not spun on the wheel of chance. The more I study the last two verses in Romans 8, the more absorbed in their message do I become. I think they constitute at once the most beautiful and comforting sentence in human language which I have ever read.

“For I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creation, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Romans 8:38, 39).

1. We generally speak of life and death, in that order, but Paul mentions death first. I cannot be sure of his reason, but I suspect that he gives priority to the inevitable and inescapable, for the simple reason that many of the Roman philosophic cults in his day regarded death as the gateway to oblivion. It wrote “finis” to the dreams and hopes of all human beings as they thought of it.

A good example is found in the writings of the Latin poet Catullus. He died about fifty years before Jesus was born, but his death only served to increase the interest in his works. At the time when Paul wrote to the Romans, Catullus was making the best-seller list in the Imperial City, with his posthumously copied works. Like most of the Roman writers of the time, Catullus produced some fairly pornographic material, specializing in sexual intrigue and purple passion.

One of the famous poems of all ages is that which Catullus addressed to Lesbia, the beautiful wife of one of his friends. In it he says, "Let us live, my Lesbia, and let us love, and let us value at a single denarius the advice of stern old men who would inhibit us. Suns can set and then come up again, but for us, when once our brief light goes out, there is but one perpetual night through which we must sleep."

The Greeks knew no relationship which death could not sever. They had no way to penetrate the black pall or look behind the curtain. They preferred the worst kind of life to death. Euripides expressed this in these words, "Yet mortals, burdened with countless ills, still love life. They long for each coming day, glad to bear the thing they know, rather than face death the unknown." It must have come with dynamic power when Paul affirmed that death cannot sever us from the love of God. This struck a blow at the futility of life and the finality of death.

2. Life cannot separate us from God's love either. Sometimes it is easier to die for a cause than to live for it. It is not the sudden risk or danger of death which is the true test of the soldier. Rather, it is the daily slogging through mud and slush, the living in mildewed trenches, the eating of monotonous canned rations, which proves the mettle. We must fight the erosion of faith by the sheer fact of endurance. But the matter is settled for the one who knows the adventure of being in Christ, and sharing in the power-packed life.

3. Angels, Principalities, Powers. The casual reader may wonder why angels should be included in a list of things which attempt to create separation from God, but this results from a lack of knowledge about the matter as understood in the day when Paul wrote. The Jews had developed a complex “angelology,” and had engaged in a great deal of acrimonious controversy about it. As is usual, such debate caused two extreme positions to develop, and these were defended by rival schools.

The followers of Sadoc denied the existence of angels. They were Materialists. It was the Pharisees who had worked out an elaborate set of traditions about angels, and Paul was a Pharisee. The Pharisees believed that every living thing, including trees and flowers, had a special angel. They held that the angels were created before this material universe was made and that they were opposed to bringing man into existence. They thought that the angels resented someone made in the image of God and were jealous for fear that God would give more attention unto man than unto themselves.

They also became hostile because, being created before mankind, they did not want to be servants of God to those who possessed an elemental body and were limited by time and space. The Jews believed there was a recognized hierarchy of angels, divided into principalities, powers, mights, dominions, archangels and angels. Each of these orders occupied a liaison position between God and some realm in the universe.

They taught that there had been a revolt against the authority of God, before the creation of the earth, and after a celestial struggle the rebels had been thrown out, and that their leader thereupon pre-empted the sphere called Atmos, thus becoming the prince of the power of the air. The dispossessed angels retained their lines of distinction in their fallen state and plotted to recapture the universe. The death and subsequent resurrection of Jesus effectively foiled their expectations, as Paul points out in Colossians 2:15, but we must still battle their infamous designs with reference to ourselves (Ephesians 6:12).

It was not the purpose of Paul to carefully distinguish between tradition and truth when they conflicted. Neither is it my purpose to do so. His thesis was that whatever was factual about angels, they were powerless to tear us loose from the love of God. I accept this without quibble. I trust in it implicitly.

4. Things present and things to come. Once again, the fertile Jewish mind divided time into the world that now is, and the world to come. But the word which we translate by world is often aion, age. So the Jewish mind contemplated this present age, and the age to come. This present age was temporary, transient and characterized by evil. God would eventually break through and end it. Then a new age would commence. It would be the Golden Age. In it, only righteousness and peace would exist. It would be directly under the rule of God. He would be supreme in every heart.

Now Paul is saying that regardless of the nature of things presently existing and regardless of the nature of what lies in the future, one thing is certain. No power will be able to break the bond of love which welds and links us to our Creator. We are sheltered in God's affection regardless of what transpires!

5. Height and depth. This does not mean that things of measurable elevation will not affect our relationship to God, although that is true. But these were technical terms dealing with the ascendancy of the stars or planets. Ignorant pagans, taking a leaf from the Persian astrologers, thought that human destiny was determined by astral calculations, or by a horoscope. If the stars were favorable they would conduct their affairs on the presumption that the gods would prosper them. If the horoscope was unfavorable they would postpone any planned activity.

Height is from hupsoma, the word used to designate the meridian of the sun, or the zenith of a star or planet. This was the time when the maximum of one's "lucky star" would be exerted, or when his chances for success were said to be the “brightest.” Depth is from bathos, the time when the star was lowest and the influence was least likely to affect one for good. But there is only one star which can produce our relationship to God— the Bright and Morning Star. And there is only one sun which can affect us spiritually— the Sun of Righteousness who has risen with healing in his wings.

6. Any other creation. There is nothing in all creation, now existing, which can separate us from the love of God. When this present order passes away there will be nothing brought into existence which will change things. The love of God is certain. It is constant and consistent. It is safe and sure. This is the hope of the weary, the strength of the weak, and the refreshment for the way-worn. I rest my faith fully, completely and unreservedly in the love of God and in the God of love.

There's part of the sun in an apple,

There's part of the moon in a rose;

There's part of the flaming Pleiades

In every leaf that grows.

Out of the vast comes nearness;

For the God whose love we sing

Lends a little of his heaven

To every living thing.

My Only Creed

[Abstract]

An address delivered at the Sixth Annual Unity Forum, Atlanta, Georgia, July 2, 1971

Perhaps nothing is more repugnant to civilized man than the thought of cannibalism. The dictionary defines a cannibal as “a human who eats human flesh,” and cannibalism as “the eating of one’s own kind.”

In the month of May, 1845, when Great Britain was all agog with interest for exploring the Arctic Region and discovering the Northwest Passage, Sir John Franklin sailed away in command of two vessels, the Erebus and the Terror. They disappeared, and sparked a search which lasted into the twentieth century.

In 1848, Dr. John Rae, of the Hudson’s Bay Company, relayed information which he had gained from Eskimos, that a band of white men had died from starvation on King Edward’s Island. They had sold him what appeared to be relics of the Franklin expedition. Dr. Rae conscientiously reported that the Eskimos had informed him that members of the party had been reduced to cannibalism.

This aroused a furor in London. Distinguished writers such as Charles Dickens and Willkie Collins blasted the report as a slur upon the honor of the Royal Navy. Lady Franklin opposed payment of the ten thousand pounds which had been offered by the government for information as to the fate of the explorers. She launched a privately financed expedition to probe the Arctic wastes to prove that the slander was not true.

Scores of brilliant men and women backed her endeavor. It was unthinkable to them that men, reared in the graces of civility and polished by the sheen of society could ever stoop to the consumption of human flesh. It was as late as 1922 that Knud Rasmussen “conclusively proved the truth of Rae’s revelation of cannibalism, by discovering at Starvation Cove the skeletons of Europeans with the bones cut by saws and the skulls broken to extract the brains.”

Now if physical cannibalism is repulsive, consider what a terrifying thing it is for brethren to engage in such a practice spiritually. It is this which prompts Paul to condemn the use of liberty as an occasion for the flesh, and to add, “But if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of another.” The New Testament in Plain English translates the passage, “But if you bite and eat up one another, take care that you are not destroyed by one another.” It is unthinkable that those whose banner is inscribed with the words, “Brotherly Love,” should engage in destroying one another. Yet the sin of cannibalism lies at the door of many who profess to be children of God.

What is even worse is that we are treated to the sight of a body of believers insanely attacking its own members and tearing with bloody talons at its own tissue. One cannot help but recall the Greek fable of Erisichthon, the profane person and hater of the gods. As the poets related the story, Erisichthon defied the gods by attacking with his axe a venerable oak in a grove sacred to Ceres. When a bystander remonstrated, Erisichthon hacked him to pieces and cut off his head.

When news of this impiety reached Ceres, she decided upon a punishment so dire as to make all shudder who heard it. She dispatched an Oread into the farthest reaches of ice-clad Scythia to summon the dread Famine to take possession of the bowels of Erisichthon. Finding him asleep, she enfolded him with her wings and breathed herself into him, infusing her poison into his veins. He awoke with a raging hunger, and loudly cried for food which he consumed as soon as it was brought. All that he owned he sold to purchase food, but his dreadful appetite was not abated.

At length, with nothing left to barter, he sold his daughter, but this did not provide enough food, and finally hunger forced him to devour his own limbs, and he strove to sustain his body by devouring it, until death relieved him from the sentence pronounced by the vengeful Ceres. This myth is older than our gospel records, but it serves to depict the state of the body of believers which I have known since childhood. That body has sought to protect, perpetuate and propagate itself through self-destruction. It has severed its own members, gouged out its own eyes, cut out its own tongue and fragmented itself in many communities. And it has done this under the guise of upholding the truth.

What has happened is very clear to the astute student. We were “a search and rescue mission” intended to locate the Christians in all of the sects and to guide them back to the base of unity and peace. But we became entangled in the jungle, and motivated by fear of our own shadows and unable to distinguish between friend and foe. Now we need to be rescued from our plight. We are more schismatic, more divided, and less at peace than those whom we set out to unite.

What is the remedy for our state? Unless we have abandoned the ideal of restoration it is very simple. When our nineteenth century predecessors saw the frightful divisions existing in the Protestant establishment, they knew that “the correction and improvement of no creed, or partisan establishment in Christendom could ever become the basis of such a union, communion and cooperation, as would restore peace to a church militant against itself, or triumph to the common salvation.” Accordingly, they recommended that men cease to emphasize their creeds, ignore their partisan establishments and return to the original order.

If this advice was the answer for the sectarianism of others, why is it not the solution for our own? I contend that it is not only the answer but it is the only answer. We must go back, back, back— beyond every unwritten creed, every test of union and communion which we have devised— back to a creed of such transcendent importance that the very issue of eternal life is suspended upon its acceptance, a creed of such universal dynamic as to arouse again the gleam of hope in the faded eyes of despairing men floundering in the garbage polluted waters of a sectarian sea.

So long as we continue to toy with the forlorn daydream that we can elevate our puny parties to the status of the kingdom of heaven, or smuggle into the throne room an illegitimate child of our own begetting, which we have cleverly christened “the Lord’s church,” we are merely constructing a fool’s paradise and building castles in the air. If we are unwilling to divest ourselves of our own sectarian creeds and formulae, we should never again raise a voice of criticism against our religious neighbors who tenaciously cling to their human dogmas.

Those who are willing to begin at a certain point in our divided state and freeze all division which occurred before, and go on from there, are simply deceiving themselves. They are not opposed to division in the body of our Lord. They only deplore separation from themselves. No one who accepts a certain amount of schism as normal can ever truly labor for the union of all believers in Christ Jesus.

Those who want to start in at the point of division falsely attributed to instrumental music, and strive to unite all of the warring factions in the non-instrument ranks, are not seeking for the unity of the body of Christ, but for the pacific continuance of a non-instrument party or sect. And if every warring tribe which went forth to battle under a standard bearing the caption, "Vocal Music," agreed to bury the hatchet and smoke the calumet, this would not mean that the ekklesia of God was united. Indeed, if peace were restored to all of the heirs of the restoration movement it would not mean that the one body was now united, for the body of Christ is greater than any movement within it, and greater even than the restoration movement.

What is the foundation upon which we can unite our scattered forces, and then offer it to the religious world as the basis upon which we can build to answer the prayer of our precious Lord? What was proposed at the very outset of the Way, antedating all forms and ceremonies, and preceding all speculative and partisan debates? What can we present to the ecumenical world in our day which will contribute anything valuable to the search for oneness in the Lord of glory?

Many men who have grown weary with the attempt to unravel the tangled skeins of our own sectarian involvements have given up. They have argued and debated, fought and struggled, only to find conditions growing steadily worse. They despair of ever bringing order out of the complicated snarl, and have resigned themselves to continuing to stolidly slog along in the partisan path. They are bone-tired of the effort to argue out every angle of every wrangle, and adjust every action of every faction. What they forget is that this is not now, and never was the way to attain oneness.

In an ancient city of Phrygia, an oracle decreed to the populace that their next king would arrive in a wagon. At this very time, a poor country man, Gordius, with his wife and son, was driving his wagon toward the marketplace. He was wildly acclaimed and made king. Gordius sacrificed his oxen, dedicated his wagon to the deity of the oracle, and tied it in place with a large fast knot. A tradition developed that whoever untied the knot would be lord of all Asia. Many tried agonizingly to undo it, working their fingers to the bone. When Alexander the Great came to Phrygia he also tried, but becoming impatient, he drew his sword and cut the knot with one swift stroke. We must take the sword of the Spirit and cut through the intricate involvements of our own sectarianism. This I have done in my own heart and for my own life. I have no time for nit-picking and playing tiddly-winks inside of our partisan pillboxes. There is nothing noble about storming molehills which warped vision and defective eyesight have elevated to mountainous status.

Our Lord did not agonize on Calvary to purchase with his precious blood a mere party to defend to the death a position on cups or classes. The prophets of old did not endure stoning and torture, looking forward to a Golden Age when men, quoting their words for authority, would spill fratricidal blood upon forensic battlefronts, striving over an opinion as to the meaning of the millennium, or the place of music in the presentation of praise to the Prince of peace.

There is only one creed endorsed by heaven as the basis of union and communion for the saints of God. There has never been another, and there never will be another! It is not related to human opinion, doctrinal deduction, or mental apprehension of an apostolic epistle. That creed is not a precept, but a person. Reduced to a proposition as a statement of faith, it is simply that "Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God."

When one believes this proposition with all of his heart, he believes all that God has ever required of any man, insofar as personal faith is related to salvation from sin. This is the divinely enunciated creed, and when one presents himself to me, professing his confidence in this as a fact, I am obligated to immerse him into that glorious new relationship signified by the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

I dare not create myself a one-man papal inquisitor, and probe his thinking as related to any theological speculation or philosophical opinion. Whether he deduces that Jesus will return before the millennium, or following it, or whether he has ever heard of the millennium, is none of my concern. He may know nothing about the thousand year reign.

Whatever opinion he may hold with regard to the means for propagandizing the world with the gospel is none of my business. There is a world of difference between receiving and accepting the Good News as saving truth, and speculating as to the best method for disseminating it to a world lying in wickedness.

God has not authorized me to set up an immigration bureau and a customs office at the border of the kingdom of heaven, and demand that all of the weary pilgrims open up their mental baggage and expose their thoughts and concepts for my haughty and arrogant inspection. No one will be debarred from divine acceptance simply because of my obstinate refusal to stamp the approval of a self-important faction upon some article of rationalization. Everyone who has the passport of faith will be admitted exactly as I was allowed to enter, bringing along a motley assortment of mental notions and fancies, with which all of us must toy as we strive toward maturity. God does not demand that we divest ourselves of all our souvenirs and playthings in order to be his children, even though others of his children may see no significance in them.

Many of our brethren have rejected the compassion of Jesus for the conformity of Procrustes. This legendary tyrant, whose name means "The Stretcher," set up his iron bedstead near Eleusis, in Attica. Every person who passed by was forced to become a victim for his torture. They were made to lie down upon the bed and, if they were too short for it, they were hammered or stretched to fit. If they were too long they were cut down to proper length. But Procrustes was captured and slain by Theseus, who inflicted upon him the same torture that Procrustes had imposed upon his victims, cutting him down to fit the bed. The most frightening utterance of Jesus for many of our brethren, should be, "For as you judge others, so you will yourselves be judged, and whatever measure you deal out to others will be dealt back to you."

I want to make my own position clear. I want to do so now! I want my generation to know exactly where I stand. My creed is Jesus Christ! My basis of union is Jesus Christ! My test of fellowship is Jesus Christ! My criterion for communion is Jesus Christ! I have no other creed, and I want no other. I reject here and now, once and for all, any plea for unity based upon conformity to any metaphysical or philosophic deductions, or predicated upon the universal acceptance of any speculation or opinion elevated to doctrinal dogma. I care not one whit more for the unwritten creeds which have produced our particular parties than I do for the more formal ones which have spawned the sects.

I would as soon try to enter heaven with the Nicene Creed clutched in my hand as a possible passport to glory, as to try to pry open the gates of pearl with one of the unwritten "Church of Christ" creeds as a tool. But every man should have a justifiable reason for adoption of the creed upon which he bases his hope of relationship with the Father and the Son, and I am no exception.

My reason is very simple. I respect the Bible as God's word. I receive it without quirk or quibble. It is my only rule of faith and practice. I simply accept it as of divine origin, and seek to implement its disclosures in my own life and conduct. And I hold that the very core of revealed saving truth is that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that this fact, substantiated by the best testimony available unto man, is the foundation upon which the community of the reconciled ones is built, and that there is no other foundation which man can lay!

1. This was the countersign of the rule of heaven among men, announced personally by the Father of mercies. It was the only pronouncement which came as a specific communication from God to mankind in direct conjunction with the mission of Jesus, and the voice came from heaven when Jesus was baptized in the waters of the Jordan. If God did not at this time reveal the foundation of our restored relationship unto Him, then He never did so, and the law of Moses which was inaugurated by his voice from heaven was more auspicious in its origin than the regime of His Son.

2. This was the abiding principle upon which Jesus declared he would constitute the community of “the called-out,” and it stands in contrast to whatever other associations and identifications may be attached unto him by men. He is not to be confused with harbinger or prophet, for though their missions may be divine, they are not. The kingdom of heaven is erected upon the divinity of Jesus. This is the most sublime truth of all ages. When one stands upon it he is grounded in that against which the very gates of Hades are helpless and impotent.

3. This is the one foundation which has been laid for the unity of the saints. When Paul wrote to the fragmented and splintered believers in Corinth, his first great question was “Is Christ divided?” The second was a corollary to it. “Was Paul crucified for you?” Jesus is undivided and indivisible. No other man, not even a father in the gospel, can supplant Jesus as the basis of hope. When the apostle wrote, “There can be no other foundation beyond that which is already laid; I mean Jesus Christ himself,” he was still talking about the cure for disunity among the brethren.

The foundation of the temple of God is a person, the Son of God. He is not only the Alpha, but he is the Omega. There is no one before him. There is no one after him. There is no other foundation beyond. “What think you of Christ? whose Son is he?” This is the universal question for mankind. It is the criterion of spiritual involvement with the Eternal One. If one is right about Jesus, he can be wrong about many other things and still be saved. If he is wrong about Jesus, he can be right about everything else and still be lost.

4. This was the burden of the Good News proclaimed by the chosen envoys of the King, when they were sent forth into an alien world. One of them wrote, “As for me, brothers, when I came to you, I declared the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom. I resolved that while I was with you I would think of nothing but Jesus Christ— Christ nailed to the cross.” Nothing but Jesus Christ! He wrote again, “Christ did not send me to baptize, but to proclaim the Gospel; and to do it without relying on the language of worldly wisdom, so that the fact of Christ on his cross might have its full weight.”

What does this mean? It means that God has proposed to unite all who believe in Jesus, upon the basis of one great universal fact, a fact demonstrated and proven in the context of human history, a fact substantiated by credible human witnesses and by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven. It means that the one foundation of union and communion for the saints is Jesus, the Son of God, the personal embodiment of truth, and not some truths, or certain truths, not even those uttered by Jesus.

The kingdom of light is a kingdom of faith, and faith has to do with facts, not with abstract truths. All facts are true, but not all truths are facts. One who accepts him who is the truth, thereby commits himself to the acceptance of all truths as they become known to him, but such truths can never become the basis of union, else our faith must stand in the developing wisdom of men and not in the eternal power of God.

The basis of our unity in Christ Jesus is not a compilation of propositions deduced from the scriptures by speculative theologians. It is not a formal code of morals or ethics drawn up in a conclave or convention. It is not even the sacred scriptures of the new covenant themselves. The saints were united before one apostolic epistle was ever written, and even now one may be relatively ignorant of the content of these letters and still be in Christ Jesus.

No personal experience of one in Christ, whether such experience is real or fancied, can ever become the criterion of fellowship in the Lord of glory. No one can impose such a personal experience upon another as a test of faith or worthiness, and no one can be deposed for testifying to such a personal experience. Those who seek to bind in all such cases show that they have another creed than Christ, and all who build their hopes alone upon personal experiences and phenomena are doomed to eventual disillusionment. It is only when an experience draws us closer to the heart of Jesus that it possesses any validity. It is Jesus who makes our relationship to any concept, happening, or experience valid, and not an experience which makes the relationship to Jesus a valid one.

Our relationship to Jesus stems from faith and not from knowledge or personal experience. Faith has to do with testimony, and testimony has to do with fact. The beloved apostle wrote that Jesus did a multitude of signs in the presence of his disciples. They saw them and knew that they were real. Out of this treasure of signs, the Spirit selected a number, and the very type, which would produce faith in any honest heart. These have been recorded, and they were written down that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, and by believing this, we might have life in him. This is the life-giving fact. It is the only one. Other truths may strengthen us and stimulate us, but they cannot produce life. It is unfortunate that many of our brethren cannot distinguish between life and a stimulant.

Our problem in this age is that we have lost Christ in the Bible, we have lost the Bible in the church, and we have lost the church in the world. We must now rescue Jesus from the Bible or become like the scribes and Pharisees to whom Jesus said, “You search the scriptures, because you think that in them you have eternal life, but their purpose is to testify of me. And you will not come unto me that you might have life.”

Life does not come from searching the scriptures. The scriptures do not produce eternal life. The scriptures are a gift from God just as life is a gift from God. We have confused the love letters with the Lover; the Captain of our salvation with his orders; the fodder with the Shepherd; and the prescription with the Physician. We have eclipsed the Son of God with the wisdom of the sons of men. And by worshiping the scriptures instead of the Savior we often end up with a head full of quotations and a heart empty of Jesus. Christianity is not Jesus pointing us to a book, but a book pointing us to Jesus. The prodigal could have been preoccupied with a road map and remained in the pig pen!

We must recover the Bible from the church. The people of God have carried the word of God captive. Once more the book of God has been lost in the temple of God. It has been buried beneath a pile of partisan practices, cultural customs, institutional inventions, doctrinal deductions and sectarian sham. And we must reclaim the church from the world, not by taking it out of the world, but by taking the world out of it. These last two objectives will never be achieved until we accomplish the first. Jesus must again be crowned in our hearts as he has been coronated in heaven. Jesus the Messiah, Jesus of Nazareth, Son of God, and Lord of life. This is my creed, and upon it I propose to meet every other soul upon this earth who is willing to commit himself to it. In closing I ask you to hear this from the pen of Alexander Campbell:

When the Messiah appeared as the founder of a new religion, systems of religion consisting of opinions and speculation upon matter and mind, upon God and nature, upon virtue and vice, had been adopted, improved, reformed, and exploded, time after time. That there was always something superfluous, something defective; something wrong, something that could be improved, in every system of religion and morality, was generally felt, and at last was universally acknowledged. But the grandeur, sublimity, and beauty of the foundation of hope, and of ecclesiastical or social union, established by the author and founder of Christianity, consisted in this, — that the belief of one fact, and that upon the best evidence in the world, is all that is requisite, as far as faith goes, to salvation. The belief of this one fact, and submission to one institution expressive of it, is all that is required of Heaven to admission into the church . . . The one fact is expressed in a single proposition— that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah . . . The one institution is baptism into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

The Reasonable Worship

Mission Messenger (October 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

In January of this year we began an ascent of the highest peak in the Roman letter, chapter eight. We worked our way slowly up the steep slope and explored for several months the view at the summit. Now we must return from the mountain-top and resume life on the practical plane. Here we will test the reality of our transcendent experience and see how the life of the Spirit fits into our day-by-day existence.

The great argument of Paul ends at Romans 11:36 with a magnificent tribute to God. “For from him everything comes, through him everything exists, and in him everything ends.” That is Goodspeed’s translation. Knox has it, “All things find in him their origin, their impulse, the center of their being.” It is conditioned upon this tremendous truth that the apostle predicates his conclusion concerning our obligation to the Father of lights. We will consider that obligation as portrayed in chapter 12.

“I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service” (12:1).

It is noteworthy that the apostle who has probed the very heavens, does not make an authoritarian demand or a dogmatic request. He places his approach to life in a framework of pleading, appeal, or entreaty. He wrote to the Corinthians, "I do not mean that we are to dictate to you with regard to your faith; on the contrary, we work with you for your true happiness." Even his appeal is based upon the compassion which God has shown. Our obligation stems from the overflowing mercy in which we have shared so freely.

We are to present our bodies. The word "present" is employed in Luke 2:22 where Joseph and Mary took the child Jesus to Jerusalem "to present him to the Lord." It is used in 2 Corinthians 11:2, where Paul says of the community of believers, "I feel a divine jealousy on your behalf, because I betrothed you to one only husband, even to Christ, that I might present you unto him in virgin purity." It is used in Ephesians 5:27 where Jesus is desirous of presenting the church to himself as a glorious church, unspotted and unwrinkled.

In all of these cases that which is being presented or dedicated to God and Christ, already belongs to them. The firstborn male belonged to God under the Mosaic covenant, so Jesus, who opened the womb, was presented unto God. The bride belongs to the husband so Paul wanted to present to Jesus the congregation in virgin purity which was betrothed unto him. And our bodies belong to God. We are not our own. We have been bought with a price. We can only give to God that which is his. We are to offer our bodies as living sacrifices. This is in contrast to the holocausts required of the Jews, and the offerings of the Gentiles to their false gods. One statement occurs over and over in the law of offerings as transmitted by Moses. "He shall lay his hand upon its head, and kill it." The law required the bodies of dead animals, flayed, cut into pieces and laid in order upon the wood that was upon the fire of the altar. Nothing impresses me more with the contrast between grace and law than the fact that one approaches God through living men and the other through animal corpses.

There is more than this involved in a living sacrifice. It is continual and constant. An animal could only be offered once, but life is an unceasing and an unremitting offering. Just as Jesus offered himself for us once, but ever lives to make intercession for us, so we must freely give ourselves to him, but live to make intercession unto God.

Our sacrifice must be holy. This is a translation of hagios, which we also sometimes translate by the word “sanctified.” Literally, this means set apart to God, or consecrated to his service. When a man set aside a tenth of his grain, or olive oil, or vintage, to present it unto the Lord, it was separated from all of the rest. It looked exactly like the remainder, and you could not tell them apart, but there was a difference, and that difference lay in the fact that one was peculiarly God’s.

So there are certain things which must be said about the person who is holy. First, he is separated from the unregenerate world and does not share a common life (or fellowship) with the unbelieving mass of mankind. This does not mean that he does not work, or go to school, or ride on a plane with the immoral of this world, “since then you would need to go out of the world” (1 Cor. 5:10). But he is separated because he has heard the call of God and responded to it. “Come out from them, and be separate from them, says the Lord, and touch nothing unclean, then I will welcome you” (2 Cor. 6:17).

Second, this separation makes a difference. But the difference lies in the fact that one belongs to God. To be holy is not to be equated with being an odd-ball, a screwball, or an eccentric. There is nothing anemic or washed-out about a follower of the Lamb. He is not a dud or a blank cartridge. This is borne out by 1 Peter 2:9, where the King James Version uses the term “a peculiar people.” In their ignorance of the original many have interpreted this to mean that we were to appear in unconventional garb or attract attention by quaint speech.

Actually, the expression means that which belongs to one person by right of purchase or choice. The New English Version is correct in rendering it “a people claimed by God for his own.” It often happens that ownership gives value to a thing. I once visited Monticello, which was built by Thomas Jefferson. I saw his notebooks, spectacles and writing quills. I had seen a thousand others more prepossessing in appearance, but these fascinated me because of the one to whom they belonged.

Once Nell and I went to the home of James A. Garfield. Those of you who have been there know that his Bible still lies open on his desk, at the place where he was reading shortly before he was assassinated. I have a good many Bibles that are worth more money, and are more adapted to use, but the simple volume upon the desk drew my attention because of whose it was. So we can be quite ordinary people, with no outstanding ability, and yet, if we belong to the Lord, we are different. We have transcendent value. And that is what being holy is all about.

This seems important to me because I once had holiness confused with an attitude toward things, rather than with a relationship to God. One is not especially holy because he does not watch television, play croquet, or wear wide neckties. Indeed, some of the worst hoodlums that ever lived, dressed pretty conservatively. One who is holy is different because he marches to the sound of another trumpet. He is God’s man.

REASONABLE SERVICE

Now I have come to the phrase I am really interested in exploring. Paul says that presenting our bodies as a living sacrifice is our reasonable service. I’d like to make a little confession here and now. I once thought that this referred to that which was just, equitable and fair. I remember detailing all that God had done for us, and then pointing out that, in view of this what he demanded of us was not an unreasonable requirement. I probably got that from my seventy-five cent book of sermon outlines upon which I relied pretty heavily in those days. But I was wrong about it, as I was about a lot of other things.

W. E. Vine says about the term, “The word logikos indicates that which appertains to the mind, the reasoning faculty. The sacrifice is therefore to be intelligent, and the idea suggested is by way of contrast to the sacrifices offered under the law by ritual and compulsion. The presentation is to be made in accordance with the spiritual intelligence of those who are new creatures in Christ.”

C. H. Dodd says, “The ritual of sacrifice was in Judaism, as in all ancient religions, the central act of worship, by which the holiness of God was acknowledged, and in some sense conveyed to the worshipers. For Christians, Paul says, the real worship of God is their self-dedication to him for ethical ends. . . . Without that thought, taken with full ethical seriousness, any ritual of sacrifice in Christianity would be a relapse into superstition.” Please go back, read that again, and pause to meditate upon it for a little while!

The Revised Standard Version translates the words by “spiritual worship.” The New English Version has “the worship offered by mind and heart.” The Twentieth Century New Testament has “reasonable worship.” The word rendered worship is latreia, and it is an interesting one indeed. In its root form it referred to work done for wages, but voluntarily so. It was not applied to a slave, but to one who personally secured a position and filled it with a sense of responsibility.

Then the word advanced another step and was used to denote a dedication of life to a cause which engrossed one’s attention or appealed to him as being worthy, and finally it was the word used to describe service dedicated to the gods, the giving over of one’s life to serving in the temple of a deity. In its usage in the new covenant scriptures it applies exclusively to the worship of God. That is why the lexicographers define latreuo, “to perform sacred services, to offer gifts, to worship God in the observance of the rites instituted for his worship.”

This is of supreme importance because it points out that spiritual worship, that which Jesus calls “worship in spirit and in reality,” actually consists of the surrender of self to God. It is giving my eyes, ears, mouth, tongue, hands and feet to God, and doing so voluntarily as an act of commitment. It entails also the devoting of my bodily desires, feelings, passions and sensations to God, holding nothing back. Thus, everything I do in the body, with an eye singled to the glory of God, is worship. For the Christian there are no “acts of worship,” for the simple reason that there are no acts which are not worship.

A little later Paul will say that one who attaches special significance to a day “observes it in honor to the Lord.” He will also point out that one who eats meat eats in honor of the Lord. We honor the Lord by living, and we honor the Lord by dying. Everything that we do is worship, so “whether we live, or whether we die, we are the Lord’s” (Romans 14:8). So long as we think of worship as limited to certain “holy places,” and “holy days,” we are acting as if Jesus did not come and die. We are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world.

In Christ there are no holy places, no holy days, and no holy things. There are only holy people. We cannot dedicate buildings to God. We can only dedicate lives. We give our bodies, that is, ourselves. And we are the temple of God. We are God’s building. We are God’s garden. William Barclay says it far better than I can:

The true worship, the really spiritual worship, is the offering of one’s body, and all that one does every day with it, to God. Real worship is not the offering of elaborate prayers to God; it is not the offering to God of a liturgy, however noble, and ritual, however magnificent. Real worship is the offering of everyday life to God. Real worship is not something which is transacted in a church; real worship is something which sees the whole world as the temple of the living God, and every common deed an act of worship.

“And be not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God” (Romans 12:2).

It is apparent from this statement that “this world” is set in opposition to “the will of God.” One cannot conform to both at the same time. It is important, therefore, that we have a clear understanding of what is meant by “the world.” Certainly there is a lot of fuzzy thinking on this subject in the present age. Let me provide for you some helpful comments. C. H. Dodd says that “the world” is, “Human society insofar as it is organized on wrong principles, and characterized by base desires, false values and egoism.” William Barclay defines the world as, “Pagan society with its false values, its false standards and its false gods.” Please take note that both of these great expositors use the term “false values.” Value is the worth or importance you attach to a thing. It may have little to do with the actual worth of it. It may be almost wholly divorced from reality. But your sense of values will always affect everything else by comparison. If you elevate a thing in your heart to a place of prime importance, you will measure everything else by its relationship to that thing. It becomes your god. Barclay is very perceptive when he speaks of “false values, false standards and false gods.” The three are inevitably and inextricably linked together.

One of the greatest minds of which I have ever heard, in the field of scriptural research, was that of Richard Chenevix Trench. To him we are indebted for that very helpful volume called Synonyms of the New Testament. And in it he defines the world as “that floating mass of thoughts, opinions, maxims, speculations, hopes, impulses, aims, aspirations, at any time current in the world, which it may be impossible to seize and accurately define, but which constitute a most real and effective power, being the moral atmosphere which at every moment of our lives we inhale, again inevitably to exhale.”

The world is the realm in which we move by choice, breathing its atmosphere, thinking its thoughts, sharing its dreams, and bowing to its gods. It is the territory pre-empted by base desires and ruled over by Satan, who is designated “the god of this world.” His is the sphere of Atmos, that in which we live and breathe.

Paul uses two words which we have translated as “conformed” and “transformed.” The word “form” is at the heart of both. But they are not at all the same in the original. The word for “form” in conformed is schema. It has to do with the external. It literally means to fashion or shape in accordance with a model. It signifies that which is changeable, variable, and subject to alteration.

In 1 Corinthians 7:31, we read, “For the whole frame of this world is passing away.” Frame is the translation of schema. In Philippians 2:8 we learn that Christ came “Bearing the human likeness, revealed in human shape.” Shape is the translation of schema. There is one other place in the new covenant scriptures where the identical form of the original used in Romans 12:2, is to be found. It is in 1 Peter 1:14, “As obedient children do not let your characters be shaped any longer by the desires you cherished in the days of your ignorance.”

When the Greeks created a figure or model for display of specially woven cloth, they used a form of this word. When the sculptors took plastic clay and shaped it before the eyes of their students they employed a form of this word. But there is nothing truly permanent about fashions or fashion models. And clay can be re-shaped in many ways and to make many images. So J. B. Phillips has really caught the true gist of what Paul is saying when he translates the passage, “Don’t let the world around you squeeze you into its own mold, but let God remold your minds from within.”

Most of my readers have never seen a butter mould, but when we were youngsters on the farm one of our tasks was to help churn the milk to produce butter. The churn dasher was plunged up and down in the liquid until the butter “came.” The butter was then rescued from the milk and placed in a large crock. After this it was formed into attractive pats by squeezing it into a mould. Our favorite mould was a round one which produced a pound of butter in a circular shape with the figure of a pineapple on top. Other families had different shaped moulds with other designs. But the butter always took on the form of the mould into which it was pressed.

We had a homely saying about a man who did not resist temptation and the pressures of sin. We said, “He is as soft as butter.” We meant that he took on the form of the world around him. Sometimes we said of a man, “He will trot under the wagon of anyone who will hunt with him.” A faithful dog would not follow everyone who came along. He was loyal to his master. One of the early “graphophone” companies used as its symbol a terrier cocking his head to listen to the sound coming from the horn shaped like a huge morning-glory. The symbol included the words, “His master’s voice.”

Paul is pleading with the Romans not to be formed or shaped by the impulses, aims, aspirations, or maxims of the world. These are changeable. They are inconstant and inconsistent. They produce no loyalty to God. They distort and obscure the Master’s voice.

We are to be transformed, and here the word for form is morphe. This word relates to the character or nature of a thing. It is not that which is affected by outward fashion. It is internal and relates to essence rather than to mere appearance. It is the word translated by “transfigured” in Matthew 17:2, and Peter says of Jesus upon that occasion, “He was invested with glory and honor” (2 Peter 1:17).

It is the same word rendered “changed” in 2 Corinthians 3:18, where the New English Version has the reading, “And because for us there is no veil over the face, we all reflect as in a mirror the splendor of the Lord, thus we are transfigured into his likeness, from splendor to splendor, such is the influence of the Lord who is spirit.” The Greeks used the term for transfigured to describe the alteration which took place when a butterfly developed from a caterpillar, and the ugly looking worm became a gorgeous and beautiful insect.

In the case before us Paul is saying that to engage in true worship, which is the complete sacrifice of life, one must not make an outward change in conformity with the standards of fashions of this passing age. The entire person must be transformed. There must be a radical alteration of our very nature. As Peter states it, “Through this might and splendor he has given us his promises, great beyond all price, and through them you may escape the corruption with which lust has infected the world, and come to share in the very being of God.”

This tremendous change must be made by renewing the mind. This is very significant The New English Version reads, “Let your minds be remade and your whole nature thus transformed.” We have already learned from the previous verse that the worship we are to render is rational, that is, it conforms to the highest function of reason. But in order to achieve this height of rational power our minds must be remade. They have reflected the color of the surrounding world. They have been polluted by the atmosphere which we breathe, which is corrupt and tainted.

The word for renewal is anakainosis. This is important because the Greeks had two words for new— neos and kainos. It is not my purpose to elaborate upon these. The intensive student can investigate them in such works as “Synonyms of the New Testament,” by Archbishop Trench. It is enough for our purpose to know the basic difference between them.

Neos means new in time, or of recent origin. Kainos means new in quality, that is, different in character from the old with which it is contrasted. The renewal of the mind which results in transformation is not simply the old way of thinking updated. It is not merely the addition of late information, or recent concepts which bring about the renewal. Instead, Christ comes into one’s life, and the whole nature of existence changes. The mind is no longer set on earthly things. One has heaven in his mind and glory in his heart.

“Prove” is from dokimazo, and it conveys the idea of testing or trying a thing with a view to approving it. The Good Housekeeping Institute tries out products submitted to it with a view to bestowing the seal of approval when they are deemed worthy. The Consumer Research Laboratory puts various items to a rigid test with the intent of testifying for those that are approved.

The new mind is the proper arena in which to demonstrate the effectiveness of the will of God, that is, to show it is all that it claims to be. It is good, because of its effect upon those who follow it; it is acceptable because it meets all of the requirements of heaven; it is perfect, because it is thoroughly and completely capable and adapted to fulfill the role for which it was intended.

It is my intention, God being my helper, to allow his will to prevail in my life. I want his love to be my love, his purpose to be my purpose, and his word my word. I eagerly solicit the fervent prayers of all that I may overcome my weaknesses by his power, and live the transformed life.

Seeking Guidance

Mission Messenger (October 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

One of the more serious problems which arise for those who believe that the Spirit dwells in God's children as a divine helper, as I certainly do, is how one may seek the guidance of the Spirit, and ascertain the will of God for his own life. Any number of letters have come to me upon this subject. I feel obligated to face up to it, but what I say in response is in no sense authoritarian or dogmatic.

What I can do is simply to outline my personal approach, but this may not be at all valid for another individual. No two of us are of the same intellectual, temperamental or spiritual caliber, and the Holy Spirit must not be "boxed in" by my own experience. We cannot confine him to a specific methodology for he can be very versatile in meeting our several needs. I do not quarrel with brethren who take a different tack. I do not even resent those who deny that the Holy Spirit furnishes them any assistance at all. The more I am around them the more I suspect that they are correct.

For several years, after becoming aware of the real presence of the Spirit in the tent in which I dwell, I have been trying, although with some little difficulty caused by traditional training, to live a more surrendered life, to "hang loose" and recognize that I am cradled in divine love. "Around me and beneath me are the everlasting arms." This has preserved me from frantic pushing and shoving, and has made for inner tranquillity which is a tremendous comfort.

Since I believe that nothing occurs in my life which is outside of God's province or purpose for me, I simply look for His will in whatever happens. It has been an interesting thing to see how he can turn some of my witless mistakes into occasions for good. This has served to reassure me that he rules in every avenue and facet of life and is never anymore "the One outside."

A number of brethren whom I love have developed a rather simplistic approach, or so it seems to me. When confronted with a decision they open up the Bible and the first passage they read is assumed to contain the answer to their problem. They say, "God gave me a scripture" for an answer. I am not judgmental in such cases. I simply say I cannot rest my own confidence in such a method.

To say the least, it appears to me there is an element of chance involved, a thing which they would vehemently deny. I would not think of satisfying a need by opening up a Sears Roebuck catalog and ordering the first item which struck my glance. And I do not feel that God revealed truth in such a way as he would have had to do in order to make such a method valid. My own life is too complex and multiform to reach a definite conclusion by this type of procedure.

1. I seek to immerse myself in the total revelation of God. I regard the Bible as containing that revelation in promise, prophecy, precept and perfection. I receive it "not as the word of men, but as what it truly is, the very word of God at work in you who hold the faith" (1 Thess. 2:13). I am persuaded that my life decisions should be made in the context of the whole revelation, rather than in an isolated passage of sacred scripture. So I read the word with a sincere love for the truths it contains.

2. I eagerly and fervently pray for guidance in specific and immediate problems. I no longer shoot a scatter-load of prayer phrases or conventional clichés in the general direction of heaven. Instead I “zero in” on God. I get “on the beam” and aim for a landing on the proper runway. And I keep on praying, persisting and continuing until I feel I have the answer and the light within turns green and I have the right of way.

I not only ask, but I seek and knock. If I get desperate I kick on the door. It isn't that I doubt that God is inside or that I think he is deaf. Nor is it that I think that he doesn't know I'm outside. Rather my faith and sincerity are at stake. I take quite literally the question Jesus proposed, “Will not God vindicate his chosen, who cry out to him day and night, while he listens patiently to them?” As Paul put it, “Let hope keep you joyful; in trouble stand firm; persist in prayer” (Romans 12:12).

3. I also seek the advice of other saints. “In a multitude of counsellors there is wisdom,” says the wise monarch. If it is true that we are to advise and admonish one another, certainly we ought to hearken to one another. As a member of the community of the reconciled I do not want to go it alone. I need the advice of others. Like Paul, I do not always heed the advice of good and well-meaning disciples (Acts 21:4, 5), but it would surprise you how many “good” articles I have thrown in the wastebasket when others have warned me against printing them.

4. I seek to live in the shadow of God's umbrella of grace all of the time and abide in the tent of the Spirit. This makes it possible to breathe the spiritual atmosphere constantly and thus reach decisions in the proper frame of reference for my whole being. This obviates the need of making such decisions as isolated features of my life.

5. I relate my entire being to the dynamic of love, injecting it into every life situation. Even if a thing is right and proper, I discard it as a possibility if it requires a loveless attitude or will cause another to stumble or fall out of the way.

When I have related my problem to the word of God and sought the counsel of heaven, when I have consulted brethren of reputation and made sure that I am willing to pursue the more excellent way, and when I have prayed until my inner consciousness is directed to a certain activity, or in a certain direction. I take it that this is the will of God for me and I pursue that course.

I believe that God can move in and through the fully surrendered life and I want him to make me and mould me after his will, while I am waiting yielded and still. If we ask him he will assist us. If we trust him he will not turn us away. We are taught “not to place reliance on ourselves, but on God who raises the dead” (2 Cor. 1:9). That is why I propose to “pray on every occasion in the power of the Spirit” (Ephesians 6:18).

The Differing Gifts

Mission Messenger (November 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

I often think as I read the letters of Paul, what a difference it would make if one could go behind the scene in his mind and know the emotions and feelings which prompted certain words and sentences. It is all well and good to say that we have his statements before us and we can all know what he was saying if we want to do so. But it is true that nothing we write or say is in a vacuum. It is for that reason I do not care to be dogmatic about my conclusions. They represent my best approach at the time and they appear to be definitive, but I am never sure with my finite mind that there is not some point I have overlooked which may add a new dimension to my understanding.

Legalistic positivists speak disparagingly of one who so writes. Their tendency is to ridicule one who does not think that his explanations are infallible. They ask how any person can follow one who is not sure what he believes. In reality they are the ones who deserve pity. First of all, they have missed the very essence of the Way, and confuse belief in things with faith in Christ Jesus. It is faith in the Lord Jesus Christ which makes for peace with God, and one can be strong in the faith which is in Christ Jesus and freely admit, "I have not yet reached perfection, but I press on, hoping to take hold of that for which Christ once took hold of me." Indeed, there is some indication that the stronger one's faith is in Jesus, the less he trusts in himself.

Too, such critics are always inconsistent. Even while insisting that men can understand the sacred writings if they want to, they must admit that their own understanding may be faulty in some things. Is this because they do not wish to know? It is a little ludicrous to read after a couple of brethren with imperfect understanding assailing one another because each thinks the other is imperfect. Of course they are both right in their assessment. The very nature of their argument is a clear demonstration of ignorance combined with arrogance.

This little introduction will serve to tell you that, in submitting my comments on the subject at hand, I have no desire or intention to bind them upon our readers. They simply represent my current views, and I will share them, not impose them. You have the same right to read God's word as do I. You also have the same right to reach conclusions as to its meaning. Nothing else is quite so important as to restore among us that pillar of the Reformation, "the right of private interpretation of the sacred scriptures."

One who contends for this principle pleads for the God-given freedom of all the saints. One who denies it, and seeks to invest the right of interpretation in preachers, prelates, priests, or presbyters, takes the first step toward popery and the enslavement of men's minds. He negates the priesthood of all believers and establishes the cunning priestcraft of the few. There is no official interpretation of the scriptures, and there are no official interpreters. There is only a difference in degree between postulating that a group of elders can do the thinking for a congregation, and that a pope can do it for the church universal.

I am resolved that no man or group of men shall drink for me at the fountain of life, or digest for me the bread of life. If I must answer for my thinking in the world to come I propose to do it in the world at hand. If I make mistakes, and I will, they will be my own, and I will accept the responsibility for them. But there are two sins for which I have resolved I will not have to account. One is that of abdication of my right to think for myself, and the other the imposition of my thinking upon others to the derogation of their own rights.

“For by the grace given to me I bid everyone among you not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but to think with sober judgment, each according to the measure of faith which God has assigned him” (Romans 12:3).

Paul had the “grace of apostleship,” that is, he had been made an ambassador as an act of divine favor. In this capacity he could help regulate the lives of those who were citizens of the divine economy. In this instance he is concerned about the evaluation which brethren place upon themselves. This is important because he is introducing the subject of the body, and the functions of the members with the gifts which God has bestowed.

There seems to be always present a tendency for those who are specially gifted to exalt their importance. Paul wrote to the saints at Corinth: “Who made you, my friend, so important? What do you possess that was not given you? If then you really received it all as a gift, why take the credit to yourself?”

Sober judgment is that which weighs all the facts and gives proper credit to each of them. It does not engage in pride or foolishness, neither does it bemean one’s ability or talent. It considers life in such a manner that one can act with wisdom and prudence. A humble and modest estimate of self is requisite to a proper relationship with God and one another.

The criterion for sober judgment as it affects our service in the body is the measure of faith. God has granted this. About this statement there has been much controversy. I do not propose to become involved in it, but I will simply express my honest opinion. It should be regarded as that, and nothing more.

In view of the subsequent context I consider faith in this instance as synonymous with the functions, gifts and abilities, which enable us to serve God with reverence and acceptability. Our life is a life of faith, our work is a work of faith, yet no two of us have the same responsibility, or the same aptitude to serve. God has proportioned or measured these out to us according to his will. “In fact, God appointed each limb or organ to its own place in the body, as he chose” (1 Cor. 12:18).

We are under divine assignment, or subject to divine appointment, and to a greater extent than most of us realize, we are what we are by grace. We may think that we arrived at our present ability by dint of discipline and work. These are important, but they are like a grindstone. They can put an edge on an axe or tool but cannot create one. Practice can sharpen our aptitudes, but they are a part of us.

MANY MEMBERS

“For as in one body we have many members, and all the members do not have the same function, so we, though many, are one body in Christ, and individually members of one another” (Romans 12:4, 5).

It is important to bear in mind that the word “member” is never used except in conjunction with the word “body.” One never reads of a “member of the church,” or of anything else, except the body. The reason is quite simple. The Greeks had no word for belonging to an organization. The word “member” was used only to designate an integral part of an organism, and never employed to describe one who had joined some kind of institution, fraternity or combine.

In an organization the adherents are admitted by enlistment, enrollment, or under compulsion, as in the case of the military draft. In an organism the members are a component part of a vital or living entity. Thus, one does not join the body of Christ, but he is embodied by an act of God. “God sets the members in the body, as it pleases him.” “By one Spirit you were all baptized into one body.” I am incorporate with Christ. This word is from corpus, body, and means that I am in the body with Christ. I am in the body by a divine act.

This is a favorite metaphor of the apostle Paul. The body of Christ in his personal mission on earth was the result of incarnation. The body of Christ through which he perpetuates his work upon earth results from incorporation. In his physical body Jesus had all of the organs essential to bodily functions in the flesh. In his spiritual body he invests us with all of the abilities necessary to continue his work. We take the place, as individuals, that was taken by his ears, eyes, mouth, arms and feet, and he now becomes the head of all, having been exalted to the right hand of God for this very purpose.

Paul is preparing to deal with our varied gifts and he is pointing out that in order for the body to fulfill its role, various functions must be carried out. This requires not only a variation of administrations, but a variety of gifts. The body is able to function, not because all of the members are alike, but precisely because they are not. Our physical bodies are examples of unity in diversity. So also is the body of Christ.

We are not only related to the body as a unit, but to each other as individual members. But the relationship to each other stems from the relationship to Jesus. In the physical body, some members are joined to the head only by being joined to other members, but in the body of Christ we are joined to other members only by being joined to the head. There is no other person between ourselves and Jesus. The wonderful unity we enjoy is the unity of the Spirit who indwells each member and the body as a whole.

Actually, I cannot hurt my brother without hurting myself. If I speak evil of him it reflects against the organism of which we are integral parts. If I trample upon him I step on my own toes. In spite of our various functions we are all bound together in one body, and all of us have a responsibility in that body as well as to it and through it. The term “of one another” is a term of mutual sharing and what we share is the life of the body.

VARIOUS FUNCTIONS

Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith;

Or ministry, let us wait on our ministering: or he that teacheth on teaching;

Or he that exhorteth, on exhortation; he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness (Romans 12:6-8).

Here we have some of the functions of the body of Christ, and the adaptation of the various members to carry them out. Not all are qualified to fulfill the same task, and should not be expected to do so. Paul affirms that our special abilities to carry out various fields of endeavor in the body of Christ are gifts received by grace. They are not something that we acquired or achieved, but they have been given to us. We may improve upon them and encourage their development by use, but we do not originate them.

It is important for us to think through what Paul is saying because the word he uses for gifts is charismata, and this word is greatly abused and misused in our time. This is called “the charismatic age or period” because a lot of very sincere people believe that the Holy Spirit is moving into their lives in a new dimension, and granting them supernatural gifts. Now I am not concerned in this article with whether this is true, or whether they are honestly mistaken. I am in no position, and have no disposition, to question the personal experiences which others affirm.

My concern here is their misunderstanding of scriptural language, and the false impression which is thereby created. The word charisma embodies the word charis, grace. A charisma is a gift of grace. It is not something for which one can claim credit, or of which he can boast and be proud. It does not result from his superiority or personal power. It is something to receive by the favor of another.

So one can never understand charisma until he understands charis, that is, he can never understand what is meant by a gift of grace until he understands grace. And the word for grace was not invented by the Holy Spirit for scriptural usage. It had long been used by the Greeks and had a lengthy history before Jesus of Nazareth died on the cross. The Spirit appropriated it and invested it with new meaning, and glorified it, but did not introduce it.

Certainly there had to be something about the term which could communicate to mankind the message which God wanted us to have. And the history of its usage shows its utilitarian value to the Spirit. At first, the word related to beauty and charm, but not simply to external beauty. Charm suggested an inner quality of graciousness which gave value to the whole personality. It was not put on, but it glowed from within and added sparkle to life.

Eventually the philosophers came to believe that this inner quality was not developed by the person, but was a divine gift, a bestowal of the gods. They thought of it as an infusion of the divine into the pneuma, or spirit, manifesting itself in creativity, and enabling one to call forth or summon an inner vision which could be manifested in a concrete way, but never for a selfish purpose. It must be always for the public good, always for the benefit of mankind.

A dramatist who could put together a play for the theater, which would make men laugh or weep, was thought of as having a charisma. A sculptor who could see a glorious figure in marble, and deliver it from the bondage which encased it, through clever use of the hammer and chisel, was said to have a charisma. The poet who could touch the springs of the emotions was said to have a charisma. These were called “gifted people.” And there was one field in which certain men were thought to be especially gifted, that of oratory. The gods enabled them to communicate.

It will be seen that these gifts refer to abilities which we do not generally think of as “supernatural.” The playwright at his desk, the sculptor in his studio, the actor on the stage, the orator on the platform— these are merely carrying out regular functions in daily life. True, they may have a special charisma in their work but there are others less gifted who are actors, sculptors, writers, or speakers. The word charismata, then, may embrace both what we call “natural” and “supernatural” gifts. I say “we” because God makes no such distinction. Nothing is supernatural with God.

We are now in a position to understand why the Spirit appropriated from the Greek language a word which was in common use and dignified it with such transcendence. Charisma was a gift. It could not be earned or purchased. It was bestowed by Deity, and it was never given simply for selfish indulgence. It was to enable the one who received it to function in a fellowship, to make possible a combined effort in which all would work for the common good. That which previously had provided solidarity in the Greek commonwealth was now regarded as making possible the functioning of the community of saints.

In the passage under consideration the apostle designates prophesying, service of all kinds, teaching, exhorting, giving, presiding, and extension of mercy or pity, as done by charismatics. To designate any period in the history of the body of Christ as “a charismatic age,” is thus seen to be ridiculous. There is no charismatic period because there is no non-charismatic period. Every era of our existence is one in which gifted men carry forward the cause of our Lord. And all of us can function in some manner.

There is no such thing as a “charismatic movement.” This is a term invented by men to describe a time in which they think one or more gifts are exhibited more profusely. However, no one can speak of a “charismatic movement” in the language of the Spirit. The Spirit makes no arbitrary distinction between the gifts we call natural and others, insofar as their utility and essentiality is concerned. The fact that certain endowments are called spiritual does not mean that the others are unspiritual. If they are charismatic they are gifts, and they are gifts of grace.

Paul even calls the gift of continence which enables one to control his sexual impulse and to live in an unmarried state a charisma (1 Cor. 7:7). He refers to his providential deliverance from persecution and death, as a result of the prayers of the saints, as a charisma (2 Cor. 1:11). The interesting thing about this is the fact that it is written to the Corinthian community, the only one to which the apostle says much about pneumatics or charismatics.

Correctly understood, this means that the exaltation of any charisma as a criterion of usefulness, faithfulness, or of standing with God, is wholly unwarranted. It was never intended that all members have the same function and it would be a little absurd to expect them all to receive the same gift. God places the members in the body as it pleases him, and it would be ridiculous for the ear to pray for a gift to enable it to function like the eye.

Nor does a member of the body require special and continual assurance that he is still in the body and remains attached to the head. His very ability to function and his desire to serve the interests of the believers unselfishly and freely is indicative of the spiritual life. The one who shares an inner sense of peace and well-being in a life of steadfast daily service may have a more wholesome outlook than one who needs a regular shot in the pneuma. Only a hypochondriac has to call the physician every day to be sure that he is really alive.

THE BODY AT WORK

In one respect, there is no such thing as a body at work. What we mean by such an expression is that the various members function properly and in relation to one another, so that there is no friction, and thus the organism is enabled to fulfill its role. We come now to notice the work of the different members of the community as mentioned by Paul.

1. Prophesying. The prophet is the spokesman for God. He speaks for God to men. In the old covenant scriptures, the prophet was actually called a seer. He was one who could see through the curtain which obscured the future to others. And because he could see, he could also reveal the will of God for coming days.

Later the term prophet came to be drawn chiefly from another word which meant to bubble up as a fountain. The Spirit moved in the prophet with an effervescent nature, and created a pressure to speak, or erupt. The word of God was described as “a fire in the bones,” that is, a volcanic force in the spiritual depth, clamoring to be released. So the prophet could say, “I am weary from holding in.”

In the new covenant scriptures the Greek term means “to speak forth.” It is a mistake to think of a prophet merely as one who forecasts or predicts. The book of Revelation is called prophecy, although it is specifically said to contain an account of things past, present, and future.

Thus history, current events, and prognostication are all prophecy in God’s sight, because they are all by inspiration. A prophet is a forth-teller. He is not always a foreteller.

The one who had the gift of prophecy was to exercise it, “according to the proportion of the faith.” Since the word “proportion” is analogia, a great many interpreters, in my very humble opinion, have been misled in their conclusions. The Greek word is one which expresses relationship of a right or proper nature. Cremer says it is “the coincidence or agreement existing or demanded according to the standard of the several relations.”

I do not hold that the prophets were human teletype machines automatically transcribing what was fed by a recording angel to the celestial “wire system” from beyond space. For this reason they were placed under the obligation to speak that which was in agreement with the revealed faith. They could not go beyond, add to, amend, or subtract from the revelation. The “proportion of faith” was the criterion for transmission to men, in order that our faith should not stand in the wisdom of men but in the power of God.

2. Ministering. No word in sacred scripture has become more distorted in popular usage than this one, which is from diakonia, service. It has been transliterated to become our word deacon, yet in our lack of concern for the language of the Spirit, few in our day think of the deacons as the ministers of the congregation. I constantly receive communications upon letterheads which list three groups: Minister, Elders, Deacons. Occasionally there will be included an Associate Minister, that is an associate slave or servant, whatever that might be.

All such usage would have been so much mumbo-jumbo in the primitive community of the faith where every child of God was a priest, everyone was a minister, and they were all associates in serving God and one another. The only special congregational ministers were the deacons, who served to extend the arm of the body to relieve the needs of the suffering saints.

No one can determine the nature of the service to be rendered from the word for “minister.” It is applied to serving food by Martha, and caring for temporal needs by the mother-in-law of Peter. One was ministering when he served tables or filled waterpots. There are two ways by which men can obscure meanings and do despite to the language of the Spirit. One is to take a general term and limit it to a specific, the other is to take a specific term and make it general. The first error is committed in this case, and it is compounded by the fact that the specific term seldom even includes the transliterated one.

The gift of “ministry” embraces every form or act of service. It describes feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the sick, or sharing with those who are in prison. Every deed performed to relieve any need or enter into any suffering is ministry. We are guilty of making sad mistakes when we refer to ministry as related only to proclaiming the word, and stewardship only as related to handling money, for we take two noble terms and squeeze them into a narrow and restricted compass.

TEACHING AND EXHORTING

3. Teaching. The term didaskalia is a scholastic one. It has to do with providing instruction. This last word is one which embodies the root struct, literally, to pile. To construct is to pile up material, generally according to design. To destruct is to tear down the pile. To obstruct is to pile in the way. So instruction is the piling in of facts, the furnishing of information not previously known.

That there are those who have a natural gift for teaching others is obvious to every school administrator. It involves more than merely having degrees in education. Many who have sophisticated degrees do not possess the power to communicate thought, while others with less formal attainments can inspire students to greater heights. A true teacher, motivated by appreciation for the subject and love of the students is possessed of charisma.

4. Exhortation. It is important to remember that one may be a good instructor while not having the gift of exhortation. Teaching and exhorting are not the same at all. The first deals primarily with providing facts not previously known. The second consists of encouragement to do that which one already knows to be right. It is stimulation to act, to get on with the task. Instruction seeks to overcome ignorance, exhortation to overthrow apathy and indifference. One kindles the fire, the other stirs it up. The educator shares facts, the exhorter shares faith. One provides the road map, and the other starts the engine.

The original is parakaleo, to call to a person, from kaleo, to call. It was used for firefighters who called to a person to jump from a building which was aflame. It was used for a coach or trainer who called for a runner to exert an extra burst of speed. It was used for a captain who cried out to his men to follow him in storming a fort. It is quite obvious that it is a word which is intended to galvanize others into action and urge them on to the fulfillment of their duty.

5. Giving. That there are those with a charisma for giving no one can doubt. Some who give do it with such ill-will as to undo the good effect of their sharing. There are those who make the recipients feel inferior and unworthy. There are others who, like the Pharisees, sound the trumpet of publicity and use their giving as a means of enhancing their own image rather to extend actual help.

The Authorized Version says that the gift of giving is to be done with simplicity, and this is a great word. In the Greek it is haplotes, and it is one of those terms which seem to catch up some of the finest qualities and noblest characteristic to which mankind can attain. The usage in literature sometimes indicates simplicity and sincerity, and at other times generosity. The reason for this is interesting.

Haplous is the word for single, as diplous is for double. That which is single is undivided in its attention or unwavering in affection. It represents a unity, a simplicity, as opposed to duplicity, or deception. You will recall that Jesus said, "Let your eye be single," that is, without hypocrisy or sham.

One who is truly generous concentrates his attention upon the need of another, acting with undivided concern to relieve the situation. He bestows what he has to correct it, regardless of cost. So the word means liberality, or generosity when used in this connection. To be able to do this without reticence or regret is a gift, a charisma. When one can come to the aid of another without making him feel unworthy, or in debt, it is truly a blessing.

The word occurs in 2 Corinthians 8:2, where Paul speaks of "the riches of your liberality." The New English Version renders it by "lavishly open-handed." It occurs again in 1 Corinthians 9:11, and the King James Version has "enriched in everything to all bountifulness," while the New English Version reads, "rich enough to be generous." So the term certainly excludes narrow, stingy and niggardly attitudes, but it includes more than just giving money freely. It takes into account that kind of sharing which never deprecates the person while ministering to him in his distress.

6. Ruling. It is probably unfortunate that proistemi was not translated by the word "leadeth" instead of "ruleth." When we use the word rule we immediately associate it with the idea of authority, or exercise of power or dominion over others. This has led to abuses in every generation, including our own. As an example, we have been taught that elders have been placed in office to rule the congregation, and in some places the word of these men is law. Their opinion becomes the official interpretation of that congregation, and those affiliated with it must subscribe to it, or remain absolutely silent. To utter a contrary opinion, will invoke the wrath and discipline of “the powers that be,” and one may be cast out of the synagogue for exercise of free speech.

Of course, this is absurd and asinine. No such authority has been invested in any man or group of men. In the first place the word “office” is not used as it is in the political realm. In the scripture it does not refer to a position, but to a function. My arm does not hold an elected office in my body, but as an integral member, it has a function. That function is a special one but it is no more special than that of any other member. It stems from ability and qualification to fulfill a task. It would be a silly gesture to try and appoint my nose to do the work of my mouth. It is not qualified to so function.

In the second place, the system we have devised is diametrically opposed to the express teaching of Jesus who said it should not be thus. “You know that in the world, rulers lord it over their subjects, and their great men make them feel the weight of authority: but it shall not be so with you.” We have adopted the way of the world and forgotten the way of Jesus. There is no greater imposition than to try and force a man to conform to a thought pattern which contravenes his honest personal conviction. To attempt this under threat or coercion is tyranny over the mind and despotism over the heart.

In spite of the fact that Jesus said it should not be so, it is so in a great many places. Elders assume prerogatives bordering upon infallibility. Their judgment must not be questioned nor their authority abridged. Together with the preacher whom they hire, they rule with a tight rein and an iron hand. It is assumed that men who hold high positions in the scholastic or business world are imbecilic when it comes to the Bible, and wholly incapable of directing their spiritual destiny. All decisions must be made for them. Their only responsibility is to acquiesce, remain dumb and give their money to support the system.

Such hierarchical domination has developed as a part of our sectarian stance. It is maintained through fear of what men may do unto us. The word for “ruleth” in our passage is proistemi, literally, to stand before, that is, to preside. In 1 Timothy 5:17, the New English Version has the interesting rendering, “Elders who do well as leaders should be reckoned worthy of a double stipend, in particular those who labor at preaching and teaching.” The word for diligence signifies zeal and earnestness. Those who have the ability to preside should set an example of diligent concern.

7. Showing mercy. The extension of compassion will be greatly enhanced by those who have the gift to demonstrate empathy. I know good brethren who probably ought to be barred from hospital visitation. They will undo in fifteen minutes what a corps of physicians and nurses have worked a week to accomplish. They are awkward in the presence of the patient, saying and doing all of the wrong things. They stay too long, talk too loud, and sit on the edge of the bed.

It is no particular comfort to a patient to tell him that he looks far worse than you expected to find him, nor does it help to point out that both your uncle and brother-in-law died within the last six months from exactly the same condition. It does not cheer one up to inform him that the surgeon who is going to operate on him the next day is as rough as the bark on a hickory tree and was probably responsible for killing your Aunt Gertrude.

Some well-meaning folks who love statistics on the dead and dying, give a patient a running account of the progress, or lack of it, of everyone in the congregation. With a countenance as cheerful as if they had just swallowed a tablespoon of vinegar, and a voice as doleful as a losing candidate saying farewell to his campaign workers, they drone on and on, while the patient wishes they would drop dead and he would recover, but doubts that either will happen.

On the other hand, I know some folk whose very presence will brighten a hospital ward. Even the professional groaners, who carry on rhythmically, resolved that if they cannot feel well no one else who is in earshot will either, desist while such folks are there. Sometimes they even forget to start up again for quite awhile after they are gone. They spread happiness where there is heartbreak and sympathy where there is sadness. Their speech and touch are both soft and soothing. They are charismatic.

Mercy is from eleos. It refers to an open and outward manifestation of pity. W. E. Vine says, “It assumes a need on the part of him who receives it, and resources adequate to meet the need on the part of him who shows it.” It is a quality of which we need more manifestation and daily demonstration.

SUMMARY

It is time for me to summarize the things we have discovered in this dissertation, which has grown far too lengthy. I am grateful to those who have patiently read thus far. If you have done so, you will recall that we have learned that the will of God is expressed as follows.

1. Each one of us is to make a sober estimate of his ability, based not upon an exalted opinion of self, but upon an assessment of the gift of God as bestowed by grace.

2. We are not bound together as members of an organization, a concept for which there was no term in the Greek. Rather, we are functioning members of an organism, bound together not by a mere fraternal tie or pledge of allegiance. Our real relationship is to Jesus as the center of life and activity.

3. There are no useless members of the body of Christ, as there are no superfluous organs in the human body. Paul declares that “those members of the body which seem to be more feeble, are necessary” (1 Cor. 12:22).

4. The unity we enjoy is not an achievement of men, but a creation of the Spirit. We are not one simply because of an agreement to work together, but we work together because we are one. We function naturally and normally as organs in a body. Only abnormal, afflicted or diseased members do not function.

5. We are interrelated and made into a cohesive unit by the indwelling Spirit. We do not surrender our individuality or prerogatives to one another, and are not to be conformists to anyone but Jesus. He is great enough to accept us all as we are, and under the umbrella of his love we can find shelter for all of our diversities.

6. Any aptitude or endowment which enables us to perform any function in the body is a gift of grace. We distinguish between them as natural or super-natural, but this has to do with the method of their bestowal. There is really no indication that God makes such a differentiation. In any event, they are all charismata, so whether the body functions solely through gifts immediately bestowed, or through gifts naturally received, or through a combination of both, it is charismatic.

The body of Christ has always functioned and always will function through gifts of God. Since there is no such thing as a non-charismatic age or era, it follows that, to separate and designate a certain period as a charismatic age, is to make a distinction unwarranted by fact or revelation. Instead of glorifying God by such a procedure, it rather speaks derogatorily of divine concern. It makes it appear that God withdraws all aid from the members until they make a mess of things and then steps in to perform a direct rescue operation.

But if the church can exist and function for any length of time without charismata, it can do so interminably, or until Jesus comes. And since God has shown himself to be a divine economist, exerting only enough power to fill a need, and no more, there would be no need of occasional outbursts designated as charismatic.

My conclusion is that all of us as individuals must employ the gifts we possess for the good of the whole body, and the body must provide an opportunity for us to grow and develop within the framework of fellowship. No one can say to another that he has no need of him. Each must receive the others as God received him. If we can conduct ourselves in this manner the world will see that we are truly “members one of another.”

With Brotherly Love

Mission Messenger (December 1971)

Volume 33

[Abstract]

We have arrived at that place in our study of the Holy Spirit where we must close our remarks for the year. I am thankful that we may do so by talking about our feelings toward one another. Unless the indwelling Spirit transforms our hearts until we can truly love one another, all else is in vain. Strange as it may seem after all of the fighting and tending, the debating and division, we will not be judged by our orthodoxy, but by how we treated the least of the brethren.

One may be quite ignorant of the finer points of those doctrinal issues which we have thrust up as walls to separate God's precious children, but if he loves his brethren he can be saved. On the other hand, though he may be enlightened in all of the arguments and contentions of the warring parties, he abides in darkness and there is no light in him, if he hates the brethren.

It is not knowledge, but love, which covers a multitude of sins. It is not legalistic conformity but love which keeps no account of wrongs, which bears all things, believes all things, and endures all things. It is love which validates all things, and if one had such strong convictions that he would go to the martyr's stake rather than relinquish them, without love it would be an empty and profitless gesture.

One is not true to the faith which is in Christ Jesus because he defends party shibboleths, but because he ignores them all. It is not strengthening factional barriers, or piling arguments upon them to make them higher, which will gain the approval of heaven, but simply going through them as if they were not there. And for the one who does this, they will not be there. The time has come to burst through our paper curtains and to lose all fear of the “paper tigers” who are the party “somewhats.”

Of all that has transpired through the agency of the Spirit in my unprofitable life, I am happiest for the fact that he has poured out the love of God in my heart. I can now love all of God’s children, and even my enemies. Since I started loving, there are a lot more of the former and a lot fewer of the latter. This makes it infinitely easier. I feel a deep sense of compassion for those who must repeat falsehoods to justify their animosity. But I shall never again be trapped by Satan into hatred for any of them.

I can now go anywhere and share with anyone who loves my God. Our differences are never as great as the welding power of his blood. I will not thwart the work of the cross to have my way. No opinion, no method of work, no interpretation of some subtle point of doctrine is as precious to me as my brother. I will hold my opinions in my mind and my brethren in my heart. I cannot give up my opinions as long as they are mine, but I will not give up my brothers as long as they are his. It is no longer a question with me of withstanding my conscience or withdrawing from my brethren. I just retain them both and cherish them. This is the Lord’s doing and it is marvelous in my eyes.

“Let love be without dissimulation. Abhor that which is evil: cleave to that which is good” (Romans 12:9).

Dissimulation refers to pretence or sham. It is hypocrisy, which is a transliteration of hupokrites, to speak under, or from behind a mask. The Greek dramatists did not portray emotions with their own features. They had masks which exhibited all of the various sentiments from hilarity to deep grief. The performers selected a mask which corresponded with their lines, and held it over their faces while they spoke. Thus, the word hypocrite in the new covenant scriptures means a stage-player, one who puts on an act.

The opposite of hypocrisy is sincerity, a word which, in its Greek origin means “to examine in the sunlight.” Ancient bazaars in the marketplace were dark crannies, and the clever purchaser of a fabric would insist upon taking it out in the open sun for closer inspection. That which passed the test was branded “sincere.” Sometimes love is feigned. It will not stand up when subjected to the full glare of close inspection.

Evil is any destructive force, whether affecting the physical, moral, or spiritual realm. Since anything which disrupted or destroyed the natural course of things was labeled as evil, there was a difference between evil and sin. All sin was evil, but not all evil was sin. A hurricane was an evil, but not a sin. Perhaps the word here refers to that which rends the fabric of fellowship, and if so, it is especially appropriate to the theme under discussion.

Evil is not to be simply discounted or regarded as an aggravating problem. It is to be hated with such intensity that we neither embrace nor condone it. We must turn away from it with such abhorrence that we make no apology for it. To cleave to the good is to cling to it with unrelaxing grasp, never losing our hold and never allowing it to slip from our fingers.

“Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love: in honor preferring one another” (Romans 10:10).

The influence of William Penn and the Friends, or Quakers, is preserved in the United States by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, a word which means “Penn’s Woods,” and which was bestowed upon this area when it was covered with forest. Philadelphia is the Greek term for brotherly love, as used in our text, and indicates the dream of peace-loving people who sought to found a place where all men could be received as brothers, and dwell together in mutual respect and harmony.

It is my contention that the only true city of brotherly love is the “city of the living God” (Hebrews 12:23). Its citizenry is composed of those who “esteem the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures in Egypt,” and who have received a kingdom which cannot be moved. One of the supreme tragedies of the ages is that the hated have become haters, and the persecuted have become the persecutors.

Just as there is no dynamic to compare with brotherly love, so there is no hatred so bitter and intense as that which is shown when brethren turn against one another. I have personally observed those who met around the same table for years, singing and praying together, helping each other in time of need, and shedding the sympathizing tear, but experiencing a complete change when a root of bitterness sprang up among them.

Sometimes an issue has been introduced by a visiting preacher, who, under the guise of preaching the gospel, creates a faction around his pet opinion, making it appear that the fate of the whole kingdom of heaven throughout all ages, world without end, depends upon “taking a stand” with his partisan cohorts and himself. Preachers who labored faithfully in the past, and have built up the community of saints, are branded and stigmatized as compromisers and liberals because they refuse to shiver the body to splinters over the newest mental aberration. Families are riven apart, brethren no longer speak to one another, the body is split into rival tribes, suits are entered in the civil courts for possession of the property, a new outpost is started on the rock of opinion, and a bombardment is begun over the air and through the partisan journals. Challenges for debate are flung out before the world, and all of this is justified by making it appear that this is what our Lord meant when he said that he came not to send peace on the earth but a sword. Nothing is more absurd and asinine!

And no one is more dangerous to the peace and purity of the kingdom of grace than the self-appointed, egotistic, would-be champions whose goal is to line up a personal following, even if it means the ruthless carving of the body into bloody bits. The one who is manifestly approved when sects and parties arise is the one who ignores the whole mixed-up mess and refuses to give his allegiance to any segment or group. Such a person sees all of the deluded and partisan victims as his brethren, and refuses to become a factional stooge or party hack.

It is ridiculous to confine the term “brotherhood” to a little group of believers whose test of loyalty is some issue ballooned into prominence by the editor of a “faithful” journal. We now have as many “brotherhoods” as we have parties. I belong to none of these. I am a part of the brotherhood of all the saints. Every saved person on this earth is a member of it. Anywhere my Father has a child I have a brother. I am sick of the polarization of men and women around clannish totems. I renounce the whole sordid bit for my life. I have been set free by the grace of God, and I intend to allow no religious politician or “con man” to ever again make me a cat’s paw to pull factional chestnuts out of sectarian flames which he has fanned.

I want to visit all of my brothers. I want to learn from them, to gain their insights, to share in their thinking. I want to show kindly affection to them, regardless of their past allegiance or present predicament. I have no desire or intent to proselyte them to my thinking. One cannot evangelize saved persons and he ought not proselyte them. You evangelize for the sake of the person, you proselytize for the sake of your party. Evangelizing is the work of the Holy Spirit, proselytizing is the fruit of the party spirit.

Perhaps one of the most difficult things to do is to prefer one another in honor. Most of us like to receive acclaim and recognition. A man who seldom reads a newspaper will purchase a dozen copies if his name appears in the fourth paragraph of column three on page eleven. To step back and allow another to take the applause which is due ourselves requires more generosity than a lot of us possess. But this verse clearly indicates that we should be willing to “play second fiddle” if the cause will be enhanced. Someone has pointed out that it is amazing how much can be accomplished if one does not care who gets the credit.

The Pleasure of God

[Abstract]

“That union among Christians which it is so desirable to recover, must, we are persuaded, be the result of something more heavenly and divine than legal restraints or angry controversies. Unless an angel were to descend for that purpose, the spirit of division is a disease which will never be healed by troubling the waters. We must expect the cure from the increasing prevalence of religion, and from a copious communication of the Spirit to produce that event.”— Bishop Hall in Zeal Without Innovation (ca. 1625).

Millions of people living on this rotating flyspeck, first called earth by the Creator himself, believe that Jesus is the anointed one and the Son of God. They have never seen him with their eyes. They have never heard his voice. They have never touched him with their hands. But they are convinced, on the best evidence available to them as finite beings, that one originally called the Word, one who was with God and was God, became the first space traveler, spanning the distance between the third heaven and this whirling sphere, to make this “the visited planet,” in a sense no other planet in the almost infinite galaxies can ever know.

The believers come from all nations, languages, tribes, and tongues. Some are black, some are yellow, some are red, some are brown, and some are white. They live in mansions and castles surrounded by vast expanses of well-trimmed greensward, and they live in bamboo huts in dank, fever-ridden jungles, amidst a tangle of vines and foliage. Some of them speed in jet planes far above the clouds. Some of them pole crude canoes through hidden streams. Some of them plod behind dog teams in the frozen Arctic.

All of these are caught up in the human predicament. It is difficult for them to match their longings with their lives. Earth has its pull upon their hearts as well as heaven. The teacher of philosophy in an erudite institution of learning and the simple native, clad only in a loin cloth, who slips along the jungle trail, both sense a feeling of inadequacy when confronted with the claims of Jesus. It is not easy for them to appreciate the invisible cord of divine love which makes them brothers, and binds them together in a common family circle.

Yet nothing is more evident to one who accepts as valid the testimony of those envoys to the pagan world, who were directly summoned, trained and qualified by Jesus himself, than the truth that he came to transcend all racial, social and national barriers. His mission was to span the chasm between God and man caused by sin, and made wider by the erosion of centuries, and by reconciling us unto God to reconcile us unto one another. He is the bridge over troubled waters, enabling us to rise up and cross over the churning and tumult in the straits of human nature. Truly Jesus came to put it all together.

In a particularly beautiful passage, which never fails to make my heart palpitate a little faster, Paul, who came on the scene a little late, but quickly made up for lost time, tells us what it is all about. Listen to this, and let it trickle down into the crannies of your soul and water your parched inner being with its life-giving hope.

“For in Christ our release is secured and our sins are forgiven through the shedding of his blood. Therein lies the richness of God's free grace lavished upon us, imparting full wisdom and insight. He has made known to us his hidden purpose— such was his will and pleasure determined beforehand in Christ— to be put into effect when the time was ripe: namely, that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ" (Ephesians 1:7-10).

Statements and sentences are like food. Some can be taken at a gulp, hastily swallowed so that the mental digestive system can get on with the task, and start breaking them down to extract the nutriment from them. But others need to be taken more deliberately with each morsel rolled about and savored over and over as it comes in contact with the intellectual taste buds and palate. It is thus I regard this glorious combination of words and thoughts expressing what is our magnificent heritage in Christ.

THE REVEALED MYSTERY

The hidden purpose of God, concealed through the ages is now disclosed. And that purpose is also both his will and pleasure. It is not just something God has to do in order to be God, but also something he wanted to do because he is God. It is not a will, calculating and contrived, to prove that, in the final analysis, God must have his way. It is his pleasure, cheerfully and eagerly entered into, a divine secret kept under the blanket of love until the right moment, and then uncovered with a burst of heavenly joy as a demonstration of the richness of free grace lavished upon us.

All of this was not a sudden whim, for it borders upon blasphemy to think of God as acting by caprice or upon momentary impulse. Instead, it was determined beforehand in Christ. That is why it will be translated into reality. God is able to see the end from the beginning. He calls things that be not as though they were. Whatever he determines he delineates. The ultimate is perfect fulfillment of a perfect will. It will be put into effect when the time is ripe, and only God can test the times for ripeness.

What was the greatest secret, the mystery which was to fulfill the divine purpose, plan and pleasure? It was that the universe might be brought into a unity. The creation of God is a universe. It is not a multiverse. There is not a single unrelated atom. The chain of relationship extends in an unfathomable and incomprehensible network which links all creation together. There is more to creation than the material. “In him, everything in heaven and on earth was created, not only things visible but also the invisible orders of thrones, sovereignties, authorities and powers: the whole universe has been created through him and for him” (Col. 1:16).

Sin distorted the glorious artistry of creation. It defiled and alienated, divided and destroyed. But the will of the Creator is to see that unity is restored, not merely as relates to things on earth but things in heaven as well. This means that in Christ will be realized the purpose which gathers up every thread of history and weaves it into a pattern where there will be no crude design or frayed edges. The divine pleasure is to promote unity—universal unity—unity in Christ!

Now, the divine approach to this ideal is to call individuals from a life of sin, reconciling them to God so they may share in the life of God and breathe the fragrance upon others. “Christ was innocent of sin, and yet for our sake God made him one with the sinfulness of men, so that in him we might be made one with the goodness of God himself” (2 Corinthians 5:21). When this happens the new order has started. Each person who comes into a vital relationship with Jesus Christ is one more unit in the eternal purpose. “When anyone is united to Christ, there is a new world, the old order has gone, and a new order has already begun” (2 Cor. 5:7).

Since this strategy has been in operation for nineteen centuries, why has it not been successful in bringing our part of the universe at least, into a greater sense of unity? That it has not is evident from the fact that alien ideologies have enslaved the minds of hundreds of millions, while there are uncounted millions more of our fellowmen who are unaware that God broke through the flesh curtain to share our misery in the form of a Son.

Certainly no simple answer to this question can be given. It is not a problem to be solved in twenty-five words or less. But basic to an understanding of it is a recognition that there is involved another master strategist, identified as “the commander of the spiritual powers of the air, the spirit that is now at work among God’s rebel subjects” (Eph. 2:2). Since the ultimate purpose of God is to unite things in heaven and things on earth, the demonic forces in the universe, under the direction of the Adversary, are united to thwart the accomplishment.

We will be guilty of a frightful misjudgment if we assume that we are at war only with human foes, that is, with flesh and blood. Our fight is “against cosmic powers, against the authorities and potentates of this dark world, against the superhuman forces of evil in the heavens.” It was not an idle caution that we should “put on all the armor which God has provided, so that you may be able to stand firm against the devices of the devil” (Ephesians 6:11). Nor must we ever forget to “take up the great shield of faith, with which you will be able to quench all the flaming arrows of the evil one” (verse 16).

It would not require a great deal of acumen in military matters to determine the devices which the devil would employ to delay and hinder the forces of righteousness and stop their onward progress. As an army dedicated to uniting all things in the universe, if their ranks were divided, and they were led to engage in civil war, it is obvious that their goal would be forgotten and their own survival become the matter of greatest importance. If the vanguard could be deflected and thrown into confusion the eternal purpose would be stymied while the enemy picked off the soldiers at will.

No thoughtful student can deny that those who acknowledge Jesus to be the Son of God, have been fragmented into warring sects, whose hostility toward other believers has actually been more intense than it has been toward evil. In this age when secularism and humanism have been drawn like shades over the windows of the mind, there will be those who refuse to credit the condition to Satan, forgetting that in their attempt to make man his own god, they must always end up making him his own devil. But whatever its origin or source, strife and division have characterized the believers in him who came and “preached peace to them that are afar off, and to them that are nigh.”

More millions have been spent to enhance the sectarian image and to promote sectarian rivalry than have ever been devoted to securing the purpose of God. So-called “religious wars” have drawn more blood and been prolonged through more decades than any other. Fields of the earth have been fertilized with the crimson gore of millions. Cities have been ravaged and burned, nations have been decimated and families destroyed, all under the fanatical zeal fired by the thought that “of such is the kingdom of heaven.”

In addition to the carnal strife where men have shot each other down with all kinds of weapons from crossbows to cannon, there have been the creedal encounters in which partisan champions have pummeled each other with theological arguments and left scars which never healed and turned away thousands in disgust and disillusionment. The result is a current despair that anything can ever be done to remedy conditions, and a feeling that we can only go on to the bitter end, maintaining our sectarian establishments and defending our monastic walls.

RAYS OF HOPE

I do not share this pessimistic attitude. I am convinced that the purpose of God will triumph. I am also convinced that I must actively participate in helping to bring the divine pleasure to fruition. It is true that what I can do will be little, and, in the long run may appear insignificant, but he who blessed the few loaves and fishes can multiply our meager efforts and even feed a multitude. And we are obligated to plant and water and leave the increase to him.

What can we do that will make even a minor contribution for good? I should like to suggest two things. First, we can rediscover and point out the magnetic center to which all must be attracted, and around which we must all revolve if we are to be drawn together. We must re-examine the new covenant scriptures and the history of the primitive saints and recover the true emphasis which had such impact upon the cruel world of the Caesars, and which motivated men with such a powerful dynamic that they freely gave themselves up to mockings, scourging and death.

This means that we must grasp afresh the basis of koinonia, or fellowship, which welded together men of every “tribe and language and people and nation.” It was this sense of koinonia which bound them by indissoluble ties which persecution could not weaken and the thrust of death could not sever. In short we must find out how the early disciples “raised their voices as one man and called upon God.” We must find out how “the whole body of believers was united in heart and soul.”

Second, we must come to understand the real nature of the ekklesia, the called of God, that which, in some of our English versions is called “the church.” We have done despite to the language of the Spirit, by talking about “churches,” and making it appear that there is more than one, or that “a church” is an organization of men and women polarized around a creed, a peculiar doctrinal emphasis, or a specialized set of tenets. The Spirit of God never used ekklesia in any such manner, and to apply a term which ostensibly translates the word in such an arbitrary fashion is to confuse and confound.

There are not “three hundred churches” in the United States, or anywhere else. If we adopt the word “church” as a translation of ekklesia, there is only one church. There never has been but one. There never will be another. That church is not a human organization at all, nor can it ever become such. It is a divine organism. It is not a concoction of man but a creation of the Spirit. There is no such thing as The Methodist Church, The Baptist Church, The Presbyterian Church, The Roman Church, The Christian Church, or The Church of Christ. The word of God knows absolutely nothing of any of these. So long as we think in such terms we will contribute nothing to the unity of the believers, although we will no doubt add greatly to their confusion.

I say that we can help by clarification of these points, for it is from here that much of our trouble springs. So long as men have varied points of emphasis around which they polarize we will have schism and strife, and the sectarian spirit will be kindled anew every time someone feels that he has discovered a neglected point which needs affirmation and exaltation as a rallying point or standard. Each time a new tribe will withdraw and encamp around the banner and firmly resolve to battle to the death their former associates who do not dance together around the new totem. We must find the center to which all can and must come, and upon which the acceptance of God into his fellowship is conditioned. What is the divinely revealed and fundamental ground upon which God proposes to gather all those who trust in Jesus?

Of course, since God has already begun his work of bringing the universe into a unity in Christ by calling unto himself a people, reconciled and reconciling we must understand the nature of this ekklesia, or community of the redeemed. Is it intended to be an organization, an institution, or an “extension of the Incarnation,” as some of my good friends in the “Church of Rome” say? If we mistake its nature we may be betrayed into creating or formulating something foreign to the plan and purpose of God, and seeking to pass it off as the one body. Just as there have been false Christs, so there have been false “bodies of Christ,” and none who love the Lord should be interested in such spurious institutions.

It will help, at the outset, if we realize that the body of Christ is not a “Christian sect,” according to the vocabulary of the age. It cannot be for the simple reason that it contains all of the saved upon earth. God not only calls us out of our state of sin and alienation, but he calls us together, because the purpose of calling us unto himself is to further the eternal purpose of uniting the universe in Christ. And he calls us into one body, for if he called us from our separation and segregation, our hostility and animosity, only to divide us again in Christ, little would be accomplished. God never added a person to anything except the one body. So far as heaven is concerned there is only one body, and we are either in it or not, regardless of what else we may be in.

But if the body of Christ is not a sect, it is also true that no sect is the body of Christ. It cannot be because that which constitutes it a sect precludes it from being the one body. No sect contains all of the saved upon earth. If it did it would not be a sect. It would be the ekklesia. Any organization or institution which recognizes or admits that there may be some outside of its prescribed limits who are saved, by that very judgment admits its own sectarian identity. A sect may contain some of the saved who are a part of the ekklesia, and it may contain some who are not saved, and are not a part of the ekklesia.

It seems obvious that sects keep those apart whom God has called to be together. They hinder the manifestation of communion. They act as obstacles to sharing, Since this is the case, the spirit which gives rise to sects, the party spirit, is wrong. It is contrary to the will of the Father. It is a work of the flesh. Now this may be generally admitted and still we remain apart. The reason we do so is because each mistakes the sect with which he is affiliated with the body of Christ. To him it is "the Lord's church." He feels that if he does not defend the sect he is denying his commitment to Christ Jesus. Every sectarian holds the hope that some day divine providence will so arrange it that all sincere and honest persons on earth will see the superlative value of his system, equate it with the divine revelation, and will be drawn to it by a magnetic power, irresistible to those who love the truth.

However, there is no promise held forth that God will transmute any sect into the one body. All sects originated after the creation of the one body, and although they have existed co-extensively with that body, and have sheltered many who were in it, the nature of the body is one thing and the nature of the sect is a wholly different thing. There is no way by which an existing sect with its power structures societies, agencies, institutions and organizations, can be transformed to become exclusively the one body.

A FORLORN HOPE

Any attempt to promote the ekklesia of God by uniting sects or parties is doomed to failure. This is not to deride such efforts. It is not even to say there may be no pragmatic value derived from them. In a fragmented world it would seem better for people to work together, than in opposition to one another, if there is no overwhelming conviction to keep them apart. Certainly they would save money and machinery, as they attempt to cooperate in relieving human misery.

It is not even necessary that the devil be credited with fomenting such attempts at cooperation. It is possible that Satan gets credit for more things than he deserves, and while I would not want to cheat him out of any glory coming to him, a lot of times he is credited with creating things that we do not favor, or did not think of first. What I am saying is that the idea that such cooperation or amalgamation of forces constitutes the body of Christ is far from being correct. No confederacy of sects can ever be the body of our Lord. Such a federation may create a larger sect, and in doing so, may quell a great deal of the pettiness which seems to accompany the sectarian stance, and it may develop a more impressive, sophisticated and functional sect, but it will not be the one body of Christ.

The body of Christ is not even constituted of congregations, all of which subscribe to a recognized format of procedure by which to test their loyalty. Sects can publish directories of those groups which the editor deems to be “loyal” and therefore, worthy of inclusion, and most of them do publish such. But these catalogues are simply lists of those places which outwardly, but not always inwardly, conform to a pre-determined and prescribed philosophy or rule. Such lists are convenient for those who wish to locate, associate or correspond with others who recognize certain positions as canonical, but they have no real relationship to the one body. No arbitrary listing, not even one compiled by an editor, has any relevance to the body of saints. Their names are enrolled in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, and that book is not currently open or accessible to earthly reporters.

Nothing is clearer than the fact that the one body is composed of individuals. The apostle Paul said this in so many words. “Now you are the body of Christ and individually members of it” (1 Corinthians 12:27). The members of the body are not sects, parties, factions or segments. To try and compose the body by uniting these is a useless pursuit. None of these have been, or can be baptized, and the body is composed of those who have been baptized. “For by one Spirit we were all baptized into one body— Jews or Greeks, slaves or free— and all were made to drink of one Spirit.” The body is made up of Jews and Greeks. It is composed of slaves and free men. It is not a coalition of sects but a community of saints.

When regarded as a flock, it is individuals who are the sheep. When regarded as a temple, it is individuals who are living stones. When regarded as a vine, it is individuals who are the branches. When regarded as a family, it is individuals who are the children. Some of these, of course, may belong to parties because of immaturity or carnality. Not all of the children and heirs of God are full-grown intellectually or emotionally. God has some mental dwarfs among his offspring. Not all of them have been able to conquer the fleshly tendency left over from childhood, to form tribes, clans and brotherhoods with their passwords and shibboleths. The tendency to huddle together in little groups of the initiated did not disappear with the original Gnostics.

This was true of the saints in Corinth to whom the apostle wrote more about the one body than to any other congregation. They were fragmented and schismatic. They were raucous with their party cries But the Spirit did not confuse their sectarian alliance with their relationship in Christ. They were in the body by the call of God who is faithful. They were in a party by their own choice. They were baptized into the one body, but they were badgered into schism. However, it must never be forgotten that it was these who came together “not for the better but for the worse,” who composed the one body at Corinth.

Paul did not once imply that their relationship in the sect cancelled their relationship to the head of the body. I do not intended to forget that as I write this year. I shall remember that no man on earth can add another to the body of Christ. We are to receive one another as God has received us. But whether we receive one another or not, has not one thing to do with God receiving us.

I shall also remember that no man on earth can remove another from the body of Christ. Neither the power of grafting or amputating has been conferred upon puny and finite man. Men can excommunicate others from their sects, because the sects originated with men. But excommunication from a sect does not mean amputation from the one body. Frequently, it is those who are beloved and respected in the one body, who are cast out of sects. One who seeks to live in conformity with the Lord may incur the wrath of those who seek conformity with the party.

I will remember that only the Holy Spirit can add one to the body of my precious Lord, and only the Spirit can subtract one from the body. I trust that this will help me to overcome any tendencies toward bigotry and infallibility which may linger from the days when I walked after the flesh. And as I write, I shall seek to write in love for all who trust in Jesus. Despite the wide divergencies in our understanding and approach, if you love him as I love him, we have a common ground from God upon which to stand as we reason together about the problems which we face as we seek to contribute to the eternal plan and purpose of the ages. May God bless you all is my fervent prayer! It is our sincere prayer that you will read our sequel to this article next month.

The Death of a Dream

Mission Messenger (January 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

A speech delivered at the Green Valley Church of Christ in San Jose, California, as one of the Roy B. Shaw Memorial Lectures (October 20-22, 1971).

In the art gallery at Bergano, in Italy, hangs a picture by Raphael, with an aura of romance about it. It is a painting of the Virgin and the Child. When Napoleon invaded Italy, and Milan and Bergano fell into his hands, he gave orders to collect the priceless art treasures to be sent away as spoils to the Louvre in Paris. An unknown painter in Bergano swiftly painted a rough, crude landscape over the canvas of Raphael. The captors, regarding it as worthless, left it behind.

In the years of turmoil which followed the picture became lost. No one recognized its true value. It was in the year 1868 that the hastily-daubed paint began to peel and flake off. Men who were adept at restoring ancient paintings were given the task of removing the accretions until finally the original could again be seen in all of the glory conveyed to it by the master artist.

In the summer of 1809, in the simple frontier home of a Dr. Welch, near the village of Washington, Pennsylvania, a humble Irish immigrant sat down at a small table in an upstairs room. He had recently been unfrocked as a Presbyterian minister because of his charitable heart which refused to confine the grace of God within the pale of a small segment of his sect. Now, at the age of forty-six, he was free in Christ to explore those means by which peace might be restored to a church militant against herself. Dipping a quill into the inkpot he began to inscribe upon foolscap the words which flowed from a heart burdened with grief over the schisms which had rent the family of God into warring tribes.

When he had finished writing, and dried his feathered quill, he called the document he held in his hand, "A Declaration and Address." When he read it to friends and neighbors gathered to hear it on September 7, they gave it their unanimous approval, and ordered it to be printed and distributed. One-hundred-and-sixty-two years have now come and gone and have faded into the blue haze which we call history, since Mr. Campbell stood up to read his production to backwoods neighbors, yet I have no hesitancy in saying to you that I regard it as one of the greatest uninspired documents written by human hand.

Like the famous charter signed by King John on the field of Runnymede, June 15, 1215, and which became the basis of English constitutional liberties, the declaration of Thomas Campbell became the Magna Charta of all those who respect the lordship of Jesus, leading the way to freedom from clericalism, creedism and ecclesiastical tyranny. Its purpose was probably best stated by Alexander Campbell, a son of the author, some twenty-six years after its inception.

"A deep and abiding impression that the power, the consolation and joys—the holiness and happiness—of Christ's religion were lost in the forms and ceremonies, in the speculations and conjectures, the feuds and bickerings of sects and schisms, originated a project many years ago for uniting the sects, or rather the Christians in all the sects, upon a clear and scriptural bond of union,—upon having a 'thus saith the Lord,' either in express terms or in approved precedent, ‘for every article of faith, and item of religious practice.’ This was offered in the year 1809, in the ‘Declaration and Address’ of the Washington Association, Pennsylvania.”

Mr. Campbell further called it “the first effort known to us to abandon the whole controversy about creeds and reformation, and to restore primitive Christianity, or to build alone upon the Apostles and Prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner.”

Some facts are immediately obvious. This was to be a work of recovery. It was dedicated to recovering the power, consolations, joys, holiness and happiness of the religion of Christ. It was to be a work of renewal. It sought to renew the faith and sentiments which made the Way so invincible in its primal era. It was to be a work of restoration. It was devoted to restoring the ancient order in practice and ordinances. It was to be a work of reformation. It was directed toward correcting the diction, purifying the language, and thus recapturing the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit. And this meant not just speaking where the Bible speaks, but speaking as the Bible speaks.

The goal was the union, peace and harmonious co-operation of all of the children of God. This was the glorious dream, the majestic vision, and the magnificent obsession. How was it to be accomplished? How was it to differ from the enfeebled sectarian thrusts of the past. What thoughts pulsed through the mind of Thomas Campbell as he wrote? Listen, as I detail for you a few of the noble concepts penned by this humble Irish Presbyterian.

1. At the outset it was to be recognized that the Church of Christ upon earth is essentially, intentionally and constitutionally one, consisting of all those in every place that profess their faith in Christ and obedience to him in all things according to the Scriptures, and that manifest the same by their tempers and conduct. It begins with a recognition and affirmation of unity, not as something to be achieved by Christians, but as something accruing to Christians. Unity in Christ is not a goal, but a gift. It is a state in which to share, not a status for which to strive.

Every believer who is in Jesus is in Jesus with every other believer who is in him. Every person who is joined to Jesus as head is joined to every other member who is joined to Jesus. And it makes no difference what else he may be in through ignorance, tradition or early conditioning. We become one body in him by the action of God and not through a faction of men. The church on earth is essentially one! It is intentionally one! It is constitutionally one! And this unity is beyond the power of man to affect.

2. The articles of faith and the terms of communion are divinely stated and must never be abridged, augmented or amended by men. Nothing ought to be inculcated upon Christians as an article of faith, nor required of them as terms of communion, but what is expressly taught and enjoined upon them in the word of God.

3. With respect to commands and ordinances of our Lord Jesus Christ, where the Scriptures are silent as to the express time, manner of performance, if any such there be, no human authority has power to interfere in order to supply the supposed deficiency by making laws for the Church, nor can anything more be required of Christians in such cases, but only that they so observe the commandments and ordinances as will evidently answer the declared and obvious ends of their institution.

4. That although inferences and deductions from Scripture premises, when fairly inferred, may be truly called the doctrine of God's holy word, yet are they not formally binding upon the consciences of Christians further than they perceive the connection, and evidently see that they are so, for their faith must not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power and veracity of God. Therefore, no such deductions can be made terms of communion, but properly do belong to the after and progressive education of the church. Hence it is evident that no such deductions or inferential truths ought to have any place in the Church's confession.

5. That although doctrinal exhibitions of the great system of Divine truths and defensive testimonies, in opposition to prevailing errors, be highly expedient, and the more full and explicit they be for these purposes the better; yet as these must be, in a great measure the effect of human reasoning, and of course must contain many inferential truths, they ought not to be made terms of Christian communion, unless we suppose, what is contrary to fact, that none have a right to the communion of the church, but such as possess a very clear and decisive judgment or are come to a very high degree of doctrinal information; whereas the Church from the beginning did, and ever will consist of little children and young men, as well as fathers.

What we have cited is sufficient to demonstrate that it was radical and revolutionary in the very best sense of those terms. It begins with a predication of the inherent oneness of the church, and defines the constituency thereof upon the basis of personal profession, validated by conduct and character. It proposes to maintain this oneness inviolate by excluding from articles of faith and terms of fellowship that which the word of God does not positively specify. It forbids legislation and binding of laws in areas of silence by any human authority, denying to any person or persons the prerogative of filling in the blanks for God.

But of especial importance is the safeguard erected around that hallowed watchword of the Reformation led by Martin Luther, "the right of private interpretation of the sacred scriptures." No inference or deduction from Scriptural premises, even if it may truly be called the doctrine of God's holy Word, is formally binding upon the conscience of any Christian further than he can personally see the connection or plainly perceive that it is so. Therefore, no such deductions can ever be made terms or conditions of fellowship, but belong rather to the gradual growth and maturity of the saints.

It was further provided that doctrinal exhibitions, explanations and interpretations of the great system of divine truths, even in opposition to prevailing errors, were not to be made tests of fellowship. In such reasonings it is obvious that inferential truths will be found, and not everyone has the degree of doctrinal information, or the clear and decisive judgment essential to determining for himself the truth and validity of such matters. If these things are made terms of communion, many will be admitted to the fellowship upon a second-hand or borrowed faith which they can neither understand nor explain. Their confidence will not rest in the Christ but be imposed in a preacher or presbyter.

This completely removed fellowship in Christ Jesus from the sphere of the extent of knowledge or the degree of comprehension of apostolic doctrine, and centered it in the gospel, the good news of Jesus. It made fellowship contingent upon acceptance of him who is our hope and salvation. By making our creed a person instead of a code, and our sharing in life dependent upon faith rather than upon knowledge of a system of doctrines, all of the controversies over creeds and formulae were forever rendered obsolete and irrelevant.

Was this grand design effective? Would it work? History shows that it kindled fresh hope in the humble hearts of hardened frontiersmen. They carried the torch and spread the glowing flame across the land. The citadels of sectarianism shook and trembled as if in a mighty wind. Party walls were breached and crumbled. Those who had been shackled by sectarian chains threw off their cruel fetters. Factional loyalties were forgotten. Prejudices were laid aside and banished from the heart. Wherever opposition reared its ugly head, the victory was hastened and augmented.

Early in the history of the noble experiment a severe test was made to determine whether men could be united by faith in Christ Jesus, while at the same time holding divergent opinions in regard to speculative matters, and whether fellowship could be sustained on such a basis. Aylett Raines was a prominent preacher in a religious sect which promoted the tenet that no one would be eternally and irretrievably lost, but that ultimate salvation would be the lot of every man. The sect was built around this as its cardinal dogma.

Mr. Raines went to hear Walter Scott and became convinced that he had never obeyed the gospel. He engaged in discussion with a Mr. Williams, another preacher in the sect of which he was a member, and he also agreed that Mr. Scott was correct. The two went down into the waters of the river, and in turn baptized one another for the remission of sins.

When Mr. Raines presented himself for reception into the Mahoning Association, objections were made by some to receiving him while he clung to his views about ultimate universal salvation. But Thomas Campbell arose and deplored the fact that such a question would even be introduced in a congregation of brethren. He said, "Brother Raines has been with me during the last several months and we have fully unbosomed ourselves to each other. He is philosophically a Restorationist and I am a Calvinist, but notwithstanding this difference of opinion between us, I would put my right hand into the fire and have it burned off, before I would hold up my hands against him. And from all I know of Brother Raines, if I were Paul, I would have him in preference to any young man of my acquaintance, to be my Timothy."

After Alexander Campbell and Walter Scott spoke and showed the difference between preaching the everlasting gospel and holding an opinion about some point of doctrine, Mr. Raines was received by an overwhelming majority. A historian who personally knew and worked with Aylett Raines wrote: "A practical demonstration was thus given that the disciples of Christ could unite on the plain and express teaching of the New Testament, in spite of conflicting opinions in regard to questions of doubtful and speculative nature. It was clearly shown by this transaction and its results, that the divisions of the Christian world over matters of a purely philosophical nature, are useless, as the Scriptures show them to be sinful. The two extremes of Calvinism and Universalism met and shook hands in fraternal fellowship upon the faith of the gospel of Jesus Christ— a fellowship that human opinions could not break."

It was in the early part of 1832, however, that the genius and nature of the restoration ideal to effect the unity of believers, was most forcefully demonstrated. At Lexington, Kentucky, some of the followers of Barton W. Stone, known as Christians, and some of those who shared the views of Alexander Campbell, known as Disciples, met to pray and labor for possible union. Hitherto, the movements had gone their separate ways, with only individual fraternization in certain communities. Now they seemed to be drawn toward one another by one Spirit.

John Smith closed an impassioned address with these words: "Let us, then, my brethren, be no longer Campbellites, or Stonites, or New Lights or Old Lights, or any other kind of lights, but let us come to the Bible, and to the Bible alone, as the only book in the world that can give us all the light that we need."

When he had finished his message, Barton W. Stone arose, spoke a few words, and publicly extended his hand to Smith as a token of fellowship. As the two men stood with clasped hands, the audience arose, weeping and singing and praising God. For the first time in the history of the Christian era, two separate bodies were joined into one through love of truth, and despite their differences. Those differences were many and to lesser men would have seemed insuperable. They embraced the nature of the Godhood, the nature of atonement, the name to be worn, the polity of the church, the work of the Spirit, and the design of baptism.

But all of them believed there was one body, one Spirit, one hope, one Lord, one faith, one baptism, and one God and Father who is over all, through all, and in all. This constituted the unity of the Spirit, and this they held and resolved to maintain in the bond of peace. From now on they would discuss all of their differences, but they would do so as brethren and not as members of warring tribes. They had demonstrated to a watching world that unity in diversity could be real, vibrant and powerful.

Men could be one in Christ who were of varied opinions, interpretations and understanding. The dream in the hearts of fervent pioneers had climbed to a soul in answer to the prayer of God's precious Son. And it was into the movement born of that dream that I came from the toils of sectarianism as a simple country lad.

Then, what of that vision in our generation? How have the heirs dealt with this servant sent unto them in the vineyard? It is with a deep sense of regret and shame that I confess that the magnificent project inaugurated to unite the Christians in all of the sects has fallen from its high estate. Even as I speak to you it is one of the most splintered and fragmented movements on the American scene. With the sharp darts of partisan prejudice its members have attacked one another publicly through the press and over the air waves. Rival segments have jostled and jockeyed one another for prestige and position while the sword of the Spirit has been driven into the quivering hearts of brethren and fratricidal gore has marked the sands of the arena of debate and dissension.

We have divided and formed antagonistic cliques over everything from how to take the Good News to the world, to how to pass the Lord's Supper to the congregation. Our only approach to differences has been division, and our only approach to division has been sectarian debate. In spite of the fact that every time the Spirit mentions division in the family of God it is condemned, we could not be more divided if the word of God commanded and enjoined it.

We are divided over missionary societies, instrumental music, centralized control, colleges, orphan homes, national radio and television programs, the right to own television sets, leavened bread, unleavened bread, the manner of breaking the bread, fermented wine, individual cups, Bible classes, uninspired literature, evangelists, the hiring of ministers, the pastor system, marriage of divorced persons, speaking in tongues, divine healing, foot-washing, the hour of meeting to eat the Lord's Supper, and a host of other things. And every division has been brought about by someone esteeming an opinion of greater value than the blood of Christ. Those who stand together one week and sing "Blest Be the Tie that Binds," sever it the following week over some trivial concept.

It is with a sense of sadness and remorse that I acknowledge that, in my earlier days, motivated by a false sense of loyalty, and impelled by ignorance, I felt that one faction constituted the kingdom of God upon earth. I refused to call upon God's children in other parties to even petition our common Father in my meetings. In my bigotry I felt that all others on earth were brethren in error, and to be held in contempt, while our group alone basked in the sunlight of divine favor. The blatant inconsistency of the sectarian attitude never entered my mind, until the grace of God reached out one day and touched me as never before, and the love of God was poured out abundantly in my poor shriveled heart.

Now, having been set free by the grace of God, I am irrevocably opposed to all sectarianism, even our own. And I am unconditionally opposed to that spirit of narrow exclusivism which separates and segregates brethren in Christ Jesus, and erects artificial walls— paper curtains— to keep them apart from and constantly suspicious of one another. I shall never again become the champion of any clan, the front man for any faction, or the proponent for any party. I shall belong only to the Lord Jesus Christ, body, soul and spirit. I will carry no factional banner and wave no factional flag. I shall flaunt no factional badge and no factional tag.

I will cross over every barrier, break through every wall, and ignore every fence which men have erected in Christ Jesus my Lord. I will labor with all of my brethren who permit me to do so, and love those who will not. My only creed is Christ, and while I respect every rock of truth scattered over God's revelational landscape, I will build upon none of them. My hope of heaven depends not so much upon propagating a party to defend a truth as it does in personally casting myself in absolute dependence upon him who is the truth. And while every truth is precious to me, and will be included as discovered in my rock garden for meditation and enjoyment, I will plant my trust only upon him whom God planted his community, the Rock of Ages! For other foundation can no man lay!

This means that every child of God is my brother. And I have no half-brothers or step-brothers in the Lord. I accept you where you are and as you are. I accept you as God accepted me, in my weakness, frailty and failures. If you are good enough to be his son or daughter you are not too bad to be my brother or sister. And I receive you, and receive you now. We can stop this silly march into oblivion. We can halt the cancerous growth of division which is slowly consuming the body. We do not need to wait until we have debated every action of every faction. We can be one in Christ Jesus now! All we need to do is to extend the hand of fellowship in spite of differences, as did the brethren in Lexington, almost a century-and-a-half ago, and we can walk out of this hall tonight blessed as peacemakers and deserving to be called the children of God.

I have brethren who, in good conscience, can accompany their praise service to God with instruments of music; I have brethren whose consciences will not allow them to do so. I have brethren who give money to support Herald of Truth and never look at it; I have brethren who refuse to support it and never miss seeing it. I have brethren who teach in Sunday Schools with classes for all ages, and others who gather in undivided assemblies to study the sacred pages. I have brethren who remember the shedding of the blood while drinking from individual cups; I have brethren who pass one container to the body of saints. They are all my brethren. I love them all.

I refuse any longer to play God with any of their lives and thoughts. To their own master they must stand or fall. I will not set at nought my brother. I will not destroy him for whom Jesus died because of my personal conviction about things. The blood of Jesus which makes us one is more important to me than the things about which we dispute inside the family. Our differences are occasions for discussion, but not for division.

If one of my brethren testifies to an experience with the Spirit of God which I have neither had nor sought, I shall not call him a liar, nor shall I drive him forth from the family circle. I shall spread about him the warmth and compassion which all of us need so much, and will cherish him although I may not condone his experience. We are not one because we have had the same experience in the flesh but because we are in One who experienced the same thing in the flesh for all of us. To him be all our praise!

For decades the dream that we might be one has been sleeping in the hidden sepulcher of forgotten hopes. Betrayed in the house of its friends, stabbed to death by the hands of those it had cradled at birth, laid to rest in a grave above which its own offspring has continued to wage intestine war, its memory has all but faded from the field of theological encounter.

But now another fulness of the times has come! The spiritual womb of hope cries out to be delivered. We must roll away the stone of contention with which our fathers sealed the mouth of the tomb. We must see the glorious ideal which they laid away, resurrected, to come forth clad not in the garb of the nineteenth century, but in the shining armor essential to meet the challenge of a twentieth century secular age, and an ecumenical era.

It is high time to arouse out of sleep. Our salvation is now nearer than when we believed. Let us direct the dynamic of the love of God against the walls which have been opaque, and see them become transparent so that we can envision our brethren on both sides of them. Let us forget the fear of what men may do unto us, and reach out our hands to those we once spurned. Let us learn to love those who differ with us, and find that peace that passes understanding. Let us not wait. Let us do it now!

I have steadfastly set my face in the direction of the unity of all believers in Christ Jesus my Lord. I shall pray for it, plead for it, and proclaim it. I shall never be deterred. I shall never become discouraged. I will never be satisfied until all of us regard one another as God regards all of us. And when the time comes that the pen drops from my nerveless fingers, and my tongue cleaves to the roof of my mouth, I shall rest content, if on the gray marble above my head can be chiseled the words, "He preached peace to them that are afar off and to them that are nigh!"

The Sectarian Game

Mission Messenger (February 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

None of those who read this little journal would deliberately oppose the will of God. None would knowingly be parties to a plot to hinder the divine purpose. In spite of that, we may have allowed ourselves to be maneuvered into a corner where we actually think that to be faithful to Christ we must perpetuate a condition which is diametrically opposed to the divine pleasure. The possibility of this cannot be denied in view of the statement of Jesus to his apostles that the time would come when those who murdered them would do so under the impression that they were performing a service for God. So great is the binding, blinding power of tradition that it may provoke men to make void the law of God, even while thinking that they are fulfilling it.

It is clear that the desire of heaven is for all who trust in Jesus upon the testimony of his ambassadors, to be one. This is the first step in the program of God to bring the universe into a unity in Christ. It is essential to the conviction of the world that he sent his Son, and that the earth was invaded by the personal Word in time and space. Our divisions delay and postpone the acceptance of this great fact by the masses of mankind. Under the guise of loyalty to truth we are helping to defeat the impact of the Eternal Verity.

It is because of this that I am emboldened to address this appeal to all who love my Lord, and theirs. Feeble though the plea may be and meager though this insignificant little journal may appear, I am casting it like bread upon the waters, consigning it into the hands of him who rules the world, hoping and praying that he will see fit to use it in a way pleasing unto himself. My plea is addressed to all who reverence a common Father, the one God, whether Catholic, Protestant, or Independent.

However, it is important that you remember that it is not addressed to any man because he is Catholic or Protestant. I am not writing to men as Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists or Congregationalists. These terms represent our human divisions, and do not express the longing characteristic of all who seek to find a oneness in Christ Jesus. They are indicative of circumstances of birth, family alliances or community influences, as often as they are deliberate and thought-out theological choices. I speak to men as men, made in the image of God, and alike caught up in the human predicament.

This does not mean that I ignore our sectarian affiliations, but that I regard them as secondary and unrelated to the goal which is before me as I write. They may complicate our problem but they do not constitute it. They are symptoms to be seen externally, but they only betoken an underlying condition which is the real problem. We must cut through them if we are to deal with one another purely on the basis of our love for Jesus. They are like the clothing which the surgeon in the emergency room must cut in order to get to the wound. The disease is sectarianism, the party spirit, and it may take various overt forms.

Obviously we will not be motivated to overcome it until we see it as it really is, a heinous crime against the Spirit of God. It is one of the works of the flesh which lusts against the Spirit and is contrary to it. It is specifically named in a catalogue of vices including immorality, impurity, licentiousness, sorcery, idolatry, drunkenness, and such like. We are plainly informed that one who deliberately condones and defends the party spirit will not inherit the kingdom of God. It is identified as one of the desires which those who belong to Christ Jesus have crucified as a part of the flesh (see Galatians 5:17-24).

One might as well try to justify adultery or idolatry as to sanction partisan strife and schism. To continue in it as part of a traditional heritage would be like indulging in drunkenness because one's father or grandfather were alcoholics. To speak lightly of schism in the body is to be guilty of mockery, and to walk after our ungodly desires. "These are the people who set up divisions, because they are fleshly, and do not possess the Spirit" (Jude 17, 18). Separationism and exclusivism are grievous offences against God.

The Holy Spirit never prompted the origin of any sect. No one was ever baptized into a sect or party under the influence of the Holy Spirit. No one has ever promoted a party to separate or segregate the members of God's family under the leading of the Spirit. The formation of a brotherhood or spiritual fraternity upon the basis of national, social, cultural or racial grounds is not of the Spirit. All such is a work of the flesh. On this the word of God is eminently plain. "For indeed we were all brought into one body by baptism, in the one Spirit, whether we be Jews or Greeks, whether we be slaves or free men" (1 Corinthians 12:13).

So long as we think of sectarianism as a kind of harmless game which we can play without any particularly evil consequences or results we will not be led to abandon it. We will regard it as the drunkard regards his alcoholism, and seek to defend it or explain it away. We must see it as God looks at it. We must recognize it as a hacking to bits of the body of our Lord, an attempt to cure a malady by dismemberment and wilful chopping off of the organs which the Spirit made into one sacred organism.

THE CHANGING CENTERS

What happened to believers in our Lord to cause them to be so frightfully divided as to virtually nullify any effective witness for the one body? It seems rather trite to say that they moved the center of their faith from its original object and position to various points on the spiritual map, and as groups were formed around these diverse centers sects resulted. If we are to again enjoy that unity which at first prevailed we must once more locate the center around which all may revolve, and prove with such clarity that it is the divinely-given rallying-point that all will be persuaded to join hands about it and restore the unity of all the disciples of Jesus Christ our Lord.

Of course this is easier said than done! What makes it difficult is the fact that each sect thinks that its present center is the divinely-given one and that the emphasis it makes is indispensable to a closer walk with God. More and more, however, the absolute essentiality to faith of the sectarian centers of polarization is being questioned by both Protestant and Catholic alike. Eminent Catholics are now debating the dogma of papal infallibility, and many Protestants are no longer concerned with the sectarian tenets which gave birth to their parties. When this is a reflection of a greater concern for God's Word it is good, but when it is due to mere unconcern for spiritual values it is sad. It is one thing to give up a traditional view because it represents an invalid emphasis, it is wholly different to do so because one is no longer interested in anything spiritual. One who leaves the shallows is to be commended if he does so by wading deeper into the stream of spiritual life, but such commendation hardly belongs to one who does so by climbing out on the bank to sit and throw rocks at those who are involved.

The anomaly of all this is that the most bitter partisans of the past may turn out to be the most unitive in thought, because of their determined stand for what they thought to be right all along. At the same time, those who are apathetic and indifferent about their present alliances may care very little about accomplishing a greater purpose of God. Some who wish for truth while washed in error may become greater leaders than those who have always been wishy-washy with the truth. Those who do not stand for anything often tend to fall for everything!

But it must be made clear that sectarianism does not necessarily result from the espousal of error. The point of emphasis around which a sect crystallizes may be a truth. Being wrong about a doctrinal matter and being sectarian are two different things. In any attempt to promote unity we must always recognize that it must be done on such a basis that no one is called upon to give up any truth which he ever held. It is not required that one surrender any truth, or any concept which he sincerely believes to be a truth. It is required that he “distinguish between things that differ,” and no longer make a creed out of a truth which is secondary in importance to the cardinal truth upon which Jesus constructed the community of the reconciled ones.

It is not always error held in opposition to truth which makes a sect. Sometimes it is a truth held to the exclusion of other truths, or a truth elevated above the truth. All truths are equally true but they are not equally important. It is always better to be right than to be wrong about anything, but our hope of eternal life is not dependent upon being right about everything. It is dependent upon being in the right One. When he is our everything, nothing else can be! And righteousness is a relationship, not an intellectual attainment.

Certainly one should never relinquish a truth, but neither should he make a truth which is secondary a condition of acceptance or fellowship. The body of truth is like the human body and consists of many members. In the human body some members are essential to being while others are essential to wellbeing. If you cut off my head I will die but if you cut off my little finger I will merely be handicapped. No member of my body is non-essential, but some members are essential to life itself, while others are essential to efficient functioning while I have life. And we must never confuse the two.

Whatever one is required to believe in order to have life is more important than what one must learn in order to grow and develop. What one is able to digest and assimilate at a given time can hardly be as important as his existence. This does not affirm that either is unimportant. It does place their relative importance in a proper perspective. The doctrine which gives life has more importance than the doctrine upon which we feed and grow spiritually. To postulate reception upon the basis of doctrinal knowledge rather than upon belief of the gospel is the equivalent of arguing that no one is a child in a physical family because he has been begotten, but because of his digestive ability and food intake.

Our relationship to the kingdom of heaven is that of naturalized citizens as opposed to that of aliens. When aliens are inducted as citizens of the United States there are certain elemental things to which they must pledge allegiance. When they do this they are received as citizens and are as much citizens as they will ever be. There are thousands of facts about our history and the responsibilities of their citizenship which they do not know at the time. These are not unimportant but simply unessential to their induction. They are not conditions of acceptance but factors of growth and development.

If someone advocates that one cannot be recognized as a citizen until he understands and subscribes to one or more of these subsidiary and developmental matters, he does injury to our nation, regardless of his sincerity. In the same fashion, when one postulates citizenship in the kingdom of heaven upon knowledge and acknowledgment of secondary or subservient truths, he hurts the cause of our Redeemer. Even though he poses as a loyalist or super-patriot he is disloyal to our King, and if he splinters the subjects into factions and sects where they are taught to hate their fellow-citizens he is a traitor to the very cause he professes to promote.

To devise another ground of allegiance to which one must pledge himself in order to be regarded as a citizen, does not enhance a nation, but weakens it. Every sect, composed of believers in the Lord of glory, only serves to weaken the kingdom of heaven to the extent that it cultivates its own image and seeks to supplant the divine arrangement with the human. To form another nation on some principle borrowed or lifted from the Bill of Rights is rebellion, even though the principle itself is valid and right.

One can be a citizen and entitled to all of the rights and privileges of citizenship, even though quite ignorant of many of the responsibilities devolving upon a citizen. So one can be received as a citizen of the kingdom of heaven while he is unlearned as to many duties necessary to become a better citizen. Such things are matters of growth and development. Citizenship is not predicated upon these matters but upon a relationship of allegiance to the King.

It will not be easy for us to give up our centers of polarization, because we are emotionally attached to them. We have been led to believe that because our fathers fought and died to establish them we will prove untrue to our heritage if we no longer regard them as the crux of partisan faith. All of us can be very critical and intolerant of all other believers who cling to their points of special emphasis. We cannot see how they can be so wilfully ignorant and blind as to maintain and perpetuate their partisan establishments. But stubbornness in others is faithfulness in ourselves.

The problem is intensified because we are conditioned by our written history to think of ourselves as the guardians of orthodoxy. We glamorize our past and glorify our present Partisan histories are often written by those within to explain a particular stance to those without. It is difficult to be objective while on the defensive. A history of the Roman Catholic party does not read at all like a history of the Lutheran party even while covering the same territory and century. A history of pioneer Methodism does not sound at all like a history of the Baptists on the frontier.

In the particular movement in which my lot has been cast, it is indeed interesting to read the various historical accounts in circulation. It was a movement to unite the Christians in all of the sects by a return to and a restoration of “the primitive order.” But like the fifteen or more other restoration movements with the same goal it became fragmented as first one thing and then another was deemed essential to the ancient order and a partisan group rallied around that indispensable thing in an attempt to make it vital to the original goal.

As each segment produces a history, they all start with the same heroes of the faith and identify with the original crusaders. As they proceed in time each party steadfastly maintains that it is keeping the faith while all others have left it. Each feels that it has arrived while the others have all departed. The leaders of the flock for one group become the “black sheep” to another. The interesting thing is that each historian thinks of his own group as central to the plea. So we have any number of “centrists,” each with corresponding leftists and rightists. It is again borne home to us that history is not so much made by those who live it as by those who write it.

A little careful thought will convince us that one is not a rightist or leftist to us because of where he stands, but by virtue of where we stand as we look at him. It is worth remembering that the direction we face determines who is to the right or left of us. If we turn around, or reverse our field, our rightists will become leftists, and vice versa. All of us are rightists, leftists, and centrists to someone, and we are all of these without moving out of our tracks or taking a step. For this reason it is a little childish to use these terms for the purpose of locating either ourselves or others unless our goal is that of partisan gratification.

This brings me to the place where I may observe that all sectarianism originates in human egotism and is perpetuated by human pride. This is as true of our own sectarianism as that of the sectarianism of others about us. We may feel that we alone possess the key to open the door to understanding of some divine secret which remains a mystery to all others. Or, we may convince ourselves that we have been chosen and qualified as a heavenly “Brink’s Guard Company,” to protect the riches of the heavenly treasure on its way to the great vault in the skies. Our points of emphasis thus become identification badges for admission to the sacred precincts, and can be used as coded passwords or shibboleths for identification as “loyal.”

Every sect seeks to maintain and polish its own image regardless of cost. And in a culture which is built around a success syndrome, it may be a very expensive thing indeed, in time, money and effort. Obviously, the sectarian “somewhats” dare not use sectarian pride as the basis of appeal since it is diametrically opposed to all that Jesus taught. Promotional campaigns, therefore, are always geared to other concerns, and financial drives are assumed to be legitimate because of the need of taking the gospel to ignorant natives in a foreign country or in an affluent suburb. Thus, milking the pocketbooks of a million dollars to erect a temple of pride is justified by the need for salvation of those who will not come to a more antiquated structure. When an apparent harvest is in the offing men tend to tear down their barns and build greater.

But in spite of the cleverness of the religious “Fifth Avenue Crew,” the spiritual “men in gray flannel suits” always let the cat out of the bag sooner or later. And when they do their sectarianism shows through. When talking about the poverty and deprivation of natives they seek to stimulate the flow of shekels by reference to the number of missionaries sent out by other sects. They prepare charts showing the per capita giving of affiliates of other religious institutional cliques. The question is asked, "Shall we allow 'the Lord's church' to be surpassed by Seventh Day Adventists and Mormons?" Meanwhile the headquarters of the Seventh Day Adventists and Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints are also sending out comparative charts, for each one of them thinks it is "the Lord's church." There's nothing else that can equal the sectarian spirit of rivalry for "bringing in the sheaves" of greenbacks.

In the race for "the pole position" in the Christian Missions Derby, the smaller and newer sects must try harder. Like Avis, they are not recognized as first, and if you will pardon a miserable and hardly excusable pun— it Hertz! Although often drawing from a relatively lower-income group, the people must be exploited to secure ornate and elaborate structures so they can hold their heads up in the religious community and prove that they are as good as the older sects which finance their "heresy" by the gifts of the professional and business men who are rewarded with positions on the official board.

Actually, men wear themselves out and give to the point of exhaustion to maintain the structure of which they are a part. They kill their bodies to save their souls. This might not be so frightening if they did not confuse the latter with polishing and greasing sectarian machinery. It is an interesting observation that the sectarian spirit is intensified when rivalry develops within a given group and division occurs. If the group has been apathetic toward sects of other historical backgrounds, as soon as it fragments, each segment enters into frantic and fanatical effort to outdo the other, on the ground that its righteousness will be manifested by contrast rather than by confession of faith. It is always interesting to see how worldly men must become in order to prove they are not!

Everyone is familiar with the childish and adolescent trend to show off by exhibition of the latest criteria of the “in group.” When I was a country lad, the thing to do was to meet on Sunday afternoons and race saddle-horses up and down the dirt road which ran in front of the schoolhouse. When automobiles became plentiful the highways were turned into drag strips for “hot-rods.” The latest fad is to head for the lake or river, sit far back in a boat, so the front end is pointed toward heaven as indicative of your destination if you hit a submerged tree trunk, and gun a souped-up outboard motor to cut in and out of river traffic like a bumblebee flying through a cane-brake.

But the same tendency can be seen in “religious circles,” where the inclination to “make waves” seems irresistible to the showmen. I recall attending a great convention once where a number of small mechanized tractors were used to haul grown men around the hall on rubber-tired transports. Each man was holding aloft a placard indicating the number of schools, homes, or missionaries supported by the party in various parts of the earth. As each little truck stopped in front of the stage the men came up the stairs to the platform while an announcer intoned the number of new congregations started, or the number of new institutions begun, as contrasted with those begun by a rival party in the religious field. The rival party never won a single round. They came in a poor second on every count. It reminded me of the man who returned from the Roman Colosseum to announce that the final score was Lions 5, Christians 0. I have seldom seen a more sectarian demonstration or a more childish spectacle.

Sectarianism is a sign of carnality and immaturity. The first makes us act like mere men, the second makes us react like spoiled children. The carnal nature is selfish and envious. It is egotistic and jealous. Those who are dominated by it always crave to be in the lead. They react with bitterness against those who stand in their way or circumvent them. They spend their time trying to get even for fancied faults. They cannot give credit for any accomplishment, regardless of how magnificent, unless achieved by one of the party henchmen.

John Harris, a British theologian, writing about 1860, said: “Each side may be conscious of certain defects in its own system, and may perceive certain excellences in the system of the other; but it fears to confess the former, or to admit and adopt the latter, lest it should look like a concession to the superiority of its opponents. It is an ancient maxim of wisdom, that it is right to learn even from an enemy; accordingly, an army no sooner finds that the foe is employing a new and an effectual weapon, than it immediately copies and adopts the deadly invention; but an ecclesiastical faction, heedless of the maxim, and more saturated with hostility than the ranks of war, would regard the adoption of a useful principle or measure by its supposed opponents, as an adequate reason for never adopting it into its own service.”

Immaturity creates a false sense of values. Mere trifles are exalted into major issues. Important things are casually passed over or brushed aside. There is always the tendency to think of men more highly than they deserve. Coalitions are formed which have as their rallying-points various items of thought, and these are argued, discussed and debated as if the entire universe pivoted upon them as an axis.

This whole attitude must be renounced by those who would please God. It is not enough to discount it, but we must count it as utter dross, to be banished and rejected as having no relevance to the walk of faith, or to the life of the Spirit. No man can please God while maintaining a schismatic stance, regardless of the excuses by which he seeks to justify it. We must overcome the sectarian spirit or we will perish in this sin.

I eagerly entreat from the heart, that all of us, without exception, look within the depths of our own beings, and examine carefully our motivations. Let us resolve with the help of God to eliminate from our lives that littleness and bigotry which can only create unhappiness among those whom we love, and bring disaster to the social fabric of the body of Christ where we are. Let every person who reads these words make a solemn covenant with God that he will cease trying to be some kind or brand of Christian, and belong only to the Father of mercies.

Those of us who respect the lordship of Jesus can change this sinful and untoward world if we will unite under the banner of righteousness. We must haul down our party standards and our tribal insignia, and determine that never again will we encamp around them. If we will belong to Jesus above everything else and take orders from him rather than from men, then we can bring peace to a troubled and distressed world. And we can be truly called the children of God. In our subsequent issues we shall explore how this may be done and what results we may expect from it. This is the time, here is the place! Let us here and now make a firm commitment to march only to the sound of the divine trumpet! Let us be one!

The Recovery of Reason

Mission Messenger (February 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

A speech delivered at the Green Valley Church of Christ in San Jose, California, as one of the Roy B. Shaw Memorial Lectures (October 20-22, 1971).

Recently the movie-makers of Russia and Italy collaborated in producing “The Red Tent,” a saga of the suffering sustained through the ill-fated attempt of the Italian explorer, Umberto Nobile, to reach the North Pole in the Norge, a blimp constructed for the purpose. Nobile was rescued, to live out his career under a shadow of accusation, because of the death of his own men, and that of the searching parties. Among those who perished in the rescue attempt was Roald Amundsen, whose own feats of Polar exploration have become legendary.

The movie begins with General Nobile in his apartment, unable to sleep. His conscience will not allow him to rest, so he arises and through force of memory summons back those who perished. As they return from forty years of entombment in Arctic wastes, they hold court, to sit in judgment upon the motives and actions of all involved. The prosecutor is the brash young aviator who flew Nobile back to safety, abandoning his starving companions upon the ice. The judge is Roald Amundsen.

It is only in fantasy that such scenes can be recalled.

Thomas Wolfe in his posthumously published novel “You Can’t Go Home Again,” makes it clear that we can never recapture the scenes of yesteryear. Five hundred years before Jesus was born into this world, Heraclitus wrote, “You cannot step twice into the same river, for other waters are continually flowing in.” It is, therefore, impossible to summon our fathers for questioning concerning their actions and motives which passed on to us a splintered and fragmented restoration movement, rendered imbecilic by its own quarrels, and incapable of securing unity because of its own divisions.

We are now beset by tradition and frightened to face up to the only eventuality which can rescue us from our sordid and tragic mess. The route back to sanity is simple. It means merely taking the medicine in our own illness which we prescribed for and dispensed to the sectarian world when we posed as the physician instead of the patient. We recommended the ignoring of creeds and divisions which had occurred to split and shiver the religious world, and leaping over them all, to return to things as they were before these transpired. If there is any validity in the ideal of restoration, now that we are riven into a mass of bickering parties our only hope is to ignore our unwritten creeds, and return to the principles upon which we began.

This is precisely what our brethren fear to do. Each party wants to freeze unity at its own level and entertain the silly and senseless hope that eventually it will argue some and verbally browbeat the remainder into accepting the faction as the one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God upon earth. But to do this would mean to declare a moratorium on thought and reason, for you cannot maintain the status quo except by creating puppets and making robots of those who support it. As Everett Dirksen pointed out in a Washington news conference, “Life is not a static thing. The only people who do not change their minds are incompetents in asylums, who can’t, and those in cemeteries.”

If our brethren do gain a wider vision of God's grace, they still want to confine it according to the denominational categories of the United States Census Bureau. And while they concede that we may in some distant day bring about a workable union of those who do not use instrumental music in their public praise service, they are horror-stricken at the thought of including those whose consciences are not defiled by its use. Thus, the organ becomes more than an instrument of music. It becomes an instrument to batter into subjection individuals and congregations desirous of exhibiting the love of God and promoting the peace of heaven.

Our brethren have learned as much from the corrupt political world as they have from the incorruptible word of God. And they have borrowed the tactics of the former rather than appropriated the spirit of the latter. By innuendo, threat and boycott, they have thrown a chill mantle of fear over every honest attempt to bridge our chasms. Taking words which have been given a specialized meaning in the theological world, they have applied them to every person who dares to have an original thought, and by such a nefarious method they have been successful in burying any effort to strike the partisan shackles from our wrists.

A good example is the word "liberal." In recent weeks I have seen this word stamped like a stigma upon men who regard the new translations of the scriptures as useful, upon men who think that individual cups are justifiable, upon those who refuse to attack and castigate Pat and Shirley Boone, and upon those who support Herald of Truth. Of course this works its own rebuke, for when a word comes to mean everything, it comes to mean nothing. When it is then used it reveals nothing about the position of the accused, but merely demonstrates the consummate ignorance of the user.

In our present state we must not forget that there are many who confuse "walking in the old paths," with "wallowing in the old ruts,” and these will be more attracted by emotion than by reason. When they hear one called a liberal it creates a fright psychosis. They must either drive him from them or they must flee from him. We are subject to all sorts of group pressures, and to organized and unorganized tensions. Papers, preachers and presbyters feel called upon to keep us in line, and whatever whip-cracking is necessary will be indulged. Our black brothers are worried about “Uncle Toms,” but the white saints are worried and bothered by “Simon Legrees.”

I have said all of this because I am quite convinced that we will never throw off our sectarian chains until someone arises who will boldly deny the scripturality and validity of our whole exclusivistic religio-politico institutional stance. And whoever does so must be prepared to pay the price. If our history presages our future, he will be maligned, misrepresented and verbally mauled by those who never met him, heard him speak, or read a word that he wrote. Now I have no desire to become a candidate for banishment or martyrdom, but, like Jeremiah, I am weary from holding in.

By God’s grace, I want to make a statement of my personal conviction. I seek to bind it upon no one else. I will love those who cannot concur as well as those who agree. But I am fed up with “ping-pong diplomacy” in the kingdom of heaven, and with playing tiddleywinks with the unity of the believers. The time is past when we can look out through the chinks in our ivy-covered monastic walls and take an occasional potshot at others with our theological pea-shooters and call it fighting the battle for Jesus. The day is too far spent to have little select groups of the party elite to meet in fancy motels and play “See-Saw” with the agonizing prayer of God’s beloved Son.

A few days ago I read a prediction from the pen of an editor in the restoration movement. He filed accusations against brethren whom he designated as “liberals,” castigating them for defending what he calls “centralized control” projects such as Herald of Truth. He declared that they had undermined the faith and spawned a group of educated young radicals who would undo all of the notable spiritual gains for the cause of Christ. He warned that they would begin to advocate that the division over instrumental music was a mistake, and that we should fully recognize those in the Christian Churches as our brethren.

I trust that you will carefully follow what I am going to say. I have never been more serious. I have never been more deadly in earnest. I am no longer young. I am not a youthful radical. I am staid and conservative in life-style and dress. I have not been influenced or brain-washed by “liberals” at Abilene Christian College. Those brethren have repeatedly given me the brush-off when I pleaded with them to allow me to come and present my thinking to the student body and be questioned by any members of the faculty designated by the administration.

I am identified with a congregation which does not use instrumental music and never will. I am by conviction opposed to its introduction into the public praise service of the saints. But I state to you, out of a heart filled with reverence for the word of God and respect for all of his children, that the formal division which was made over this issue was the gravest mistake into which Satan seduced our fathers, and if we continue to stubbornly perpetuate the error we will answer for our obduracy at the throne of God.

Hear me further! It is regrettable that we must deal with instrumental music, for what I am saying applies completely across the board to every one of the motley group of things which we designate as controversial issues. But the instrument was credited with our first cleavage, and it receives the brunt of the attack because of its primacy. Moreover, both sides rushed into the civil courts to protect their physical properties and real estate, and the witnesses who testified in the presence of a gawking public, rubbed salt into the raw wounds inflicted by words with a cutting edge. We eventually crystallized into two denominations as recognized by the census bureau, and now partisan pride, the bane of every religious movement, has kept us apart.

Our division has become hardened by reason of the debates that have been conducted. These have not explored the path to unity but have been used as a platform for justification for positions already held. Once I was the recognized champion of a school of thought among us. I was summoned to the defense when our position was deprecated or attacked. I have appeared upon the forensic stage and engaged in verbal combat with many of the warhorses of contention, pawing, snorting and breathing fire. But I have renounced debate with my brethren as wholly irrelevant and ineffective in our time, to accomplish that great and majestic purpose for which Jesus died.

We must face up to instrumental music because it is the cultural and historical problem which confronts us. We cannot ignore it. We dare not cease to work for a solution to our division. The hope is that if we can realistically solve this thorny problem we will have discovered the principle upon which every other issue will be placed in a proper perspective. But if we do not solve this we will be a divided movement regardless of how many other matters we dispose of. And no man truly works for the unity of all believers who regards any amount of sectarian division as normal for any of the believers. But the very daring of what I propose raises a number of questions. And I must face them or fail in any attempt to meet the responsibility of a peacemaker.

1. Does this mean that we repudiate all that for which our fathers fought, and the gains they made in restoring the ancient order?

I reject no truth for which these noble men struggled. I accept every gain they made in the restoration of the ancient order. But the thinking of our fathers was not always flawless upon this or any other subject. They were often men with limited means of education, suffering deprivation and with few resources for intellectual improvement. They were hardy and vigorous as they had to be to survive on the frontier, but they frequently fought grizzly bears in the daytime, Indians at night, and brethren on Sunday. I came from a mountain area where feuds were passed on from one generation to another, and men killed one another over some fancied insult to the family, long since forgotten. But to kill was the thing to do, because the fathers had killed one another.

I shall preserve no senseless feud either in my own family or in the family of God. Jesus did not die to form rival clans of the Hatfields and the McCoys. I shall allow no skeletal fingers to reach out from the tomb and snap the fetters of hate around the strings of my heart. On what ground can I demand that Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians cease to walk in the trails which their fathers have blazed while I stumble stolidly along making the same archaic arguments and wresting the same scriptures, through ancestral pride? I accept every truth which my fathers wrung from the fabric of God's revelation, but I reject division in God's family as contrary to that revelation in every respect.

2. Is it not a fact that instrumental music is condemned by the scriptures?

Of course not! If it were it would not even be a matter of discussion between sincere and conscientious followers of the Lamb who recognize his Lordship over their lives. The new covenant scriptures do not say it is a sin. They do not teach that it is wrong. They do not once mention it in the context in which we discuss it. Those who consider it to be wrong do so on the basis of deduction from what they think is the tenor of God's word.

They formulate a presupposition which constitutes their philosophy of interpretation. This constitutes the spectacles through which they read all of God's word. That presupposition is that whatever is not specifically commanded is forbidden. But the Bible does not say that. No one can give "book, chapter and verse" for that statement. Brethren arrive at this presupposition on the basis of isolated texts which they bring into juxtaposition and from which they then reach a conclusion. But our spectacles are not a part of what we read. We don them before we open the Book, and must never confuse our lens with God's light, else we may mistake reflection for revelation.

We would have but little difficulty if all brethren wore the same spectacles. But others insist upon grinding their own lens as we do ours. They love Jesus as much as we do. They respect his word as authority for their lives. But they do not regard me as the divinely-commissioned optometrist for the whole world. They do not believe that God has appointed an official interpreter for the brotherhood, so they do not accept my interpretation as infallibly official. And if I try to bind it upon them they may consider me as infernally officious. Our brethren who use instrumental music do not flout the authority of God's word. They respect Jesus as the Lord of the church, but they do not regard anyone else as Lord of it. And that's where the problem lies!

3. Does not the authority of silence forbid the use of instrumental music?

There is no such thing as the authority of silence as a law or code for the body of Christ. The only authority silence has is for the conscience of the individual. It can never be bound upon another, for to do this one would have to speak, and when you do this it is what you speak that is bound and not the silence.

Silence may be respected but cannot be made authoritative for the simple reason that no one knows why God refrains from speaking in a given instance. To assume that by not mentioning a thing he always intends to forbid it is sheer conjecture. God has no authoritative spokesman to fill in the blanks or to supply the missing information. Those who speak about the authority of silence are always inconsistent and must employ casuistry, since they all have some things God has not specifically mentioned or authorized. No one who makes the argument can ever really live by it, for he makes what God has not said as important as what he did say.

4. How can unity come about while some use the instrument and others cannot?

The answer is simple. It involves two things. First, we must cease making the use of the instrument a test of fellowship, and secondly, we must start practicing the local autonomy which we have always proclaimed. We have no right to make anything a condition of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. If brethren are good enough to be accepted by God they are good enough for me to receive. No one is saved because he has the proper understanding of instrumental music at the time he is immersed, and no one will be lost because he is mistaken about it.

We must resolve not to allow the peculiarities of those in the family to destroy the family relationship. That which produces and sustains life is more important than the things which distinguish between those who have life. We must not destroy him for whom Christ died because of his view about things on which we may disagree. I dare not judge my brother on the one hand, nor despise him upon the other. I am not his master, and he is not my servant. We cannot force or coerce either individuals or congregations into a pattern of our own thought.

No congregation of saints which opposes instrumental music is ever obligated to adopt it; no congregation which desires to use it can ever be forced by another to relinquish it. Each congregation must be self-governing and self-determining under God. Our task is not to get brethren to unite in their opinion about the instrument, but to be united in Christ Jesus. Such unity is not produced by fondness for things but by affection for the brethren.

All that we seek is that we all be free to visit and assist one another where we conscientiously can do so, to call upon and recognize one another, to exchange speaking engagements so that we may cultivate closeness and share insights, to pray together, study together, and labor together in areas of mutual concern. Our hope is that the instrument will cease to be an issue among us because all of us will make Jesus Christ central in our life and thought.

Unity in Christ is not a matter for bargaining and haggling. It is not a matter of all of us meeting under the same roof. My own family does not live in the same house, or even in the same city, and yet we are closely knit together in the bond of love. Unity of the Spirit is not a matter of geographical proximity, but of gracious affinity. I am one in the Spirit with every child of God who is here present. I receive all of you, not because I agree with any of you upon every point of doctrine, but because we are all in the same Lord. We are joined to the same head. Fellowship stems from mutual sonship, brotherhood results from a common fatherhood.

The fellowship of the Spirit is not something that we extend or withdraw. It is something we share. Our task is not to grant it but to guard it in the bond of peace. Fellowship is a state entered by responding to the call of God. "God is faithful, by whom you were called into the fellowship of His Son, Jesus Christ" (1 Corinthians 1:9). Everyone who hears the call of God and answers it is in the fellowship, not by the grace of men, but by the grace of God. Fellowship is the atmosphere breathed by all of the children in the family of God. It is the invisible principle which joins every member in a working relationship. It is a gift to the church, and not a gift of it.

Fellowship in Christ is not contingent upon being right on every point of doctrine, for then there would be no fellowship to be shared by finite beings. It is not the result of each one being perfect, but of each being in the perfect One. One can be in Jesus and be mistaken about many things. God makes allowance for our frailties and shortcomings, which is what longsuffering means. One's views about instrumental music, Herald of Truth, Sunday School classes, individual cups, orphan homes, or Christian colleges, have no relation to fellowship unless he builds a sect around the pro and con of his position and demands that everyone see it as he does. To do this is to play God with other men's lives and thinking, and to become a factionalist, self-condemned and unworthy.

The things that have troubled us in our day are like the circumcision question which disturbed the saints in the yesterday of the church. The answer of the apostle was "God forbid that I should boast of anything but the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ through which the world is crucified to me and I to the world. Circumcision is nothing; uncircumcision is nothing; the only thing that counts is a new creation! Whoever they are who take this principle for their guide, peace and mercy be upon them, and upon the whole Israel of God" (Gal. 6:14-16).

I have taken this principle for my guide. I have accepted it without quibble! With me the only thing that counts is a new creation. I would no more fracture the body of the Son of God over cups, classes or colleges, than I would over circumcision. I will not separate myself from one of God's new creation because he holds an opinion or claims an experience different from my own. I will not drive from me one who testifies to having spoken in another tongue, whose life bears testimony that he is a new creation of God. So that you will not misunderstand what I am saying, let me be specific. Pat Boone is as much my brother as he ever was. Shirley Boone is as much my sister as she ever was. So far as I am concerned, when it comes to our relationship in Christ, tongues are nothing, and absence of tongues are nothing. The only thing that counts is a new creation. That is the principle I have accepted for my guide!

Since I have been crucified to the world, and the world to me, the cross of my Lord is everything. It is the sole ground of my glorying. The question with me is not “What do you think of tongues?” It is not, “What do you think of the Herald of Truth program?” It is not, “What do you think of dividing the assembly into classes?” The question with me is, “What do you think of Christ? Whose Son is he?” And I can receive all who receive Christ, regardless of what else they claim to receive, if it does not lead them to deny him.

I take very seriously the apostolic statement, “You, my friends, were called to be free men; only do not turn your freedom into licence for your lower nature, but be servants to one another in love. For the whole law can be summed up in a single commandment: ‘Love your neighbor as yourself.’ But if you go on fighting one another, tooth and nail, all you can expect is mutual destruction.”

I cannot forget that the same writer also said, “Let us then keep to this way of thinking, those of us who are mature. If there is any point on which you think differently, this also God will make plain to you. Only let our conduct be consistent with the level we have already reached” (Philippians 3:15, 16).

Again he wrote, “And may God, the source of all fortitude and all encouragement, grant that you may agree with one another after the manner of Christ Jesus, so that with one mind and one voice you may praise the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In a word, accept one another, as Christ accepted us, to the glory of God” (Romans 15:5-7).

I implore you to begin this very night to repair the breaches that have been made in the walls of Zion. If there is a brother present from whom you have stood aloof, and toward whom you have turned the cold shoulder, because he could not honestly concur with your views, go to him in humility and ask him to forgive you. Do not wait to see what the preachers will do. Do not wait to get the reaction of the church. Go to your brother! This means no change of conviction toward your position but simply a change of attitude toward a brother for whom Christ died.

If there is a family present, the members of which once sat at the table of the Lord with you, but who were driven forth because of misunderstanding or for conscience' sake, and you have been cold and indifferent, apathetic and unconcerned about them, let the precious Spirit of God drive you to them. Build a bridge of good-will and genuine love to span the chasm between your hearts.

We need no fanfare, no national unity conferences, no delegate conventions, to bring about the oneness for which Jesus prayed on that fateful night when tragedy stalked his steps like a grim shadow. All we need is to ignore the barriers we have created, batter down the party walls we have erected, humble the hearts that we have hardened, and God will send his blessing upon this city, and from you could go forth a tidal wave of brotherly love that can transform this universe and usher in a time of revival such as has never before been seen.

Let us recapture that spirit of fellowship by reaffirming the fellowship of the Spirit. Let us exalt Christ and make him the One, so that we can all be one in Christ. The price that we are paying for our division is a lost world. It is too great a price. The cost is too heavy! Jesus has said that the world will not be won to believe in Christ, until those who believe in Christ in the world are one. The greatest missionary power ever unleashed upon an unbelieving and perishing world will be the unity of the believers. If unity is to begin, then let it begin here. Let it begin now!

About Theology

Mission Messenger (March 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

I must confess that I am not too “sold” on what is commonly called theology, and I am not sure that you could run fast enough to enroll me in a course on “systematic theology.” I really doubt there is such a thing. But men in the seminaries all seem to have an acute case of the “ologies.” This probably stems from an attempt to ape the professional jargon of scholastics who learnedly discourse on such themes as embryology, biology, zoology, anthropology, and cosmology. It is assumed that, if the physical creation can be so segmented that the new creation should be subjected to the same kind of dissection. So we are treated to dissertations on Christology, ecclesiology, pneumatology, soteriology, eschatology, and a score of other categories, which are intended to exhaust the content of revelation and the vitality and strength of the unfortunate student. By the time he learns to spell them he has already flunked.

If you will pardon me for inserting another “ology,” I would like to suggest that, from the standpoint of etymology, I seriously question the use of such phraseology (oops! there it goes again!) as “a theology of atonement,” “a theology of preaching,” or “a theology of the Spirit.” I shall never forget an occasion when I was much younger, and much more gullible, than I am now. I had been invited to a small seminary to address the student body in a chapel service, and, as usual, a number of instructors “button-holed” me to come and speak to their classes.

A history professor informed me that his next class had a project going in which they were studying the origin and meaning of names and their possible relationship to behavioral patterns. He wanted me to address the group and I consented to do so. When the students were seated, he said, “I would like for you to get your notebooks and prepare to use them as I have asked Dr. Ketcherside to share with us some of his deep insights in the field of onomasiology.”

For just a minute I thought I had suffered a heart attack, and almost did a back-flip off the chair. To begin with, it was the first time anyone had ever mistaken me for a doctor in broad daylight, and in the second place, if “onomasiology” had sat up on his hind legs and barked in my face, I wouldn’t have known whether to pat him on the head or climb a tree. But it taught me one very valuable lesson. Before I agree to speak to any group when requested to do so by a professor, I always ask him to repeat the subject slowly, like a woman getting a prescription from the doctor for her husband. Professors are a lot like preachers. When they get a new word, they are like a kid with a new Shetland pony. They ride it to death the first Sunday.

Having digressed so far afield, let me return to my initial statement and tell you that my “theology” is a person, and not “a group of concepts and phenomena regarded as constituting a natural whole for purposes of philosophic or scientific investigation and construction.” In case you do not know it, that last is a definition for system. Theology, as a word, is a combination of theos, God; and logos, Word. And the Word of God is a person who was with God, and was God, a long time before this material universe was spoken into existence, and things you can see were made of things you cannot see.

You can describe a person, but you cannot systematize him. You cannot even systematize a son of God, of whom I have the honor to be one; much less “the only begotten Son of God.” And I think that one of the most thrilling descriptions of the Theos-Logos, the divine Theology, is furnished by the aged John, who was at the time an exile upon the lonely and deserted island called Patmos. The way we divide up the incomparable account of the Seer, we make the part to which I refer occur in what we designate Revelation 19:11-16.

“Then I saw heaven wide open, and there before me was a white horse; and its rider’s name was Faithful and True, for he is just in judgment and just in war. His eyes flamed like fire and on his head were many diadems. Written upon him was a name known to none but himself, and he was robed in a garment drenched in blood. He was called the Word of God, and the armies of heaven followed him on white horses, clothed in fine linen, clean and shining. From his mouth there went a sharp sword with which to smite the nations; for it is he who shall rule them with an iron rod, and tread the winepress of the wrath and retribution of God the sovereign Lord. And on his robe and on his leg there was written the name: ‘King of kings and Lord of lords.’”

John saw my theology riding a white horse! If theology is what gives meaning to life, he is the one who gives it. If theology is the basis of spiritual faith, he is that basis. I have a whole shelf of books containing lectures on systematic theology. I have read them with interest, and have been grateful for the fact that they have forced me to think. But now the fruit of my thinking is that Jesus is the whole of life and service to God. He is the fulness of Him who filleth all in all. He has been made unto me wisdom, and redemption and sanctification. He is rightfully called “the Word of God.” He is the Theos-Logos and he is my life, my hope, my peace! He is everything to me!

That brings me to the place I have been wanting to reach ever since I started this article. I’ve been doing a great deal of reading lately about the book of Revelation, and a lot of it has been in the writing of contemporary “theologians.” Some of these are pretty foggy about what happened in the case of John. As usual, there are a few of them who think John may not have written the book at all. They speculate that it might have been penned by an obscure author who wanted to secure greater readership by attaching John’s name to the treatise. This is a dodge of those who also want to gain recognition for their speculations.

Among those who credit the book to the apostle there is a great divergency of opinion as to whether John saw an unfolding panorama featuring the dramatic characters that he introduces, or whether he just dreamed up the whole thing and wrote it down in allegorical language. Some think the apocalyptic style represents a form of communication intelligible to the Christian underground, but concealed from the Romans, so that the writer could portray the eventual overthrow of the Empire and the triumph of the kingdom of light without the Romans’ knowing what he was talking about. On this supposition, a lot of the commentators must be Romans.

Perhaps I am a little too traditional, but my own views are quite prosaic. I think that the apostle, who had been living in Ephesus since the destruction of Jerusalem by the forces of Titus, had been sentenced to banishment by the emperor Domitian, and while he was on Patmos, God chose to reveal to him what was to be the outcome of the great struggle of the ages. There has always been a real conflict produced by the selfish ambition of men. Two philosophies have jostled one another for control ever since Satan began to pull the strings and to use the developing social and political institutions as his “flying wedge.” I suspect there may have been some reason for doubt in the mind of John as to which would outlast the other. It was a good time for God to reveal the outcome since he alone knows the end from the beginning.

THE REVELATION OF GOD

John wrote that the revelation originated with God who gave it to Jesus Christ for the specific purpose of showing his servants things which would begin to transpire in the not too distant future. He also said that an angel was sent to convey the revelation in the form of signs or symbols to himself, and that he faithfully recorded what he saw and heard. And he pronounced a blessing upon those who publicly read the account, upon those who stayed awake and paid close attention to the reading, and upon those who kept the things that were revealed.

In the first chapter he details for us what happened while he was in the Spirit on the Lord's Day, and then he conveys a special message to the messengers sent over to minister unto him by each of the seven congregations singled out in Asia Minor. But it is the fourth chapter where he starts to unfold the great drama of the universe. And he begins, as did Isaiah and Ezekiel, with a view of the majestic throne room of heaven.

“After this I looked, and there before my eyes was a door opened in heaven; and the voice that I had at first heard speaking to me like a trumpet said, ‘Come up here, and I will show you what must happen hereafter!’ At once I was caught up by the Spirit.”

A door in prophecy symbolizes opportunity. When it is open it is an opportunity present, or at hand; when it is closed it is an opportunity past or forfeited. Heaven contains the secret of the future of our world. Ordinarily it is not divulged to mankind. “The secret things belong unto the Lord our God, but the things which are revealed belong unto us and our children forever.” Even to the apostles it was said, “It is not for you to know the times and seasons which the Father has placed under his own control.”

But when a door is opened in heaven, a prophet is permitted to glance into the future so that he can reveal to us what will happen hereafter. Prophecy is a record of events before they occur; history is an account of those events after they occur. Such distinctions are made for our benefit. With God there is no difference. He calls the things that be not as though they were.

John saw a throne in heaven. A throne symbolizes authority or rule, but this throne was different. Being in heaven, it was the source of all power, for “All power is of God. The powers that be are ordained of God.” Here was universal dominion, authority in the absolute, grounded in the nature and character of the personal Creator of the entire universe. It was not raw power, but power clothed in the goodness, mercy and justice of the Eternal One, who was, and is, and is to be!

The description of the One who sat upon the throne was borrowed from the precious gems of nature. His appearance was like the scintillating gleam of jasper and the light flashes of cornelian. This is a verbal attempt to paint the glory of Deity in a language which finite creatures can understand. Arched above and around the throne was a rainbow, bright as an emerald, a symbol of God’s faithfulness to his covenant promises from the day when he set his bow in the sky, after the catastrophe of the deluge.

In a circle about the throne were twenty-four other thrones, on which sat as many ancients robed in white, and wearing crowns of gold. Inside of this circle and immediately around the throne were the four living creatures. Isaiah identified them as the seraphim. Ezekiel called them cherubim. They were covered with eyes, in front and behind. This is but another way of saying that they were omniscient, or all-seeing. The first was like a lion (strength), the second like an ox (humility), the third like a man (intelligence), the fourth like an eagle in flight (swiftness and exaltation). These are the qualities befitting the celestial messengers of God.

The living creatures sang before the throne day and night without a pause. Their song was an unvarying ascription of praise. "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." John said they gave glory, honor and thanks to the One who sat upon the throne. As often as they did so the twenty-four ancients left their thrones, fell prostrate before the great throne and laid their crowns before it, and cried out, "Thou art worthy, O Lord our God, to receive glory and honor and power, because thou didst create all things; by thy will they were created and have their being!"

Another thing caught the attention of John. He saw in the right hand of the One who sat upon the throne a scroll. It was written within and without, and it was sealed with seven seals. Subsequent study will reveal that this scroll contained the history or destiny of the world as well as that of the kingdom on earth. It was written on both sides, and thus was complete. There was no room for new material to be added. God held the whole world in his hand. The history was so written that, as each seal was broken, another era would be ushered in. The future is sealed until the providence of God releases it. The number seven represents completeness. When applied to time it signifies its fulness.

As John looked, he heard a mighty angel asking in a loud voice, "Who is worthy to open the scroll and to break its seals?" The prophet was anxious for he could not know the ultimate destiny of God's people so long as the seals were intact. But no one could be found in heaven or on earth or in the nether regions who was able to open the scroll and peer inside it and reveal its contents. In his disappointment and frustration, John burst into tears. He was the last survivor of the little group whom Jesus had called about Him, and he desperately wanted to know what the future held for the kingdom.

One of the ancients interrupted his crying, with the words, "Do not weep; for the Lion from the tribe of Judah, the Root of David, has won the right to open the scroll and break its seven seals.” The aged apostle looked up through the shimmer of his tears to see the Lion. He was treated to an awe-inspiring sight, but there was no Lion visible. Inside the circle of the four seraphim and the circle of the worshipful ancients, there stood a Lamb. The marks of slaughter were still upon him. It was evident that the Lamb had been killed and now was alive again.

The Lamb went forward and took the scroll from the hand of the One who sat upon the throne. When he had done this, all of the celestial beings threw themselves down before him. They burst into a new song, a hymn of adoration never before sung in the history of the universe. “Thou art worthy to take the scroll and to break its seals, for thou wast slain and by thy blood didst purchase for God men of every tribe and language, people and nation; thou hast made them a royal house, to serve our God as priests; and they shall reign upon earth.”

Then John heard the voices of countless angels. They completely surrounded the throne and the living creatures and the ancients. There were myriads upon myriads, thousands upon thousands, and all of them were singing praise to the Lamb. Suddenly the song was joined by every created thing in heaven and on earth and in the subterranean regions and even in the sea. All that was in them cried out joyously, “Praise and honor, glory and might, to him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb forever and ever!” The seraphim said “Amen.” And the ancients fell down and worshiped. And the Lamb prepared to break the seals.

PUTTING IT ALL TOGETHER

If you don't mind I would like to tell you how this whole bit affects me right here in what we call 1972. I do not think of it as related merely to a far-away place in a far-off time. I am involved in it. As a matter-of-fact, although he did not recognize me, John saw me a time or two. I was in the vast throng, which no one could count, from every nation, of all tribes, peoples and languages, standing in front of the throne and before the Lamb. You can read about me and the rest of them in Revelation 7:9, the way we have it divided up. Perhaps you were in the crowd also. If not, it isn't too late to make your reservation even now, because the "time machine" was running in reverse, the day John tuned it in to catch the universal victory celebration. I hope that you "get with it," because if you miss it, you will have missed everything! And I do mean everything!

Here is the way I view the matter. It is always a thrilling occasion when a transfer of authority takes place. That is true even in a republic such as the United States of America. I have watched the pageantry which celebrates the accession to office of several of our presidents. Some features about it almost make "goose-pimples" come out on your flesh. Even more splendor is manifested in the pomp and ceremony which accompanies investiture in a monarchy. I can only faintly imagine the feelings in the heart of the aged Galilean ex-fisherman, who was allowed to look into heaven and view the single, most important event ever to transpire in the celestial courts as related to the earthly creatures made in the image of the Creator.

1. There was only one person in the entire universe to whom the Creator could surrender the destiny of the cosmos. There are three spheres inhabited by intelligent beings—heaven, earth, and the nether regions. No being from beyond the skies, no being from the teeming millions inhabiting this globe, no being from the subterranean vaults, could qualify to receive the scroll and remove the seals one by one. If it had been left up to the intellectual prowess of created beings, celestial or terrestrial, our future would have been shrouded in darkness and oblivion would have been our fate.

2. The Lamb of God "won the right to open the scroll and break its seven seals." This is the testimony of one of the ancients of heaven. The destiny of mankind and the fate of the earth depended upon his willingness to empty himself of the glory of the divine and take upon himself the form of a slave. He identified with men in the life struggle and in the death struggle. In the first he overcame temptation, and in the second he overcame the bondage which was the result of the venomous sting of sin. He burst the gates of the unseen wide open!

That is why the ancients, each holding a harp and a golden bowl filled with incense, the prayers of the people of God, sang a grand new song, composed for the occasion. "Thou art worthy to take the scroll and to break its seals, for thou wast slain and by thy blood didst purchase for God men of every tribe and language and people and nation." The Lamb willingly laid down his life and won the right to rule by a blood-bought purchase of such transcendent significance that the world can hardly comprehend it even yet.

3. The Lamb is identified with the Lion of Judah and the Root of David. This is a tremendously important fact. Even though he came from heaven and was with God and was God, when he came to earth he came into the historical stream of human existence, a stream which began to flow with Adam, the created son of God. That stream was often polluted. It was corrupted even by Judah and David, but he who plunged into it was never a partaker of the corruption. He just paid the price for the corruption of men.

The Lamb was the subject of the prophets who had gone before. He did not come to earth as a kind of after-thought of God. His coming had been foretold and the earthly lineage selected. As the Lion of Judah he was destined to prevail, as the Root of David he was the assurance that the promises of God would not fail, but even out of the dry ground could be resurrected a branch or shoot that would live and bear fruit.

4. The Lamb is also identified with the man on the white horse about whom we wrote earlier in this little treatise. But there is one great difference. The Lamb with the marks of slaughter was beginning the period which would result in the triumph of righteousness, while the One on the horse, followed by the armies of heaven, was preparing to close it, having established the rule of heaven. The final great conflict was in the immediate offing and there was no question about the result. Victory was assured. The beast and the false prophet, the leaders of the opposition through the ages, were to be taken prisoner and cast into the lake of fire with its sulphurous flames.

5. Never was there a more solemn moment in time than when the Lamb stepped forward and received the scroll of destiny from the right hand of the One who sat upon the throne. When he did this he held the future of the universe in his grasp. From the hand of the Creator into the hand of his Anointed was given over the right to rule and govern the destiny of the creation. The Lamb of God has not relinquished it until this day. He must retain it until he has abolished every kind of power.

I have surrendered to him fully, completely and unconditionally. I belong to him without reservation. It is my firm conviction that he alone can bring order out of that chaos into which men have plunged the world by reason of sin and transgression. I intend to give my allegiance to no other. I will not be the spiritual or moral subject of any other ruler. I will not be the vassal of any other lord. Because I belong to him I shall seek to love all men as he loved them. I will not be regulated, limited or controlled in my exercise of affection by any group, party or sect. I will not bargain with love as a commodity that can be bought or sold, and I will never compromise with any group which demands that I cease to love others in order to be loved by them.

I expect to see him who purchased me with his blood. I will look upon his face. My deliverer will come from heaven, and transform this body belonging to my present humble state. He will give it a form like that of his own resplendent body, and he will do it by the very power which enables him to make all things subject unto himself. I know that I am a child of God here and now. What I shall be has not yet been disclosed, but I know that when it is disclosed I shall be like him, for I shall see him as he is!

None of this has happened to me because I deserved it, or was worthy of it. I was not so good that God simply had to adopt me. It was quite the reverse. There wasn't really anything that would commend me to him as holding forth any real promise. That is why the whole thing is a matter of grace, and not just a matter of my own works or accomplishment. I just came to trust in Jesus because there wasn't anything in my own life in which I could trust at all. I am glad that it was so, because that precludes any pride or boasting. I do not have to match my life to that of anyone else. I do not need to compare notes on relative attainments.

And this makes it much easier for me to accept others as they are when they come to rely on Jesus as their only hope. I can do it because that is the way God accepted me. All I had going for me was just my faith that somehow Jesus would straighten things out if I allowed him to take command. It was apparent that my compass was askew and my rudder was bent. I was not steering a very straight course, for all my bragging about my knowledge, which I now know was very feeble indeed. What a thrill it is to know that it is not what one knows but who one knows that makes the difference.

Jesus is the center and circumference of the whole realm of saving grace. He is the center and to him all must be attracted and drawn by the magnetic force of the dynamic of love. He is the center and from him all truth radiates forth. And what does not come from him has no validity with reference to my salvation. But he is also the circumference, holding us close to God and shielding us from a world of sin and strife.

We make a mistake when we try to gather Jesus in and box him up and build a fence around him. In our vain struggle to keep him only for self we lose him. We need to belong only to Jesus, but we err when we think this means that Jesus must belong only to us. There is room in Jesus! He is not narrow, sectional or partisan. There is room for those who are black and those who are white. There is room for Jew and Greek. There is room for employer and employee. There is room for those who are rich and for those who are poor.

But there is no room for pride! I dare not be proud that I am white, nor another proud that he is black. In Christ one cannot be proud that he is a Jew, nor can another be proud that he is not. Whatever we were by natural birth must be buried in the grave of baptism. He who comes forth from it comes forth in newness of life. That which he once trusted he no longer trusts. That which he formerly bragged about is now to be flung in the garbage can of life. To build solely upon Jesus is to admit that all else is worthless as a basis of hope.

I am a follower of the Lamb! He rules the universe! He took the scroll of destiny and when the final seal is opened, he will be King of kings and Lord of lords, and the whole creation will know it. I know it now! And I am thankful that my hope is built on nothing less than Jesus' blood and righteousness. He is Peace! He is Joy! He is Truth! He is Life! He is where it all is, and when I am with him I am where it all is! It is just that simple and there's nothing about it hard to understand! "For we know that he who raised the Lord Jesus to life, will with Jesus raise us too, and bring us to his presence, and you with us."

A Faith for the Future

Mission Messenger (March 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

A speech delivered at the Green Valley Church of Christ in San Jose, California, as one of the Roy B. Shaw Memorial Lectures (October 20-22, 1971).

From time to time I am called various names, and accused of various things, by some of my good brethren. In recent years, and especially in recent months, the chorus has dwindled, and both the words and the tune have changed. I have outlived some of my detractors, and outloved the rest of them, and the remaining few who would like to give the impression that they are hard-boiled often give the impression that they are merely half-baked. I have weathered the storm and I am in calmer waters. It is apparent that the hurricane is over and the “big blow” has subsided.

This does not mean that no one ever lobs a shot across my bow. There are always those whose alarm did not go off, and who come in late, and want to reverse the projector and run the battle scenes past again, but by and large, the brethren who want to snipe at me from the safety of the scrub-oaks in these days, fire only rubber bullets. These frequently bounce back and cripple them while doing no particular injury to me.

Unlike the past, the two principal charges filed against me now are that I am an enthusiast and an optimist. I cheerfully plead guilty to both allegations and feel sorry for the “allegators.” In spite of the fact that my life is quite complex, and that I am constantly speaking to a variety of audiences on a variety of things, I am accused of harping on one string. One editor recently informed his readers, “Carl has been on this unity binge for years, and he goes at it with such gusto, that he almost makes you believe that his campaign is going to succeed even when you know that it is impossible. The man is an energetic and uncontrollable enthusiast.”

That is about the first time in my life that one of my opponents has bombarded me with cream puffs, and I sort of like their flavor. The word enthusiast means “indwelt by God,” and that is why the plea for unity is going to succeed. It is the will of God that his children be one. It is the work of the Spirit, and the unity for which we plead is the unity of the Spirit. One who labors for unity among the saints is working with God. One who opposes unity among the saints is working against God. The unity we seek will come to pass, and is even now coming to pass, because of the divine infusion which can bring order from the chaos of human confusion. Indeed I am as enthusiastic about it as was my Savior when he prayed for it, and as his apostles who proclaimed it.

There is no sin involved in being an optimist. The word optimism describes the philosophy or belief that good ultimately triumphs over evil. In a more practical sense an optimist is one who sees a doughnut, while a pessimist is one who sees only the hole in it. One smells the fragrance of the rose while the other laments the sharpness of the thorns. Of course one can be an optimist without rational grounds, in which case he becomes a mere visionary, following signs which are not there, and filling up his cup with imagination to make up for the lack of reality.

I feel confident that we are standing at the threshold of one of the greatest breakthroughs in our history as a people. It seems to me that another “fulness of the times” is upon us. The day is here when the people of God should enlarge the place of their tent, and stretch forth the curtains of their habitations. "Spare not, lengthen the cords, and strengthen the stakes, for you shall break forth on the right hand, and on the left." We are going to see fellowship exhibited and brotherhood uninhibited by dogmatism and unwritten creeds. Upon what grounds do we dare base such a prediction?

1. All of us are coming to realize that unity in Christ is not something to be achieved, but simply something to be received. It is not just a goal of men, but a gift of God. It is not something for which we agonize, but something that we recognize. It is to be claimed rather than attained. It is a creation of the Holy Spirit, and it has really been here all of the time.

By one Spirit we are all baptized into one body. We all drink of the same Spirit. We walk in the same Spirit. We live by the same Spirit. We are sealed by the same Spirit. We are actually and evidently one in the Spirit. It is not that we ought to be one, or should be one, or we hope to be one. We are one! If we are in the Spirit and the Spirit is in us, we are one. We are one right now! We are one right here!

The word of God regards the oneness of the body as a fact. "For as the body is one, and hath many members, and all the members of that one body being many, are one body: so also is Christ" Not "so also is the church," but so also is Christ. It is Christ who is a single body. It is in Christ we are one, regardless of national, social or sexual distinctives. "There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female, for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Ye are, not ought to be; ye are all, not just part of you; ye are all one, not fragmented. Ye are all one in Christ Jesus! Praise His name!

We do not have a problem with this in the human body. But the record says, "For just as in a single human body there are many limbs and organs, all with different functions, so all of us, united with Christ, form one body, serving individually as limbs and organs to one another.” Notice that “as” and “so.” “As in a single human body . . . so all of us, united with Christ.” My eyes do not have any trouble remaining in fellowship with one another. My arms do not fall out with my feet, because my toes are not as long as my fingers. My body is a perfect example of unity in diversity. No one comes up to me and says, “I understand that one of your ears is having trouble with the other organs and is thinking of dropping off and starting another body.”

If that is the way the “as” is, that is the way the “so” should be. Let us quit thinking about how we can get together in the United States, and start to remember that we are together in Christ. If the Spirit has brought us together in one body, let us start right now to enjoy it. We are coming to realize that oneness is a fact and that encourages me to say that our problems will be put in proper perspective. They will not be problems of fellowship, but problems in the fellowship. We can then attack our problems rather than one another. We have no more right to fight in Jesus as clans of “Antis” and “Pros,” than we would as tribes of the Crees and the Crows.

2. I am optimistic because there is a growing recognition that harmony is not a pre-requisite to fellowship, but fellowship creates the atmosphere in which to labor toward harmony. Not one command to live in harmony, or to be of one mind, was ever given to bring men into the fellowship, but every such command was given to those who were already in the fellowship, and because they were in it.

In Philippians 2:2, 3, Paul writes, “Fill up my cup of happiness by thinking and feeling alike, with the same love for one another, the same turn of mind, and a common care for unity. Rivalry and personal vanity should have no place among you, but you should humbly reckon others better than yourselves.” On what grounds did Paul urge this? The preceding verse shows that it was predicated upon the consolation in Christ, the comfort of love, and the fellowship of the Spirit.

We do not come to agreement in order to be in fellowship. Growing agreement is a fruit of fellowship, and not the seed from which it germinates. We start with fellowship and work toward agreement. One of the best known exhortations with reference to schism is found in Paul's treatment of the situation at Corinth, as reported to him by Chloe. He wrote, "I appeal to you, my brothers, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ: agree among yourselves and avoid divisions; be firmly joined in unity of mind and thought."

But note that the preceding verse declares that "God is faithful, by whom you were called into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ." Even in their schismatic state and in spite of their party cries, Paul calls them all his brothers, and says they were in the fellowship. There is no congregation represented here that has as many serious things wrong with it as did the one at Corinth. Even with all of our tragic divisions we do not approach the state of ills which characterized that congregation.

In the matter of divisiveness, they were fractured and fragmented. In regard to practice they could not even eat the Lord's Supper. In reference to doctrine they had some who clung to the idea that idols might be real and still ate food "with a sense of its heathen consecration." Others in the congregation said there was no resurrection of the dead. Some were entering civil suits against their brethren in pagan courts. Others were confused about their marital status, and they were intolerant and dogmatic toward one another. Their public gatherings were turned into disorder by those who possessed the gift of tongues, and Paul wrote, "I fear that when I come I may perhaps find you different from what I wish you to be, and that you may find me also different from what you wish. I fear I may find quarrelling and jealousy, angry tempers and personal rivalries, backbiting and gossip, arrogance and general disorder."

If ever there was an occasion to give an apostolic example or pattern for declaring fellowship to be ended, the situation at Corinth was unparalleled. Did Paul “withdraw fellowship” from them as our trigger-happy brethren so naively designate their action? Did he recommend that the “loyal brethren” come out and start a “faithful church” in town? Did he propose that the ones who spoke in tongues start a “house church” of their own, or that the anti-tongue speaking segment go to themselves? Will our brethren today who are so “high” on an apostolic example follow that of Paul? Do they dare take his attitude? Do they dare accept his leading in their lives?

He repeatedly referred to the congregation as “the church of God which is at Corinth.” He said the members were sanctified in the Lord Jesus and were called saints. He referred to all of the partisans as his brothers. There is only one chapter in the sixteen which compose the First Corinthian letter where the words “brother” or “brethren” do not occur, and that is the thirteenth, the wonderful chapter on love. In those chapters dealing with special problems, Paul uses the word “brethren” over and over again. And he never applies it to the members of any faction as such, but always to the whole body of believers.

He calls the congregation at Corinth God’s garden, God’s building, and God’s temple. He declared that the Spirit of God dwelt in them, and said “You belong to Christ and Christ to God.” He acknowledged that they were in the fellowship with the Lord Jesus, and said that he had begotten them in Christ Jesus through the gospel. In some things he could commend them, and in others he could not, but not once did he threaten to wipe them off the slate. His very last words to this sadly mixed-up group of saints were these: “The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all. Amen.”

Instead of telling younger preachers to stay away from Corinth for fear they would be branded, Paul sent Timothy and Titus to visit them, and tried to persuade Apollos to do so, although without success. Instead of hiding in the closet when brethren from Corinth were in town, Paul wrote, "It is a great pleasure to me that Stephanas, Fortunatus and Achaicus have arrived, because they have done what you had no chance to do; they have relieved my mind—and no doubt yours too." Instead of by-passing them and boycotting them because of their condition, Paul said, "I shall come to Corinth after passing through Macedonia . . . and I may stay with you, perhaps even for the whole winter . . . I do not want this to be a flying visit; I hope to spend some time with you if the Lord permits."

Instead of warning other brethren at a distance to have no involvement with Corinth until they lined out and straightened up, he wrote, "Many greetings in the Lord from Acquila and Priscilla and the congregation in their house. Greetings from all the brothers." Instead of writing a form letter to all of the churches in Asia warning them to have nothing to do with Corinth, he wrote a letter to Corinth in which he said, "Greetings from all of the congregations in Asia."

In view of all this, our absurd, asinine, crazy-quilt pattern of schism and division stands as a glaring indictment against us at the bar of God's justice today. Imagine the blatant inconsistency involved in arguing that we have come to our present state by following apostolic authority or precedent. When we consider the love and forbearance manifested toward Corinth, our own course of procedure should cause us to be ashamed to live and afraid to die. To fragment the body of God's Son over such trivia as instrumental music, cups, classes and colleges, is a sin against God, a reflection upon the revelation, and a tragedy of the deepest dye, when considered in the light of sacred scripture.

At last the utter folly of a course which sacrifices brotherhood upon the blood-drenched altar of partisan fanaticism is being seen and felt. If Paul could love and labor at Corinth, we can receive and welcome any congregation represented here tonight. We need not stab and hack the body to death in a senseless attempt to cure its ills. Regardless of mistaken views and fallacious opinions, division only adds to the sin. It settles nothing, but compounds the confusion, intensifies the hostility, crystallizes the sectarian spirit, and postpones indefinitely the answer to the prayer of Jesus.

3. I am optimistic because we have reared a new generation, better educated, spiritually-oriented, and dedicated to the Lord of life as opposed to the cult of conformity. Our young men and women have been taught to think for themselves and they are going to do it. Our partisan attitudes and factional alliances cannot survive the glare of the searchlight of truth when directed against them. The party spirit is perpetuated by ignorance and arrogance, and these thrive in the dark, propagated by political maneuvering and watered by human ambition.

The day of the simplistic, ready-made, home-cooked answer is fading away. Men no longer accept without swallowing the pompous pronouncements of popes, preachers or presbyters, as authoritative. Not even editors will be able in the future to regiment thought, and keep men goose-stepping to commands issued through paper trumpets. A new age has dawned, and we will no longer be throttled by skeletal hands reaching forth from the grave to hold us in slavery to tradition. We will put our hand in the hand of him who stilled the storm and quieted the waters. All sectarianism is in trouble from the very minute that Jesus becomes the center of the spiritual universe and the church ceases to be.

We must face up to the fact that real revolutions often begin outside the existing structures, although led by those who are within them. This was true of the reformation led by Martin Luther. It was also true of the restoration attempt sparked by Thomas and Alexander Campbell. Neither of these had any idea of creating another institutional structure. But the institutions known as the Roman Catholic, the Presbyterian and Baptist Churches, were rigid and inflexible. They could not absorb and contain a reformation. Instead, they branded the reformers as heretics and drove them forth.

Now we are faced with a new attempt at reform. If we prove adamant in the maintenance of our status quo, assuming that “we are the people, and wisdom will die with us,” if we hate those who are our critics and regard as heretics those who would share new insights, we will hasten our doom. Based on history, this is what many assume will happen. But it need not be so. If we maintain an open-end approach to cultural changes, rather than a closed-end creedal approach, we will not only survive, but will become stronger for it.

There are some things that are unchangeable. Upon these there can be no hint of compromise and no surrender. They are foundational and elemental. They give us our very basis of existence. To retract any of these is to begin the process of slow suicide. There is not one fact of the divine breakthrough of God in history upon which I will weaken. I will defend any of these with my life. But to confuse these with modes and methods of their dissemination, or with structures and organizations devised for their implementation in a given era or culture, is as absurd as to assume that I must keep my appointments by riding on a donkey because this was the mode of transportation employed by the primitive saints.

On the state university campus, in religious seminars with perceptive students, the question I am most often asked is, “Do you think that the institutional church will survive the twentieth century?” This is a welcome change because less than a decade ago, the question was, “Do you think the Christian concept will survive?” An analysis of the difference in these questions is indicative of the profound change occurring in youthful lives all over the world.

I know the family of God, the community of heaven, will survive. I feel sure that it will survive in a tangible, visible and definable form. The church as we know it will make many changes. Some of these will be good. Others will not. As always, the church will affect the culture, but the culture will also affect the church, for the simple reason that the church is people, and it is always people in the current culture. The church today is not like the church of my childhood, and it is not like the church in the days of Thomas Campbell, Martin Luther, Gregory the Great, or Tertullian. It is the same church, just as I am the same person, but neither of us is like what we were in an earlier and younger age.

This does not disturb me because I do not think of the divine-human relationship as a lake formed by damming God's grace up in a particular time or place. Rather, I conceive of it as a stream flowing through history. Sometimes it becomes a rushing torrent, sometimes a series of wildly-tossing rapids, but at other times it enters a calm, serene and placid stretch. What it becomes at a given time depends, not upon the nature of the stream, but upon the nature of the culture through which it flows.

A stream moving relentlessly toward its distant destiny with the sea, alters the terrain through which it flows, but in doing so it is also tinged and colored by that terrain. And just as a stream flowing through the prairies and plains may be different than one flowing down a mountain flume, so the divine-human relationship as manifested in the fourth century lives may be different than it is in twentieth century lives. It is also true that it may be different in an emerging African nation than it is in California in the same century.

The object of faith is fixed, immovable and unchangeable. The goal of faith is unswerving and unalterable. It is bounded on each side by resurrection. It begins with His resurrection and culminates with ours. It begins with Jesus returning to share the glory of the Father and ends with ourselves being caught up to share in the glory of both. But faith is not static. It is dynamic. It is shared by each of us where we are and as we are. It is the heritage of free men. And they must be left free— free to serve one another in love!

We hear a great deal about “the system of faith,” and there is nothing wrong with the expression unless we mean something wrong by it. But we live in a day of systematized existence where everything is programmed and computerized, and there is a danger that we will think that faith makes of us a row of grinning Kewpie dolls on a souvenir counter, a congregation of plaster saints, or a collection of holy puppets, waiting for someone to jerk the string so we can put on our prepared performance.

If we are to fulfill God’s purpose and answer the prayer of Jesus for oneness, we must examine anew and in depth Romans 15:5-7. Listen to it carefully! “And may God, the source of all fortitude and encouragement, grant that you may agree with one another after the manner of Christ Jesus, so that with one mind and one voice you may praise the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In a word, accept one another as Christ accepted us to the glory of God.”

To agree with one another after the manner of Christ Jesus is not to arrive at a state of bland conformity or blind surrender to circumstances. It is defined as “accepting one another as Christ accepted us.” How did Jesus accept us? He took us in with our imperfections, deficiencies and flaws. He knew that we had faults and weaknesses, but his love covered our trembling hearts like the folds of a warm blanket.

That is the way we must accept one another. I dare not stand upon some fancied height and demand that you reach the same level. Jesus stooped down so that we could be one with him. I cannot wait until you have arrived at a plane of excellence arbitrarily subscribed by a self-righteous sect, for to do this will be to write my own death warrant and seal my own doom. If I measure your attainments by my own as a condition of fellowship, Jesus will measure my life by his as a condition of his receiving me. I will be judged with the same standard by which I judge others. I am, in fact, writing my own ticket.

Can I, like the haughty Pharisee of yesterday, draw the robes of my own goodness tightly around my form, lest I soil them by contact with another? Shall I stand in a prominent place and recount my goodness and thank God that I am not like other men? Do I dare enshrine my behavior as the criterion by which all others are to be measured in their daily walks? I confess that I can only be saved by grace. I have no merits of my own to claim. Nothing in my hand I bring.

It is for this reason that I accept all who have come to trust in the righteousness of Jesus Christ. If I could wish that they were stronger and better I could wish the same thing about myself. If I would have them grow in grace and knowledge of the truth, I would have myself do the same. I am thankful that God did not remain aloof from me until I was worthy. I am glad that Jesus came to find shelter under my unworthy roof as he did that of the centurion in the days of yore. And I propose to sit down with all of my brethren wherever I find them.

I shall not stand outside and make demands. I shall enter in with them and sup with them, as he entered into my heart to sup with me when I opened the door for him. When I accepted Jesus I accepted all whom he had accepted, and I accepted them on the same basis that he accepted them. I have no other formula, no special creed of my own. I praise Him for taking the first step to bring me into the fellowship of the Father. I thank Him for leaving heaven to look for me. And I shall take the first step to enter into the fellowship with all of the precious saints. I will leave my own little heaven to look for my brothers!

Great days lie ahead! A golden tomorrow awaits us. The family ties will again bind our hearts. Love will triumph over hatred. Sweetness will reign where bitterness brought tears of remorse and regret. The righteousness of God will flow through the tunnels of our hearts like a cleansing stream, washing away the hostility and blackness of despair. Lift up your heads! Lift up your hearts! Lift up your hands! Praise Him from whom all blessings flow! The redeemed are returning from the slavery of sectarianism. Hope gleams like the sunrise of a new day. God reigns, and all is well!

What Is Christendom?

[Abstract]

“We should have a great many fewer disputes in the world if words were taken for what they are, the signs of our ideas only, and not for things themselves.” Ever since I first read this statement by John Locke in “An Essay Concerning Human Understanding,” written in 1690, it has affected my consciousness of the relationship of words to the ideas which they were invented to express or convey. I am not sure that I am even yet fully aware of how many disputes have arisen through confusion of our symbols with reality, for their name is surely Legion. But I do know that I have become a student of words as well as of thought, and that is good.

And this reminds me of a rather philosophic observation by Tryon Edwards, who said, “Words are both better and worse than thoughts; they express them and add to them; they give them power for good or evil; they start them on an endless flight, for instruction and comfort and blessing, or for injury and sorrow and ruin.” Lord Bacon wrote, “Men suppose their reason has command over their words; still it happens that words in turn exercise authority on reason.”

I have been pondering over a certain word in recent months. In those moments of deep reflection when I am driving along the highway by myself it keeps slipping back into my mental slot clamoring for attention. When I awaken at night and begin to meditate it sneaks out of the dark and demands my notice. It is evident that I will not be satisfied until I write about it, and I may not be too happy after I do so. Some of my readers, as usual, will protest that they cannot understand what I am saying, some will not be able to grasp the reason for the compulsion or motivation that drives me to write, and a good many more will simply shrug it off, or say, "Well, so what?"

Brainstorms are like other storms. Some are frightened by them and take cover, others admire the thunder and lightning which accompany them, and still others sleep through them, wholly unaware that anything has happened until another draws it to their attention. Thoughts are children of the mind. They are conceived first and then delivered. Like fleshly offspring those of others never impress us like our own, unless they are sufficiently like them that we cannot disparage one without reflecting against the other. Then we give them grudging commendation while emphasizing minor points of difference in our favor.

With this rambling introduction out of the way, I can now tell you that the word to which I want to attend is Christendom. I think there has never been a word invented to describe a more nebulous or confusing state of affairs, if we grant that it is a state. I am not certain that anyone knows what it embraces, although I am quite sure that those who toss it off their tongues most glibly, do not. Obviously it is not a creation of God, although it seeks to hide under the cloak of divine grace and tries to pass itself off as being in her favor. But eternal life, the great gift, was proffered when God became man, while the existence of Christendom resulted from man seeking to become God.

As is always the case when a prince and a pauper exchange places, and one gets in the room of the other, the prince suffers most, while the pauper demonstrates his unworthiness for palace life. And in this instance the prince who has been crowded out is the true offspring of the king, while the parentage or origin of the usurper is not easily determinable. Unfortunately, those who never knew the prince pay homage to the pauper and perpetuate his reign under the mistaken notion and delusion that they thereby perpetuate the purpose of the kingdom.

There is a distinction between the faith once delivered and what is called Christendom. The first was the creation of God's revelation. The second is the result of evolution in human thought and action. Christendom was fashioned by the wisdom of this passing age, by the philosophy of men. This is not at all to say that it was deliberately planned or plotted. Rather, it is the natural result accruing from the strivings of men who often sought positions of prominence or prestige, and just as often regarded themselves as defenders of the truth of heaven.

Christendom is the counterfeit medium of exchange in the spiritual marketplace, which came to be current when men ceased to demand the gold tried in the fire. It is a forgery imposed upon the gullible when their eyes were blinded and they could not see afar off. In the dim and distant past it first received its impetus when men ceased to try and imitate the life of Jesus on earth and began to speculate about the nature of deity in heaven.

GNOSTICISM AND PAGANISM

The apostles had not yet all met death when the Gnostics infiltrated the community of the reconciled ones and divided the saints into two groups, "the common herd," who would never be able to grasp the deep things of God, and "the knowing ones," who could understand all mysteries and all knowledge. They were the intellectual offspring resulting from the forced marriage of the Faith to the metaphysics of Greece, and they could not accept the idea that "salvation is of the Jews." They first divided men in the fellowship into those doomed to remain in the kindergarten and always walk by faith, and the more fortunate who need not abide within the doctrine but could go beyond and live on the plane of knowledge, superior and unassailable. And this split them off and separated them from one another, and open cleavage resulted.

Fortunately, however, the pagan empire still existed, and in its jealousy for gods which were no longer worshipped, it lashed out in insensate fury at all who revered but one God. The followers of Jesus were thus branded as atheists, a term as opprobrious to polytheists as it is objectionable to monotheists. It is possible that if the emperors had not been exalted to the status of gods, persecution might not have arisen at all. But, since they were elevated to a place in the pantheon, to affirm that there was but one Lord, was to deny that Caesar was a lord. And to question this was probably a graver offense than to suggest that the summit of Olympus was uninhabited.

In any event, persecution came and spread over the empire, which was the world of that age. Polycarp died in Asia. Justin Martyr died in Rome. Irenaeus died in Gaul. And, without knowing it, paganism saved that which it was determined to destroy. Persecution did what it always does. It separated the grain from the chaff and made faith real. In time of dire distress, philosophic speculations hold no comfort and men find refuge in the Rock of Ages, and glory in the cross. As Justin pointed out, the blood of the martyrs became the seed of the kingdom, and Tertullian in his Book of Apology Against the Heathen, could say that Christians were everywhere. "Men say that the State is beset by them, that Christians are in their fields, their fortresses, their islands. They murmur that each sex, each age, every consideration and every rank is going over to the sect."

No doubt it would come as a surprise to Domitian, Trajan, or Marcus Aurelius to learn that they were instruments used to purify and thus to perpetuate the faith which they despised, but a great many surprises always await those who fancy that they are gods. It would be a thrill to report that the fervor which was warmed and watered by the blood of the martyrs continued unabated, and that the followers of the Lamb found the way to keep their lives unsullied and their ranks unbroken. But it did not work out that way!

Motivated by a desire to meet philosophy upon its own ground, and frightened by what might happen if they could not, the believers decided to found a seminary in which young and brilliant minds could be grounded in the faith. I think it was inevitable that, with such a motive, Alexandria would be selected as the site of the first “Christian college” in the world. The city itself had long been called “the great university,” since it was the center for learning for the earth, and possessed all of those traits and characteristics which distinguish a university from a mere college or school. It was a center of urbanity and of intellectual processing.

It was here that Philo, born about the time that Jesus entered the world, had sought to prove that philosophy was a vehicle in which the Greeks rode toward heaven as revelation was a vehicle in which the Spirit came down from heaven, and that where they met on the way, they stood on the same level and were together. His chosen approach was to reconcile Plato and Zeno with Moses and Solomon, thus equating the wisest and the most practical advocates from both the realm of Judaism and paganism. Too, it was this city where the most notable forms of Gnosticism had their origin, and it was deemed appropriate to assault the bastions of culture from close at hand.

It was about 180 A.D. when the Catechetical School was started by Pantaenus, a former Stoic philosopher who had been converted to the Way by a scholar of the apostles. The chief accomplishment of Pantaenus was to produce a famous student, Clement, called Alexandrinus, to distinguish him from the other Clement, who was called Romanus. Clement was born of Christian parents, but grew up in an atmosphere of philosophy which bred within him an undying urge to research for truth. When he became a believer he traveled far and wide to sit at the feet of any older disciple who could teach him the Way more perfectly. The result was that he succeeded Pantaenus to the presidency of the school, and, in turn, greatly influenced Origen, who came to be known as “the father of the sermon.”

His love of rhetoric, coupled with his development of discourse upon isolated texts, laid the groundwork for mystical interpretation, and the school which was begun to preserve the faith became the “grave of primitive Christianity,” to quote the phrase of John Lawrence Mosheim, the eminent church historian and Chancellor of the University of Gottingen. Origen developed the allegorical method of Biblical criticism, insisting that behind the literal meaning of the scriptures, was hidden a moral or mystical meaning. In doing so he laid the groundwork for speculation which could only survive on the basis of dogmatism and the authoritarian structure. Christendom was now really on its way!

Less than fifty years after the death of Origen, Africa became the birthplace of two men destined to be opponents—Arius and Athanasius. The theological dispute for which they became famous, or infamous, caused the infidel Gibbon to say, “The divisions of Christianity suspended the ruin of paganism.” The groundwork of the controversy about the nature of God had already been laid. Tertullian invented and gave the world the word “Trinity,” but there were many who disagreed with its implications. And the Alexandrian school with its speculative “theology,” furnished fuel for the flames of heated debate.

I have not time, nor do I have the inclination to enter into the intricacies of the arguments upon either side, being concerned more with the effect and result. The question revolved around the nature of Deity and the relationship sustained by Jesus to the Father. The Greek terms expressive of the varied views were spelled exactly alike except for one letter of the alphabet. Interwoven into the dispute were subtleties of rationalization borrowed, or stolen, from Aristotle, the Stoics and the Gnostics.

Whether the Son of God was of one and the same substance as the Father, or whether he was of like substance, was the question. On one hand it was contended that the Son of God was “co-eternal, co-essential, and co-equal with the Father.” On the other, this was called inconsistent and impossible, since the Father who begat must be before the Son who was begotten, and the latter, therefore, could not be absolutely eternal. As time went on each side used a thousand contrived arguments. Factions sprang up everywhere, rallying around phrases, and novel interpretations. The accusations of heresy and apostasy, words jerked rudely from the context furnished by the Spirit, became the clubs by which zealots sought to batter others into subjection or drive them bodily out into the cold.

At this juncture, I want to submit one of the most perceptive and poignant statements that I have ever read by a historian. It is found in Essays on the Rise and Progress of the Christian Religion in the West of Europe (pages 65, 66), by Earl Russel, and reads as follows:

It will readily be perceived how tempting was the prospect of leaving the beaten roads of the early Christians to wander through the pathless forests of controversy, and ascend the heights of a new heaven. The early Christian, seeking to imitate the benevolent Samaritan who ministered to the wounded traveller, or to follow the example of the merciful Lord, who forgave his debtor, or like the loving father, to receive with joy a penitent son, followed plain precepts and practised unobtrusive virtues. But the doctor of theology, who displayed acuteness in pointing out inferences which Christ had never revealed to His disciples, came victor out of conflicts with his learned rivals. He defined what Jesus had left obscure, and explained relations to the Godhead which Christ had left to the conclusions of private judgment. Thus Athanasius, followed by crowds of admiring pupils, radiant with flashes of rhetoric, and exulting over the opponents whom he had crushed, stood at last on the narrow summit of orthodoxy . . . and waved his triumphant banner over Europe, Asia and Africa. It is to be lamented, however, that in this difficult struggle, the spirit of Christianity was lost— that man was taught to hate his neighbor and to exalt himself.

THE ROAD TO CONFORMITY

The creed of the apostles and of the primitive saints was Jesus Christ. That creed identified him but did not seek to define him. It consisted of a fact, a historical fact, established by testimony, as all historical facts must be, and confirmed by supernatural demonstration, as all but natural facts must be confirmed. It was stated in the simple proposition that Jesus was the Anointed One, the Son of God. There was no room and no necessity for dispute over the nature or essence of Deity. But when metaphysical and philosophical debate began and waxed hot, men were branded as heretics and it was deemed essential to define orthodoxy as a criterion for measuring the acceptability and doctrinal soundness and worthiness of the believers.

It was Eusebius who convinced Constantine, the emperor, that he should use his power to summon a council of bishops and hammer out a formal guideline for the institutional church in order to preserve a pure doctrine upon the earth. The fact that there had never been such a convocation before June 14, 325, is indicative of the freedom of opinion and the tolerance which had always existed prior to this time. Now an emperor, not yet converted to Christ, used temporal power to bring together those spiritual leaders who would set the stage for bitter persecution and make honest dissent a horrible crime. From now on such dissent would be heresy, and communication would be contingent upon conformity. Prior to this the saints had been persecuted by the pagans who sought to blot out the name of Christ. Now they would be persecuted by their fellows in the name of Christ.

To say the least, the council was an interesting assemblage. More than 320 recognized bishops were present, but this number was augmented by a great number of lesser dignitaries who came for study, or out of curiosity, or to see the emperor near at hand. To add to the excitement a goodly sprinkling of pagan philosophers showed up, hoping to openly challenge the Christian teachers to public debate, or to sow dissension among them by well-placed questions.

Many of the delegates bore marks of persecution by the heathen. One from Asia Minor was without hands, both of them having been burned off with an iron bar of white heat. Pophnutius, of Upper Egypt, had a patch over the empty socket where his right eye had recently been gouged out. Many were without a right arm, having suffered amputation by the sword of the enemy. Theodoret called it “an assembly of martyrs.”

The preliminary discussions were long and loud. The historian, Socrates, was present and preserves for us the account of an interesting incident. Upon one occasion when the voices were raised in an angry clamor over some point of doctrine, a simple “layman” stepped out in front of the assembly. His body bore the marks of recent persecution. He raised his hand and all eyes were turned upon him. He merely said, “Brethren, Christ left us not a system of logic, but a naked truth, to be guarded by faith and good works.” He then quietly returned to his place.

Arius was given a chance to elucidate and defend his doctrine, and Athanasius arose to reply to it with oratorical ability which entranced the crowd. Then, on a given day, Constantine moved the scene of debate to the Great Hall in the royal palace where he could preside over it. His attitude was calm and conciliatory. He constantly urged the need for agreement. That agreement never came, but the majority, the so-called forces of orthodoxy, determined upon a statement of faith which would eventually shatter the religious world to fragments. The creed read as follows:

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, maker of all things visible and invisible. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, begotten of the Father, the only begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God, not made, of one substance with the Father, by whom all things, both in heaven and earth were made. Who for us men and for our salvation, came down, and was incarnate, and was made man, suffered, and the third day rose again, and ascended into heaven, and shall come again to judge the quick and the dead. And in the Holy Ghost. And those who say, There was a time when He was not, and that He did not exist before He was made, and that He was made out of nothing, or out of another substance or essence, or that the Son of God is created or mutable, or alterable, the Catholic and Apostolic Church anathematizes.

I have always been impressed with one statement made in Early Church History to the Death of Constantine by Edward Backhouse and Charles Tylor. "It may be urged that although the council was not conducted with the decorum which was to be desired, yet in stemming the torrent of Arianism, in establishing the orthodox faith, and setting up a clear, enduring symbol of belief around which all might rally, it performed a work worthy of its character and fame, and of the gratitude of posterity. Let the council receive its full meed of praise. What might have happened if the Nicene Creed had not been adopted no one can say. But let us not ignore the incalculable mischief of enforced conformity, nor overlook the fact that the conclusion arrived at by the council was very far from settling the question at issue."

Another evaluation, by the German historian Neander, in his monumental historical work, needs our consideration. "The manner in which the controversy was left could only contain the seeds for new disputes. Here was no cordial union, springing freely by a natural course of development out of inward conviction, but a forced and artificial conjunction of men, still widely separated by their different modes of thinking, in relation to a creed which had been imposed upon them, and which was variously expounded according to the doctrinal proclivities of the various parties.”

THE NATURE OF CHRISTENDOM

I am now ready to define Christendom in my own way. That definition will not please many. My conclusions will be less favorably received than my definition. Christendom is the huge umbrella of many patches and colors, providing shelter and shade for every form of political and religious delusion and chicanery. It is the sprawling tent under which millions huddle to watch the antics of religious clowns and buffoons, and to see the three-ring circus of professional entertainers, putting on a constant show for the shekels thrown them by the fear-motivated spectators. It is the labyrinthine maze which entraps and ensnares the unwary, and dooms them to the perpetual and hopeless search for happiness, promising them everything and delivering nothing.

Christendom is not the creation of God. It is the machinery of the clergy, a special class of which God’s word knows nothing, but which sprung out of human pride and then captured the holy city and placed its citizens under tribute for its maintenance. It is the new mediator between God and man, christening, consecrating, shriving, burying, and intoning prayers for a fee. Christendom is the kingdom presided over by popes, cardinals, primates, metropolitans, archbishops, bishops, prelates, deans, arch deacons, canons, rectors, vicars and curates. In the suburban areas it is sometimes under the direction of priests, pastors and parsons, and these frequently try to hide their relationship. It is the realm of ecclesiastical jargon, that language of the Scholastics, which has become a dialect or patois, unintelligible to the masses and serving only to confuse the uninitiated and confound the humble student. Most of us have been snared by it and pay homage to it by our own usage, a fact I stand ready to prove if anyone challenges my affirmation.

Christendom is not the Way! The Way is the habitat of free men, of men free to think for themselves and, what may be just as important, free to allow others to think for themselves. The Way is the path of communion and not always of conformation. Christendom is the mother of doubt and skepticism, and her daughters are human institutions brought in to act as handmaidens and nurses who know only how to supply the bottle but have never learned how to carve and serve meat. It is the imposer of creeds and forms, binding the intellect as the ancient Chinese bound the feet of their females, and producing a society of cripples out of reverence for tradition. It is the way of the prescript, the mandate and the bull.

It is for these reasons that I unhesitatingly affirm that what men call Christendom will never be united. No good purpose would be served if it were. We must go back beyond the written creeds of others and the unwritten creeds of our own, if we are ever to recapture the spirit of vital relationship with God which the Incarnation was intended to make possible and available unto us. This means a scrapping of all traditions except the apostolic tradition of Jesus Christ as having any validity for our walk in the Spirit. It means the discarding of papal bulls and decretals, the disregarding of synodical canons and articles, and the refusal to accept as authoritarian and prejudicial rulings and dogmatic definitions of elders and preachers.

The apostles must again be elevated to that place from which they were dragged, both by those who denied their authority originally, and those who affirmed equal authority as their successors. The right of the individual to go humbly to the divine revelation for himself must be recovered. Each must be allowed to drink of the water of life out of his own cup, and not be forced to drink from an official cup bearing the insignia of the sect. There must be no supreme court except the individual conscience, and no compulsion except that of the eager heart yearning to be like Jesus.

You may label this what you will. You may call it reformation, restoration, or recovery. You may give it the more modern designation of renewal. I am not at all concerned about the semantical twists over which men fight and strive. What I am saying is that a return to Jerusalem is not a return to a period of time or a place on the map. It is rather a return to the recognition that God has raised up that same Jesus whom we have crucified and made him both Lord and Christ. It is a return to that state of contrition and heart-pricking over our guilt that we cry out once more, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Let others debate in forums and synods about the finer points of self-imposed law. Let them argue their creeds and assess the values of their decrees. But, as for me, I shall not stop at 325 A.D., but I will go to that moment when the glad news of the resurrection was heralded to a sinful race, and I will lift up my voice to proclaim it anew. Then unity will come to those who believe in Him!

Two Sons of God

[Abstract]

Augustus occupied the throne in Rome the night the Baby was born and wrapped in swaddling cloths and laid in the manger. There is no indication he ever knew about the visit of the angelic choir, but even if he did, he probably gave no thought to the idea that the visitation signalled the birth of the greatest revolutionary in the long turbulent history of mankind. To Augustus, every male child born to Galilean peasants was a potential revolutionary, but he knew how to extinguish these smoking firebrands.

Without realizing it, though, Augustus had been readying the world for the great clash which would eventually topple the imperial throne. And it all came about because of the feeling that Rome was decreed by the hand of Fate to become the kingdom of the heavens, the administration of the gods through whom peace and goodwill would be brought to men. And the Caesars would be the scepter in the hands of the gods for the accomplishment which would usher in the long-sought for “Golden Age.”

Originally called Gaius Octavius, Augustus was the grand-nephew of the great soldier and statesman, Julius Caesar. He was only nineteen when his uncle was murdered by the republican forces at the instigation of Marcus Junius Brutus and Gaius Cassius, causing fear and turmoil to settle like a pall over

Rome. He was present when the Senate formally deified his uncle after death, exalting him to the court of the gods, and he recalled how even during his life his uncle had often been saluted as “Jupiter Julius.”

Octavius must have listened intently to the arguments which equated the empire with the rule of the heavens, and he was prepared to receive seriously the Latin title Augustus, the majestic one, when he became the emperor in 27 B.C. He petitioned to be called Divi Filius, that is, “Son of God,” and the request was granted by the Senate. Acceptance of divine status became a part of the strategy by which the Empire would become united and the loyalty of the provinces secured. To rebel against the emperor would be to rebel against God. Rome was to be “the Eternal City,” the abode of the gods.

The things which had happened in the immediate past gave impetus to the Caesar cult. When the will of Julius Caesar was read, it was learned that Octavian was named as heir and a legacy was left to each citizen. Mark Antony had taken advantage of his political position to seize the property and refused to surrender it. Octavian paid the people the sum of the bequest out of his own resources, and raised an army which defeated the forces of Antony, who fled across the Alps.

In 43 B.C. Octavian invited Antony to return and gave him equal status in the government. The two of them defeated Brutus and Cassius at Philippi the following year. Both of the beaten generals committed suicide. Later, Antony became fascinated with Cleopatra, the famous sexpot of the Nile and queen of Egypt, and Octavian was forced to fight a naval battle against the combined fleets of Antony and Cleopatra. He soundly defeated them at Actium in 31 B.C., and at the age of thirty-four became sole master of the Roman world.

In 29 B.C. he returned in triumph, hailed by the frantic populace as Jupiter come down in the flesh to dwell among them. He closed the temple of Janus for the first time in two hundred years, and a great calm settled over the whole earth. Two years later he was accorded the title “Son of God,” and began his personal friendship with the Roman writers Ovid, Horace, Vergil and Livy. A great beautification project began in Rome to make it worthy to be the seat of the gods, and Augustus could boast that he “found Rome brick and left it marble.”

Finally, the supreme triumph was accorded him. It was deemed by Rome a mark of divinity to change the calendar. The gods presided over time and for time to be regulated by one’s birth or life was a proof of deity. January was the month of Janus, March the month of Mars, and June the month of Juno. The Senate met in solemn session and changed the month Sextilis to August. Then an unseen hand began to move among men!

Centuries before, a Hebrew prophet had almost casually spoken about the little city of David, “But you, O Bethlehem Ephratah, who are little to be among the clans of Judah, from you shall come forth for me one who is to be ruler in Israel, whose origin is from old, from ancient days” (Micah 5:2). The future ruler was to enter the world like those whom he would rule. The vehicle in which he would ride was the womb of a peasant girl, a virgin. There was one problem. The pregnant woman was in Nazareth, a long way from Bethlehem, and there was no sensible reason for going to the latter village.

But the universal launching headquarters for the planetary visitation had command of the situation. At precisely the right minute in far-away Rome, Octavian, who considered himself as master of the universe, pulled a switch that set the whole world in motion. “In those days a decree went out from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be enrolled . . . And all went to be enrolled each to his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee . . . to be enrolled with Mary his betrothed, who was with child. And while they were there, the time came for her to be delivered.”

Now there were two “Sons of God” on earth and their goals were identical. One was created by the Roman Senate and one by the Holy Spirit. Each was dedicated to the task of bringing about universal peace, and each believed that it could come only through acknowledgment of his sovereignty. Behind one was the mightiest military machine the world has ever seen. It was augmented by another army of statesmen, ambassadors and envoys, who were superb in diplomacy. Treaties and compromises welded together a great political complex which had no rival. It was a kingdom of the gods, woven of raw power and intrigue, and it was obsessed with the thought of its own invincibility. It was eternal and undying.

The Nazarene quietly and unobtrusively began to build his force of freedom fighters. By its very nature his had to be an underground movement. Hardy fishermen were summoned from their nets, a customs agent was called from his desk at a port of entry. Another was a daggerman of the Zealot party, a group of raiders pledged to undying hostility to the occupation forces of Rome. It was a strange and motley crew. But for three years they were constantly by his side, and they came to share his sense of mission and destiny.

To them he disclosed strange facts. He said, “The time has come for the Son of man to be glorified. I tell you truly that unless a grain of wheat falls into the earth and dies, it remains a single grain of wheat; but if it dies, it brings a good harvest.” Again we can read, “From that time onwards Jesus began to explain to his disciples that he would have to go to Jerusalem, and endure much suffering from the elders, chief priests and scribes, and finally be killed; and be raised to life again on the third day.” When one of them remonstrated with him he told him that he looked at things “from man’s point of view and not from God’s.”

The rest of the story is too well known to require repetition. He did die, and was buried and rose again. He met the last enemy, went down into his lair, conquered him and wrestled the keys of death and hades from his frantic grasp. For forty days he appeared to the men whom he had trained. They heard him, saw him, scrutinized him and touched him. There was no question in their minds that he had overcome death, and by doing so had transformed into a grand strategy of "Mission Possible" what had before seemed an impossible mission.

Before he left to return to his glory, he revealed that theirs was a task of world conquest, and he instructed them to wait until the power to accomplish the work was provided them. Immediately upon receipt of this power they were to launch an attack which must be prosecuted by them and their successors until his return for the Grand Triumph, the climax of all the ages. They were to be wise as serpents and harmless as doves. But they were to unleash upon a world of evil and malignancy the greatest dynamic force in heaven and upon earth.

The war to capture men's minds began at Jerusalem, and was an attack against the world citadel of legalism. For a very little while the invading forces were popular. Each day they met by common consent in a temple rendezvous, and then repaired to private homes to break bread together. Numbers of people enlisted cheerfully under the banner of the world liberation front. Suddenly it began to dawn upon the defenders of the status quo that they were not dealing with a bunch of harmless eccentrics. They arrested the recruiting officers and jailed them but it was to no avail. "During the night an angel of the Lord opened the prison doors and led them out, saying, 'Go and stand and speak in the Temple. Tell the people all about this new life.' After receiving these instructions they entered the Temple about daybreak, and began to teach."

The enemy next summoned a meeting of the council to discuss how to kill them. Fortunately, a very prominent leader, Gamaliel, who was respected by all of the people arose and said, "My advice to you now therefore is to let these men alone; leave them to themselves.” Later it was claimed that he was secretly allied with the Messianic movement, one of whom wrote, “Gamaliel, a chief of the people . . . who was secretly our brother in the faith, but by our advice remained among them” (Clement, Recognitions, Book 1).

Already there was developing a strategy of penetration with intelligence agents planted in key spots, but the program of world conquest was proceeding slowly and was all too limited. If the world was to be set on fire the burning brands must be scattered. The upper control room awaited the proper moment and then made use of a Cicilian hot-head who harassed the freedom fighters, violating their civil rights, battering down the doors to their houses, and dragging men and women out to commit them to detention cells.

But “those who were dispersed by his actions went throughout the country proclaiming the good news of the Message as they went.” Then a tremendous thing happened. After he had been used to scatter the fire the Tarsian leader of the Jewish storm-troopers, “still breathing murderous threats” came into direct confrontation with the Risen One, was captured and changed sides. Immediately he turned his enthusiasm and fanatical zeal toward advancement of the new cause.

Up to that time Rome had taken no particular notice of the movement. It had been confined to a remote province and appeared to be nothing more than another sect in an already hopelessly fragmented Judaism. But the Caesar cult was creating widespread opposition and revolt in Palestine. The Roman cohorts were having great difficulty in maintaining order. Feeling began to run high even in the “Eternal City.” And then the Messianic movement began to spread. It crossed seas, climbed mountains, traversed plains and spanned continents.

There is every reason to believe that the Romans often misunderstood its nature and misinterpreted its purpose. They were aware that Jewish political agents were active everywhere, fomenting revolt, and had a cell even in the ghetto in Rome itself. In desperation their personal property was confiscated. It was easy to mistakenly identify the Nazarenes as allied with the political revolutionaries. In Thessalonica Paul and Silas were dragged before the civic authorities by a shouting mob, yelling, "These are the men who have turned the world upside down and have now come here, and Jason has taken them into his house. What is more, all these men act against the decrees of Caesar saying there is another king called Jesus."

It is not to be wondered at that the Caesar cult mistook the teaching of the resurrection of Jesus for something else, and interpreted Anastasis Christou as "the Messianic insurrection." We must not forget that there is not one thing in the word "resurrection" which has to do with death. It simply means a raising up, or an uprising. When word reached Rome that all over the Empire men of Jewish background were enlisting slaves and others by proclaiming the rising up of the Messiah, and that groups were being formed which met secretly after dark, or before daybreak, where participants pledged anew their allegiance to another king, it was decided that drastic measures would have to be taken. The political sovereignty of the Caesars was being threatened and this new cult must be ruthlessly obliterated.

At last the two great powers must face up to the fray. Now it was Christ or Caesar! One was a usurper in the universe because there could only be one Lord, and one universal King. The Caesars readied for the strange conflict. Unseen by them the angels in heaven also prepared. So did the demons. The cosmic struggle was now centered on earth. The purpose of the ages was now "zeroed in" on one of the smallest spinning planets. But this was the headquarters for the "prince of the power of the air." Here lived the sons of men, and here for a little while had lived the Son of Man. His coming had made the war inevitable.

Rome had gained dominion over the soldiers loyal to the Emperor, but the many thousands, even millions, of slaves who were captured proved the eventual undoing of the state. The slave was regarded not as a person, but as a thing. He was a labor-saving device, a gadget to respond immediately to the call of the master. The result was that Roman society grew more decadent as its constituency grew more affluent. The people were tired— of life, of the gods, and of religious performances. Suddenly they were introduced to a new and virile Message and the Way was alive, and powerful and enthusiastic. That last word means “inspired of God.” The Way was revolutionary.

A genuine revolutionary movement must possess certain well-defined characteristics in order to achieve its objective. Without these it will founder and fade out without transforming the entrenched status, or overthrowing the existing order. Fuzzy thinking still stifles more reform movements than any other factor. Let us think about the necessary and indispensable requirements.

1. There must be a sense of destiny which imbues the revolutionary with a dream of tremendous scope out of all proportion to present strength and power. That vision must be so majestic that the one who holds it will be called a fanatic, and his peers will say, “Behold, the dreamer cometh.”

2. There must be a recognition that the forces of revolution are always the aggressors, relentless and unswerving, and that any temporary setback must be overcome at once and turned into occasion for victory.

3. There must be an acceptance of the idea that the cause is more valuable than any person engaged in its prosecution and that to die for it is heroic and constitutes actual gain.

4. There must be a full support of the headquarters with unquestioning trust in the Intelligence Department to direct the forces in the field.

5. There must be a flexibility in the strategy which will make for adaptability of weaponry to changing conditions and circumstances. By their very nature, revolutions can never be tied to the methods of the past.

6. The ultimate goal must be transformed from an ideal into a positive idea, and this must be seen and envisioned in its completed state by the projected imagination.

Every one of these principles is accepted and adopted by every school for revolutionaries on the face of the earth. An examination of every political, social, economic, and religious revolution of the past, will show that those who launched it, were all fully cognizant of and committed to these principles.

We thus have the proper criteria to measure what we refer to as “Christianity” and determine whether it is a revolutionary force in our day. And the apt students are immediately aware that whether Christianity faces up to these or fails, there is a force extant in our day which meets everyone of them. It is world communism. And it is the fastest growing religious ideology on our earth. It has captured the minds of multiplied millions during my own lifetime!

It is also dramatically evident how dynamically the early Christians met every requirement and thus composed a tremendous fighting force. Their vision was universal. They were commissioned to go into all the world and contact every creature. They were convinced that every knee would bow, whether in heaven, on earth, or under the earth.

They followed a trumpet which would never sound retreat. Their watchword was “Go!” “Go ye into the village; go ye into the highways, go stand and speak in the temple, go toward the south, go into Damascus, go into Jerusalem, go into all the world, go teach all nations, go in peace.” Go! Go! Go! And every go is matched with an “arose and went.” When their way was barred in one direction they circumvented it and pressed on. When Paul and Silas came to Mysia, they attempted to enter Bithynia, but encountered a divine roadblock. So they passed by Mysia and came down to Troas which they used as a launching-pad to open up a new continent to the revolution— Europe.

They did not have a false estimate of the value of this life. The cause was everything. This is shown by some of the statements which they jotted down. “It all accords with my own earnest wishes and hopes, which are that I shall never be in any way ashamed, but that now, as always, I should honor Christ with the utmost boldness by the way I live, whether that means I am to face death or go on living.” “What do you mean by unnerving me with all your tears? I am perfectly prepared not only to be bound but to die in Jerusalem for the sake of the Lord Jesus.”

There was an unquestioning obedience. “I thank God there is a way out through Jesus Christ our Lord.” “The life of a man of divided loyalty will reveal instability at every turn.” “But they cannot chain the Word of God, and I can endure all things for the sake of those whom God is calling.” “I am not in the least ashamed. For I know the one in whom I have placed my confidence, and I am perfectly certain that the work he has committed to me is safe in his hands unto that day.”

To understand the conquest of the Way one must see it in the context of conflict and against the background of battle. It cannot be explained when divorced from the terminology of war in which it is described. To try and refine it and clean it up for sensitive ears and squeamish hearts is to reduce it to a sham and a show. It is to look at a diorama in an auditorium instead of being involved in a real life situation. One of God’s commandos described his ministry by talking about “danger from rivers and floods, from bandits, from my own countrymen, and from pagans.” He said, “I have faced danger in city streets, danger in the desert, danger on the high seas, danger among false Christians. I have known exhaustion, pain, long vigils, hunger and thirst, doing without meals, cold and lack of clothing.”

Let me make no bones about it. Let me be clearly understood. I want to serve as a revolutionary. I want to be an active member of the world liberation front. I am sold out to “the man from outside.” I want to join hands with every other person on the face of this whole wide earth who is committed to following “the leader on the white horse.” I do not care whether you are black, white, red or yellow. I do not care whether you are Jew or Greek, male or female, bond or free. I do not care if you wear faded jeans or a Botany 500 suit. I do not care if you wear curls over your coat collar or if you are as bald as a billiard ball. What I am concerned about is whether you are willing to suffer hardship for his name, whether you are carrying the cross daily and if you are willing to die cheerfully and smilingly for his sake. He said, “He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it.”

If you are in Him I am in Him with you. We are in the One! We are listening to the clear tones of the same trumpet. I have no time to indulge in the luxury of cultivating vegetables in a sectarian garden, fenced off from life. I have no time to play religious chess inside the walls of a partisan monastery. There is a war on. The winds of battle are blowing in my face. I have no desire to lean on the fence and argue with you about your trivial deductions or to engage in nit-picking. A soldier who is under fire and pinned down by whining bullets cannot waste mental energy in a heated argument whether to part his hair on the right or left side. When the house is on fire it is no time to get up and nail a stray shingle on the roof of the garage.

Let the religious gold-bricks behind the lines debate, argue and fuss about all of the nitty-gritty which appeals to those who go blithely on without knowing that the fight is on, but for God's sake, let us get on with the battle. Let us not get hung up on what kind of rug to put on the floor of the mess-hall or commissary, or strung out on whether Jesus is going to return before the thousand years or after it. While we are fighting among ourselves the demons are laughing up their diabolical sleeves and the devil is picking his teeth with a flame-proof splinter in happy anticipation of a ghoulish feast.

The time has come to live dangerously! It is no time to sit around mumbling and talking out of the corner of your mouth about the “institutional church.” This is a cop-out, and those who do most of the grumbling and belly-aching would not do anything for Jesus under any circumstances. I have watched the spiritual dropouts through the years, and without exception they are people of divided allegiance, and they are unstable in all of their ways. It takes men in times of battle and they are a little less than men. One does not have to be very brilliant to sit around and find fault and to inform his longsuffering wife of the mistakes of everyone else on earth. If you know what ought to be done, get with the action and stop the reaction.

If you are a preacher of the word, revolutionize your message so you can revolutionize your hearers. There is not too much to be gained when a group is spoon-fed the same pap or pabulum week after week, and know before they arrive that they are going to be “filled up with regular.” Risk your financial life and live up to your commitment. Trust in the Lord to see you through. If you are driven out of one city flee to the next. If the Message is absolutely rejected sound off your exhaust against the city. Few preachers walk enough any more that they can shake off any dust from their feet!

I eagerly urge you to read again the absolute essentials to the revolutionary stance. Study the tactics of world communism. See why the proponents of it are so successful. Let us learn from the enemy! How can they sweep the world and never hold a revival? How have they been so successful in the cities of the globe without a crusade? What is the difference in the approach of “The Daily Worker” and the papers that we publish?

My heart is thoroughly convinced that we have the power of heaven on our side in the struggle. We are following a leader that even death could not hold. The sayings of Chairman Jesus in the little black book are so much more revolutionary than the sayings of Chairman Mao in the little red book, that there is no comparison. Then the difference must be in the attitude of the followers. Are we willing to admit that the brainwashed millions are more powerful than the heart-washed hosts who follow in the train of the Son of God?

Arouse from your apathy! Comrades, let us unite! We should be the militants! We should be the workers throwing off their chains. We should be the world liberators! We should be the vanguard of the forces storming the heights, freeing the captives, rescuing the weary and despondent. Banish the thought of defeat. We cannot be overcome! We cannot be destroyed! I summon every person in the world who loves Jesus to throw off the sectarian bonds and free men from the stranglehold of party shackles. For freedom Christ hath set us free! Our necks were not made to bend beneath the cruel chafing of sectarian yokes. Hear the call of him who said, "Take my yoke upon you, for truly my yoke is easy and my burden is light." Hear the call. Heed the invitation. There's a place in the ranks for you. Right on, brethren!

The Secular Influence

Mission Messenger (June 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

Although the readers of this little journal represent many schools of thought and are identified with many of the religious sects current in our day, they generally agree that God has communicated his will to mankind, and the revelation is contained in what we call the sacred scriptures. I use the modifying term “generally” because an occasional reader takes me to task for my reliance upon the scriptures as of divine origin. We have some brethren who sit in the left field bleachers, just as we have others who are still looking for the ball park. But such objectors are so few that I need not take time out to establish either the genuineness or authenticity of the scriptures. I can deal with them on a “coffee break,” but I will proceed upon the basis that proper reverence and respect will be accorded to the scriptures when I refer to them, or quote from them.

In spite of the fact that all those who love God seek to understand and do his will, even the most casual reader and observer will recognize that the Christian profession as we see it exemplified in our day is not at all as it was portrayed by the inspired penmen in the earliest days of the proclamation of the Joyful News. Two things have happened to create the condition we face. On one hand our profession has been secularized, and on the other it has been sectarianized. These did not move in from the same direction at all. The first represents the encroachment of a culture which has been developing under the impact of the Machine Age and the Scientific Era. The other stems from the selfishness and immaturity of those whom God has called. It would be nice if we could stick our heads in the ecclesiastical sand and act as if they did not exist. But if we are honest we will face up to both of them. Neither will go away of itself.

In this little treatise, which will no doubt turn out to be too long, I am going to deal with the influence of secularization. At the very outset it is important that we distinguish between the secularization of the community of faith, and the propagation or promulgation of “secularism” as a way of life. The latter is actually a “system of belief” which is arrogantly offered as an “honest alternative” to faith in God. It is touted as the only approach to human existence and the universe open to men who are possessed of both intellectuality and integrity. In effect it denies the reality or significance of anything that cannot be ascertained or measured by the methods of modern science.

Secularism begins without God, continues without God, and ends without God. It is the same yesterday, today and forever. It is an interpretation of life which does not find either a necessity or place for God. In its postulate God is not needed to explain the origin of things, the maintenance of the universe, or the culmination of it. It repudiates the concepts of creation, providence and final judgment. One need not be too astute to recognize that it makes man answerable to no higher being than Self, and thus abdicates moral responsibility and leaves man dangling in space by a rope which is not fastened to anything above. A crash is simply inevitable because life is more than an Oriental rope-trick.

It is also apparent that if the nature of God is such that it is not subject to measurement by the methods of natural science, the fact that he is not discovered or turned up by the experimental or laboratory process reveals nothing about the reality of Deity. All it proves is the inadequacy of the scientific process to measure the Infinite. If God is, as I believe he is, the uncreated, eternal First Cause, he cannot be confined and judged by natural science which can only deal with that which is at hand, and can never go back and discover the Hand which being unformed itself, gave form to all else.

Mind you, secularism when boiled down and simmered away, is not a substitute for faith. It is in itself a “system of faith.” It is predicated upon faith and conducts its research in faith. Although it pretends to scoff at faith it has never taken a step without it, nor can it exist without faith. Newman Smyth, in Reality of Faith wrote, “How many things hard to credit must one believe, in order not to be a Christian.” So secularism has Man as its god, hedonism as its philosophy, and scientism as its religion. We must never forget that doubts are creeds. “Every denial is one facet of a proposition of which the other facet is an affirmation.”

But it is not of this we speak when we say that the Christian profession has become secularized. Instead, we refer to the fact that God’s people exist in the ongoing flow of history, and that its attitudes and approaches to life penetrate and affect the saints in the world. Secularization means the gradual withdrawal of more and more areas of life from the control of the religious community, but it also means the exclusion of more and more areas of thought from the control of the revealed will of God.

This presents some tensions, and secularization is not all evil. There is no stopping of history, except by the fiat of God. We cannot halt the world and hop off. Sometimes men mature within the historical process and because of it, and this always means a change with growing independence. This is true in the physical family. As the infant develops it changes, and each change fits it for the making of decisions which will culminate in its independence from the imposition of the will of others for its personal wellbeing. The relationship to the family remains and the affectional bond may actually grow stronger when it is no longer the result of helpless dependence. There is a difference between the leash which a mother uses to restrain a child from running off in a supermarket and the heart strings which bind a grown man to his aging parent. One purpose of Christ in visiting this planet was to make men free by encouraging them to mature. Prior to his coming the people of God were regarded as adolescents or minors, and were placed under a guardian or trustee. They were no better off than slaves, and were "close prisoners in the custody of the law, pending the revelation of Faith," as Paul wrote to the Galatians. The coming of Jesus changed all of this. He came "to purchase freedom for the subjects of the law in order that we might attain the status of sons."

A slave is not independent. He can make no decisions. They are all made for him. But we are no longer under a written code. We are under grace. We are sons of God, and heirs by God's own act. Oftentimes a family will not allow a child to really grow up. Stronger members of the circle try to dominate him. And this also happens in the family of God. Now, however, we are seeing grave changes take place with reference to authoritarian institutions. Some of these are wrought in the life of the community of saints and many are worried sick and frightened. They think that the purpose of God is being thwarted in a decadent age. They are concerned because what is called "the church" can no longer keep its adherents under control. No one is asking how such control originated in the first place.

Certainly there are grave dangers in the secularization process, but if divine providence uses it to make God's children grow up and accept the responsibilities of freedom, it will not be the first time that what appeared to be evil has been turned into good. God has a way of using historical phenomena to accomplish his purpose. And there is a shaking of the foundations in our day. Such upheaval will be most observable in rigid and authoritarian structures. The Roman Catholic Church, for example, has always been somewhat loose in regard to some aspects of individual moral behavior, having hitched its wagon rather to the sacramental star. So it is in the area of dogma and ritual that it is now being shaken. Even some of its “infallible” dogmata are being called in question by prominent leaders.

What is taking place in the Mother of Sects is taking place among her daughters, as well as among some parties which vehemently deny that they have ever been related. The fact is that every group which acknowledges that Jesus has come in the flesh is in trouble, and the woes are compounded when priests, prelates or preachers mistake all demands for and assertions of freedom as rebellion against God. The sectarianism is evident in that each party rejoices that all of the others are in difficulty. Those who demand an end to tyranny over thought in other sects are hailed as heroes, those who do so in our own are branded as traitors. In an earlier age we would have cheerfully burned them as heretics. Now we brand them as “liberals.”

Once the community by group pressure and by threats, innuendo and boycott, regulated every avenue of life and conduct. There was no real individual maturity required. Decisions were made by the power structure and imposed from an editorial sanctum. Recreational preferences, social relationships, and even personal habits were as much regulated as were the rituals, times of assembly and other areas of community endeavor. At various times imported front-men inveighed against such evils as playing checkers or golfing. Preachers who lambasted movies in the country sneaked out and went to them in the city. Each faction or sect had its own taboos and embargoes. In some it was a sin to play croquet or watch a ballgame on Sunday. In others, men who had never been drunk in their lives were driven out because they drank a glass of Mogen David wine as a beverage at the dinner table. Mind you, I am not here discussing the right or wrong of any of these for individuals with a troubled conscience. I am simply pointing out the legalism of the religious institutions which invaded the private lives of individuals and assumed jurisdiction over them. If any brother violated a proscription it was “Katy-bar-the-door!”

Now secularization is removing these areas from organizational control and men are exercising their personal freedom to make decisions for themselves and their families. And a lot of them are making mistakes! The power structure is fighting to retain control. Hatchet-men are hacking away, seeking to hammer into subjection all who are trying to assert a right to stand or fall to their own Master. Preachers are brought in who have a reputation for being “sound,” and in some groups college lectureships are devoted to “tomahawking” liberals, in party parlance a term applied to anyone who thinks for himself out loud.

The tragedy is not that we are all in trouble. That was inevitable. My real concern is that we would not allow men to be free in Christ until the secular age moved in and began penetrating our ghettos and forcing upon us a condition which we had to meet or die. It is one thing for a man to free his slaves out of love for them as persons, and a wholly different thing to reluctantly allow them to go because an invading force has a gun pointed at his heart. In either case the former slaves will be free, but in the latter case the master will not be.

In the Christian framework the problem was created by the fact that good men forgot that Jesus came to put an end to the distinction between the secular and sacred. This is one of the chief differences between God’s dealings with his people before the cross and after it. The passing away of law as a restraining force and the introduction of love as the motivating principle for every action, changed the whole approach to God. Every word and deed was sanctified when proceeding from the inner man which was the dwelling-place of God. Worship ceased to be related to holy places, holy days and holy things, and became the daily life of the sanctified and reconciled ones.

But human wisdom and lust for power moved in to alter this, and in order to do so the religious schemers created an institution which arrogated to itself the right to dispense grace or deny it, to control the lives of men here and determine their destiny hereafter. Lip-service was paid to the cross, but it was ignored as the watershed of history, and law was reinstated as the basis of securing the approval of God. Law demands a supreme court to interpret it and a power structure to enforce it, and the institutions— Catholic, Protestant, Independent— set up an infallible interpreter, or, what is even worse, an infallible interpretation, and those who dissented were harassed and heckled, harrowed and hated, and sometimes killed by cruel torture.

Generally, men think of the Roman Church when they meditate upon things such as these. There is good reason to do so, for my good friends who have grown up in that background have been victimized by an arrogant institution which claims absolute control of their lives on earth and their fate after death. Modern Romanism is an unholy synthesis of Judaism, paganism and Christianity, devised by Thomas of Aquino, the “Prince of Scholastics” in the thirteenth century, and Thomism makes men slaves of the philosophic state as certainly as Marxism makes them slaves of the political state.

Yet, Romanism differs only in degree from some of its vociferous critics. The same reasoning which takes an Italian farmer and elevates him to the papal throne where his words, spoken ex cathedra, become dogma, binding upon the consciences of all the faithful, under threat of the fires of hell, is the same reasoning which promotes John Doe and Richard Roe to the eldership where, with benefit of the clergy, they can make decisions and issue official interpretations which all must accept without a murmur or be “cut off from among the people.”

The institutional religious establishments created to secure conformity and stifle dissent are alike in purpose, nature and intent. They differ in method and power as well as in points of emphasis. But all of them have been created to maintain the status quo by defence of opinions and traditions equated with the will of God and they operate to deprive men of freedom and the right to truly love all others. The Roman Catholic who trembles at the thought of crossing a Protestant threshold and later facing the parish priest for his action is no different than the patron of another establishment who would not dare go hear Billy Graham for fear of being verbally attacked from the “holy platform” the following Sunday by a preacher who watched the program on television.

The spirit of this age is one of secularization, and it is affecting the religious establishment as it is every other. I hold no brief for it. I recognize clearly its potential for harm. But I am thoroughly convinced that it will not destroy or prevail against the community planted on the Rock. Our God can use alien forces to free his people. He has done so in the past and he can still do so. When Babylon ruthlessly enslaved God’s people he raised up “the spirit of the kings of the Medes for his device was against Babylon.” The Medes were pagans but God said, “You are my battle axe and weapons of war.” By the same token he can use the tendencies of our neo-pagan culture as his instruments for achieving good.

The principle of legalism with its written and unwritten creeds must be abrogated. The ideal of grace must be recaptured. This means a renunciation of the human establishment which has usurped the place of the temple of God which is not constructed of dogmas or codes, but of living stones bonded together by that which the Spirit supplies. It means the recapture of the apostolic proclamation, purpose and power, and the renewal that can only come from the indwelling Helper supplied by the Father during the absence of Jesus from the earth.

A mere reformation of the ecclesiastical power structures will neither meet the divine appointment nor merit the divine approval. History is full of such attempts at reformation. All have been abortive. Luther sought to reform the Roman Church and ended up with a Protestant hierarchy. Every exclusivistic party now in existence is a living testimony to the futility of reforming sects. Such endeavors only multiply the sects and make the task of future reformers more difficult and complex. Every reformation has ended up in deformation.

A group of reformed sects will still be sects, and although they may shift their areas of emphasis under the influence of reformatory moves, they will still separate and segregate those who should be one in Christ. There must come, not only a renunciation of sects, but of sectism, the spirit which spawns them. Otherwise, if we rid ourselves of existing sects it would not be long until we would again plague the world with a bevy of new ones, which might conceivably be worse than the first. Cutting down sectarian sprouts will avail little unless we also dig up the roots. The sectarian spirit is a work of the flesh. We must repent of it, crucify it, and eradicate it from our hearts.

It is at this point where secularization may play an important, and even a decisive role. It makes for de-emphasis upon partisan forms, and the power structures and machinery created to keep them operating. Religious rivalry and competition are seen in their true light, as struggles to maintain the pride of the party, and not as attempts to contend earnestly for the faith once delivered for all. And we need to recapture the sense of brotherhood created by the blood of the Lamb. We are blood-brothers in the Lord. Ours is a shared relationship and a sharing relationship, made possible by reconciliation unto God.

The disregard for arrogant dogmatism which makes serfs out of saints, and the assertion of the freedom and dignity of all God's children to be priests and ministers is good. It will help to place the Way in proper perspective. But the other influence of secularization is destructive. The removal of more and more areas of thought from the control and discipline of the revealed word of God is frightening because of the consequences which will result.

It is not necessary, in order to relieve ourselves of the despotism of men, that we also renounce the Lordship of Jesus. Obviously, modern man concludes that "the institutional church" uses Jesus as a means of enforcing its wishes upon weak men, or vice versa. But man tends to corrupt all that he touches and the fact that the lust for power has created abuses, in no wise argues that there is no room or need for authority over life by its Creator. The community of saints is not intended to be a tool of oppression but a means of spiritual edification for all who are concerned.

If Jesus is Lord, and if his will has been communicated in word, we are not free to disregard it. "Hear, O heaven, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken." We cannot choose those areas in which we will be obedient and neglect those in which we do not propose to be. The will of God is not subject to the whims of men. We are free in Christ, not free from Christ. And this is a good place for me to summarize my own convictions and approach in this article which has already outgrown my original intentions.

I propose to exercise the freedom to study God's revelation for myself and to be guided by my own understanding of its demands upon my life. I will not abdicate the right to think for myself to any institution, or to any man or group of men. Since I insist upon this freedom for myself I will accord it to all others. I will not impose my deductions, opinions or interpretations of doctrine upon any other person whose conscience will not allow him to accept them.

I will regard the methods and means which sincere men devise to enable themselves, in their views, to better implement the will of God, as human expedients. I am not bound to support them or to work in or through them. They are not a part of God's arrangement by revelation, and I will not confuse them with it. At the same time, I will not confound the means which men use with the men who use them, and I will exercise care that in rejecting the means I do not reject the men. Jesus died for men, not means! I will receive all whom God has received and allow God to determine the validity of those things which earnest men have used in their attempt to carry out the divine will. If they can explain them to the satisfaction of God it is not necessary for them to satisfy me!

Although I am in the world and cannot avoid or evade living out my earthly existence in a special time-space sequence, I am resolved that I will not allow the secularization process to separate me from Jesus. Insofar as the process cuts the institutional apron strings and forces me to stand upon my own feet and make my own decisions in Christ, as I had to make the decision for Christ, I shall accept the independency as a gift of God's grace. But I will be sure that my independency is expressed within the framework of God's precious revelation and not in rebellion against it.

Just as the physical sun is the center of the solar system, and all that is upon earth revolves around it, receiving light and power from it, whether conscious of the fact or not, so Jesus is the center of the moral universe. He is the source of spiritual light and power whether men recognize it or not. I am not a satellite of any institution or organization, but as a member of the one body and motivated by the one Spirit, my life revolves around the Sun of righteousness who has risen with healing in his wings. He is the center of my universe, the bright and morning star, my help in ages past, my hope for years to come, my shelter from the stormy blast, and my eternal home! Praise His name!

Our Real Task

Mission Messenger (June 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

Marcia Hollis wrote in Down to Earth these words: “Except for the call to love God and our neighbor, there is no universal vocation, and unlike the plants in the vegetable garden, we are not all neatly lined up in a row with a paper at the end to say what we are.”

As I look back at my own past I think that the real conquest of the party spirit occurred when the realization dawned upon my consciousness that we do not all have to be carbon copies of one another in order to please God and be welcomed into the divine family. We had often remarked that our own children were unique and dissimilar, and we thought nothing of it. In fact, we rejoiced that they were different and we could tell them apart. I cannot figure out how or why I came to believe that all who were born again had to be “the spitting image” of one another, as the old-timers used to express it.

We have not been cut out with a holy cookie-cutter to be like so many gingerbread men exhibited in a divine showcase. Instead, we are vital and living beings, translated into a new relationship by being born again. Our natural abilities and aptitudes are not destroyed in the process. They are sanctified and enhanced by the Holy Spirit until we have been recreated and made into vessels fit for the Master’s use. It is no credit to the various factions, mistakenly self-identified as the body of Christ, that they have engaged in a constant effort to pound and pummel God's children into their own moulds in order to manipulate and control them for gain or glory! They have engaged in rearing parrots and mockingbirds rather than children!

It seems difficult for most of us to do more than pay casual lipservice to the idea and the ideal of the ministry of all the saints. We are hooked on the idea of a professional clergy and cannot seriously and sincerely grasp the thought that God employs butchers and bakers and candlestick makers as his witnesses in this neo-pagan world. For a long time we kept up the pretence that we had to have a polished front man to attract the populace with smooth-flowing oratory, but now a lot of folk are "flaking off" from the "organized church" to meet in homes where they can talk to one another on an everyday plane and not be subjected to canned sermons served up from outlines in Ministers Monthly.

Of course the big problem is that we ceased to be the family of God and made the church "big business." That caused us to quit being brothers and sisters and we became "members" and stockholders. A well-oiled machine needs only cogs in the wheels to keep purring, and while a cog is as de-personalized and cold as a robot, it will keep functioning as long as you can make it believe that Jesus died for the machinery and paid his blood for the enterprise.

I think there are signs everywhere that men and women are recapturing the glorious thought that we are on earth, not simply to buy huge acreages, or pile up brick, stone and mortgages, but to share in the agony of mankind, and "helping to complete, in our poor human flesh, the full tale of Christ's afflictions still to be endured, for the sake of his body the church" (Col. 1:24). And you cannot hire someone else to suffer for you, either in the hospital or in the house of God! Heaven touches earth when you minister to the least of these!

The Majestic Experience

Mission Messenger (July 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

None are more hopelessly enslaved than those who falsely believe they are free— John Wolfgang von Goeth.

There are many experiences in this world which are downright difficult. Some of them make you feel as if you were already in eternity. For example, paying off a thirty-year mortgage in monthly installments, and wondering if you can settle up before the house settles down— in the basement. Others make you want to climb the walls and walk across the ceiling upside down like a human fly. Like taking the family on a three day vacation in a wilderness area, only to have it rain relentlessly every minute for the whole time so that you are cooped up in a two-room cabin with six kids who brought along all the gear to play outside.

But, as traumatic as such an experience turns out to be, it cannot be compared with that of trying to be non-sectarian in a sectarian world. It is not even easy to be a Christian of some standard and shelf-worn brand, but to be a Christian only is almost as big a feat as swimming the Atlantic Ocean while your friends are sailing along beside you and trying to drown you by throwing rocks at you. As proof of how hard it is, look at most of those who think that is what they are— when what they are is certainly not that!

I have been trying to make an honest stab at it for several years, but it is like cancer surgery. You are never real sure they got all of the roots and you are always consciously aware that it could break out again in a different spot. I started out to please God in a sect, a dyed-in-the-wool one which admitted it. I did not really choose it. I inherited it from my maternal grandparents who were emigrants from the old country and who brought it with them to be sure they did not leave God in Scandinavia. It was their firm opinion that God belonged to the sect also, just like a lot of other folk think that if God was on earth, he would live in the United States and vote the straight Democratic ticket. Most of us think the angels in heaven are overjoyed with what we do and the way we do it, although we have had no direct word from them to that effect.

When I got old enough to begin to question my family traditions, our little brood came under the spell of certain honest and intense folk who rightly condemned sectarianism as of the devil, and wrongly felt called of God to beat the devil out of it, or die trying! The thought of being a Christian and nothing else had a tremendous appeal to my simple mind. To be free of all human domination of pope or synod, and to belong only to Christ Jesus, struck a responsive chord that vibrated as only a heart-string can twang when plucked by the fingers of such a noble concept.

Nothing else has greater fascination for the soul of a man than the liberty for which Christ set us free. That is why it eventually came as a crushing surprise to find that I was actually part of a non-sectarian sect, and if exclusivism is the hallmark of all sectarianism (and it is the very essence of it), the non-sectarian sects are actually the worst offenders of the lot. Their adherents are always forced to put bitter for sweet and darkness for light, and end up confusing loyalty to the sect as the real test of being non-sectarian.

I have to plead guilty of propagating the partisan spirit. I am ashamed of that now, of course, but I not only preached it, I also practiced it all over the land, and a lot of good folk thought I was adept at it. They rejoiced in it! I suppose that I did make progress in it “above many my equals.” But I made two mistakes. I continued to study and think, and I got too close to Jesus. I wasn’t “zapped by the Spirit” as a lot of folk testify to being in our day. It was a little more agonizing than that. I had to go through the painful experience of extricating myself scripture by scripture, and sometimes while pulling one boot out the other was again sinking in the party ooze.

Actually, though, you do not have to jump up and throw the door of your heart wide open in one glad burst of enthusiasm and happy babbling, for the Spirit to get to you. His light is like that of the natural sun. If a little piece of the sectarian chinking or daubing falls out between the stones of your ecclesiastical rock-pile, he will beam a ray of light through, and you’ll see things in the corners you did not know were there, and which you wish you had never seen at all. Sometimes you can live more comfortably in a house when you do not know what inhabits the woodwork.

One reason I have a great deal of compassion for sectarian folk is because I know exactly how they feel. I liked being a sectarian. It is an easy and comfortable existence. You do not need to really think. That has all been done for you, and gathered up in a neat bundle and delivered to you like laundry. In fact, the most dangerous exercise in which a sectarian can indulge is thinking. If he keeps on in it he will be out because of it. And a lot of us are happier when we are sectarian. You can be certain that you will never hear any preacher who is not faithful. The Holy Spirit is in the box with us, and best of all, is concerned only with us. We are in the “ark of safety” although it perturbs us that those who are bobbing up and down outside are not trying to knock the door down and get in with us. A lot of them act as if they would rather die without us than to have to live with us. And it makes us miserable because they are so

The greatest consolation to me in my sectarian heyday was the thought of God's marvelous provision in compiling the Bible so that it justified everything we did. Only divine prescience could anticipate that nineteen hundred years after the Word became flesh that our flesh could be made Word. When I contemplated all of the lost centuries and lost millions, and realized that then we came along and contrived such a wonderful pattern, only to learn that God had exactly reproduced it and validated it in his word long before, it removed all doubt about the wonders of the divine mind. It is still a matter of astonishment that the Bible spoke as our party spoke and remained silent where the party was silent.

No one ever tears into the Bible with greater glee than a sectarian. And no one tears it apart with greater ability. To the true sectarian the Bible is the exclusive possession of the sect. It may be translated, and generally is, by other and more erudite sectarians and outsiders, but these are ignorant of the fact that God is using them to forge and sharpen brighter weapons with which to have their heads cut off by the faithful. In our particular sect we owed a dual debt of gratitude to the Holy Spirit who gave us the word, and to King James who ordered it put into shape so that we could read it. But we adored the Spirit and ignored the king. The Holy Spirit belonged to our party but the king of England did not, and the first and greatest commandment of the sectarian realm is, "Thou shalt not commend one of another party, nor shalt thou honor him in anywise!"

All that was needed to defend everything we practiced was the Bible and a Cruden's Concordance so we could find the place. We always knew it would be there but we did not always know where to look for it. It is no wonder the church went into the Dark Ages before poor Alexander Cruden lost his mind and literally became "balmy" while compiling his concordance. The truth was always in the Book but it is difficult to debate if you cannot find the exact passage required to offset and counteract the one quoted by your opponent. And, although we did not realize it at the time, we were also in great debt to Cardinal Hugo de Sancto-Caro of France, who divided the Latin Vulgate into chapters and verses about 1226. Before that time no one could give “book, chapter and verse.” They just gave “book” and folks accepted it because they couldn’t read or write their own names most of the time.

Probably one of the greatest things that has happened since I turned my life over to Jesus and no longer allow brethren to “call the shots” is the way the Bible has come alive to me. It is beautiful! I am delivered from the tyranny of having to wade through it with a fine tooth comb trying to uncover something with which to clobber those who differ. And I am also free from that subtle hypocrisy of pretending to love men openly while secretly chuckling to yourself because of having found a remote scripture which can be applied in such a manner as to make them look like simpletons. It is a big relief not to have to gloat over flattening out someone whom God raised up.

There’s a great deal of difference between a loaf of bread and a sack of sawdust when you are hungry. And there is the same difference between the bread of life and a bag of debater’s texts. I am hungry all of the time now. And I am no longer occupied with preparing to meet anyone except Jesus. I do not have enough time to learn all I want to about him before death turns the key and opens the door so I can meet him. I am perfectly content to let my opponents meet him as I do. If they can explain their positions to him over there, they need not get uptight about clearing them with me over here. I intend to hang loose and let Jesus put it all together!

There are a lot of reasons why I have adjusted my course and set my compass to steer by that eternal planet of the universe— the Bright and Morning Star! I’ve covered a lot of them in my writings before and you are probably bored to tears every time you have to read them again. But, if you'll pardon me, I want to discuss with you the one factor about the non-sectarian attitude which gives me the greatest personal satisfaction. Perhaps it is not the most profound reason one could cite, but it is the one which thrills me most.

THE NON-SECTARIAN LIFE

First, let me explain what I mean by being non-sectarian. This is very important I do not mean leaving your brethren and wandering about like a stray comet out of orbit. Actually, it is a matter of attitude, resulting from utter crucifixion and banishment from the heart of the party spirit. It is a firm conviction that while you belong to Christ he is not a captive of yours or of any group. It provides for recognition and reception of brethren across all of the silly walls which they have erected between themselves. These barriers are works of the flesh and have nothing to do with the fruit of the Spirit. They result from a lack of wholly putting the old man of sin to death. They are indications of the lingering poison of the old life still caught up in the tissues of the new. To be non-sectarian is to be able to "discern the body," in spite of the factions and sects which tend to obscure it. It is looking at the things which are not seen through the fog and mist of those that are.

The non-sectarian child of the Father has only one creed. That creed is Christ. He never allows himself to become upset and never loses his cool when those in Jesus Christ differ with him about the childish issues which men elevate from molehill to mountain status around which they encamp in partisan exclusiveness. He refuses to allow Satan to betray him into hostility against the Father's other children. The family relationship created by the blood of Jesus is esteemed of greater value than personal opinions and hangups. To be non-sectarian does not mean one does not have strong convictions. It does mean that he does not try to impose his personal faith upon others, and force them to knuckle down as the price for being received. He respects the freedom of all to think for themselves, to be loyal to their own convictions, and to stand and fall to their own master. He makes nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation!

And now for my most refreshing personal reason for endeavoring to be a Christian only, free from all factional fealty and partisan allegiance. I can embrace every truth and share in every blessing that accrues within any sect, and yet be free from endorsement of any error which is a part of the sectarian economy. Truth is not the gift of a sect but the gift of God. Any truth at which members of a sect have arrived (and all sects hold some truths), is the result of correctly apprehending that portion of God's revelation. But the acceptance of that truth does not thereby make it the possession of that sect.

I am a baptist in the truest sense of the term. The word literally means one who baptizes and this is the scriptural connotation as applied to the harbinger of the Messiah, the wilderness voice. John was not called a baptist because he belonged to a religious party which practiced immersion as opposed to sprinkling, but because he immersed those of the Jews who reformed their lives in preparation for the approaching rule of the heavens. I have demonstrated that I am a baptist upon thousands of occasions, but I am not a Baptist and have no intention of ever becoming such.

I am a methodist and with no apology for it. By proper discipline and rationalization I seek to be methodical in my whole approach to life and its demands. It is my hope that I may continue to employ methods which will be pleasing to God, and I ask your prayers in my behalf to that end. But I am not a Methodist. I am a great admirer of John and Charles Wesley and the more I read about their ardent toil and patience amidst fiery trials, the greater grows my appreciation for them. But any truth essential to my life in Christ Jesus was revealed antecedent to their day, and I accept it as vital because of its original source.

As all of my regular readers are aware I am presbyterian as relates to what we have generally, and sometimes loosely, designated “church polity.” It is my conviction that the primitive saints in each city selected presbyters to guide their communal affairs as shepherds. Such presbyters were appointed by Paul, and were to be ordained in Crete by Titus. They set Timothy apart by the laying on of hands, that he might function as an evangelist. So while I am presbyterian I am in no sense a Presbyterian.

I am episcopalian also. The word is simply a translation of episkopos, a perfectly Biblical Greek usage which refers to overseers or superintendents. Those who in our day use it as a title sadly abuse it. In the congregations of the saints there was a plurality of bishops over one congregation. Today there is a plurality of congregations under one bishop. Our friends in the Anglican communion have the cart before the horse, so I could never be an Episcopalian.

I am quite thrilled that I am in a society of friends. Perhaps nothing more clearly indicates the intimacy our Lord desires with his disciples than his decision to call them friends instead of servants. Long before he came, Aristotle declared “Friendship is a single soul dwelling in two bodies.” The reconciled ones constitute a society in the truest sense, bound together by social ties of the greatest significance. I am always moved as I read the account of what George Fox endured for conscience’ sake and I have no doubt that he was a great benefactor of the lowly and oppressed, but I am not affiliated with The Society of Friends.

To shorten the process and to avoid calling the roll let me assure you that I am identified with all that is good (as I understand what is good) in every party composed of earnest and sincere men and women. One can espouse all truth without joining anything to do so, and if he joins a party to promote a truth, he will always end up promoting the party under the guise or delusion of promoting the truth. He will be maneuvered into taking sides, not with truth against error, but with certain truths against certain errors, against other truths and other errors. This I can no longer countenance and meet my precious Lord with a pure conscience.

CONTEMPORARY ALIGNMENTS

Let me proceed a bit further and deal with current terminology, rather than with ancient sects and long-standing creedal wars. I am ecumenical in the Biblical sense. A great many folk do not realize that this is a scriptural term but the original from which it is transliterated occurs several times. It is never applied to “the church,” but always to the world. Thus, I am not particularly concerned with an ecumenical church in the one world, but I am deeply concerned with the one church in an ecumenical world.

Actually, there has never been but one “church” and there will never be another. It is a divine organism and not a human organization. Man can no more make another church than he can make another Holy Spirit. He can create sects and parties but these are not the church. All of them have appeared upon the scene too late to be the ekklesia of God. None of them is joined to the head, even Christ. The ekklesia purchased by blood includes every saved person on this whole wide earth. It is catholic, as I am catholic, but it is not Roman Catholic, and neither am I.

I am conservative, by both nature and conviction. A conservative is one who seeks to preserve the values and inherent good of the past, and no one is more interested in doing that than am I. I am also liberal, not with the scriptures which (so far as I am concerned, are fixed and complete), but with my fellowmen who, like myself are caught up in the human predicament. I intend to be faithful to the word and merciful to men, because when that word is applied to me I will require mercy in order to be justified. But I am neither a Conservative nor a Liberal. Such parties may have their place in the realm of politics, but they have no place in the domain of the Spirit.

It is obvious that if I were a Baptist I could not be a Methodist, and if I were a Presbyterian I could not be an Episcopalian. If I wanted to share the truth emphasized in one party I could not share that emphasized in another. Indeed, if I sought to share distinctive truths in all of them, by joining them all, I would not be commended as a lover of truth at all, but would be branded as wishy-washy and labeled a compromiser. For that reason, my only hope of embracing all truth is to be free of all sectarian allegiance and be joined only to Jesus. In him I can love as he loves. And he is the truth— perfect truth!

Now all of this is well and good as many of my more tolerant and generous readers will agree. But it does not wholly settle the problem, and I am now back where I started. There remains the difficulty of practicing what I know and living up to it realistically. One thing that makes it hard is that those whom I know best are all dedicated to making me a sectarian after their own image. The one thing a sectarian cannot stand is for someone in the vicinity to be non-partisan. And the non-sectarian sectarians are worse than the plain “garden variety” of sects. They cannot eat or sleep well until they take you into camp with the party handcuffs securing you. Unless they can put the brand upon you, you are “lost.” And anyone who is “lost” to them is lost to God. They are God’s Royal Mounties, and they must get their man!

All of us have grown up in a particular party, or else came into one somewhere along the line. There just did not appear to be anywhere else to go, or anything else to do. So we worked and gave and reared our children in it, and if we did not breathe into them the arrogant spirit of self-righteousness and exclusiveness, they picked it up in classes or camps, or from the imported evangelists who were brought in to convert us more firmly to the scripturalness of the status quo. All of the sermons to which we invited our neighbors, on the subject, "The Way That is Right and Cannot Be Wrong," were devoted to proving that we had it. And we kept it while losing our neighbors!

What shall we do now? Of course, the temptation always is to seek the easy way out. A lot of times this means looking around for a party that is friendlier, or that has a lot of hoopla and excitement. Most shallow thinkers conclude that we are going to have to be in some kind of a sect anyway, and we might as well choose one where they have a lot of picnics and ballgames, and where the preacher can make a third-grade reading seem profound and you don't have to think. But that is merely swapping sects.

The hardest thing, I think, is to come to terms with God where you are! Most everyone experiences a time in his life when he would like to shuck off present responsibilities, chuck his Sunday School quarterlies into the garbage can, take his Bible and "go over the hill" to settle down on a remote island, or in some teeming city where he can lose himself and get "a fresh start." But the truly courageous souls are generally those who stay put and, like General Grant, "fight it out on this line if it takes all summer."

I have a feeling that if I cannot be non-sectarian where I am I will not be so anywhere else. Being non-sectarian is like the kingdom of heaven. It is not "Lo here!" But neither is it "Lo there!" It is within you. It is not what you are in but what is in you. It is not where you are but what you are! Really, I suppose it is like much else in this world, a question of priorities. If I love the Lord with all of my heart, soul, mind and strength, then whatever else, or whoever else I love, it will always be in the proper framework and perspective. It will be in the "all" with which I love God.

I intend to smilingly and cheerfully, but firmly, resist being lined up with any faction, fraction, sect or fragment. I belong to Jesus and I belong with all who belong to him. I love them all, even while they are caught up in their childish sectarian war-games. But my allegiance is to Him, and not to movements, methods or manipulations. He is my all, and I am all his! I will never knowingly deny anyone whom he acknowledges, nor drive out anyone whom he receives.

A great many of my friends, possessed of the fear and timidity which the party spirit always breeds as an antidote to the freedom which we have in Christ Jesus, are perturbed by an article like this. They hesitate to have me go into situations which are utterly different than those in which we have waded and paddled around inside the safety of our own enclosures. Frequently letters come urging me not to allow my generosity to lead me into places where God is not.

I do not know of such a place in the universe. We are still hooked on places and palaces, synagogues and structures, temples and tabernacles. The only sanctuary God has on this earth is a consecrated person. The Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands. I do not go to some place to meet God. In Christ he came to meet me. He lives in me and wherever I am there he is also. If he was not there before I arrived I am resolved that he will be after I get there. However, I am persuaded that God is in a lot of places manifesting his presence and power, and while I depend upon him dwelling in me to keep me going, he does not depend upon me dwelling in him to keep him going. He did a fair job before I arrived on the scene and will continue to do so after I am gone. A goodly number of my critics feel that my going will improve the situation.

In any event, I shall go where I am persuaded that eager men seek the truth revealed from heaven. I am not hung up inside on signboards hung up outside of buildings. I shall not limit my witness to Pharisees and Sadducees, but will share the good news with customs officers and prostitutes. In fact, I doubt that I can take Jesus into any kind of situation which will seem strange to him even if it is a new experience for me. So I hope that my friends will stifle their inward trepidation, for somehow I have the feeling that so long as he is with me I am safe evermore. He is my everything! He is my all!

I do not intend to be a “Church of Christ sectarian,” and I do not intend to be a “Church of Christ non-sectarian,” for, in the end, there is not one whit of difference. These are only different ways of saying the same thing, although one may please your enemies and the other your friends. What I do intend, with the help of the Holy Spirit, is to “hold the head from which all the body by joints and bands having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God.” I am dead with Christ I am also alive in Christ. I shall appear with him in glory. My affection is on things above, not on things on the earth. Whatever comes, I have cast my lot with Jesus. He is my hope and my stay. He is my redeemer and reconciler. In him, I shall not fear what men may do or say. He is the Lord of life!

The Awesome Patience

Mission Messenger (July 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

Elijah, the prophet, has always been one of my favorite Biblical characters. Ever since I was a mere lad I have gloried in the account of this rugged Tishbite who lived in a time of grave rebellion and gross sensuality in Israel, and who stalked through the land, striking fear into the hearts of the godless and wicked. His favorite way of beginning a pronouncement was with the words, “As the Lord God of Israel liveth, before whom I stand.” Elijah was God’s mouthpiece to a rebellious generation.

The king of Israel at the time was a profligate no-good whose name was Ahab. His father, Omri, who outdid his predecessors in wickedness, bargained with Shemer for a large hill, paying him two talents of silver for the site. On this eminence he constructed a city which he called Samaria, in honor of the former owner, and which was planned to be the capital of the ten tribe kingdom, and also a rival of Jerusalem which God had chosen and where he had written his name and allowed his temple to be constructed.

When Ahab succeeded his father, he inherited the new city as well as his father’s wilfulness and tendency to sin. He immediately began to enlarge upon both. “And Ahab the son of Omri did evil in the sight of the Lord above all that were before him.” To compound his foolishness he fell for Jezebel, the daughter of a Phoenician king, and in order to ingratiate himself with these foreigners, he took up the worship of Baal with the fertility cults of the heathen.

When he married this female epitome of evil, he brought her to the new capital where he set up an altar to Baal in a temple dedicated to this mock deity. And Jezebel resolved with a passion to banish the name of the God of Israel from the land and to inculcate Baal worship as the state religion. Being both clever and ruthless, she realized that she would be thwarted in her design so long as the prophets of God survived, so she began immediately a campaign of extermination, purging them by decapitation.

At the time, Obadiah was secretary of state in the kingdom. He was one of the Lord's men, planted in the palace, and through his efforts a hundred prophets were rescued and hidden in a cave. There was a severe famine caused by lack of rainfall as a result of Elijah's prayer, but Obadiah managed to cadge enough food from the royal kitchen and smuggle it out to the cave, so that the prophets could be sustained even while the country was on a starvation diet.

Under the circumstances it did not require a prophet to see that eventually a real showdown had to come, and it came when Elijah and Ahab met on the road. Ahab accused Elijah of troubling Israel and Elijah denied the charge. He asserted that it was Ahab's desertion of God and his espousal of Baal which was responsible. He dared Ahab to summon the prophets who ate at the queen's table to a public confrontation. Four hundred and fifty of the prophets of Baal showed up on Mount Carmel in a highly jovial mood, prepared to make Elijah look like a spiritual nitwit. You know the rest of the story. If you do not, you can read every thrilling word of it in the almost casual language of 1 Kings 18.

Ahab had the forlorn task of reporting to his wife that the dinner table would not be crowded that evening, and that she had four hundred and fifty dead prophets lying stretched out all over the hillside by Kishon Brook. Jezebel lost no time. She sent a hastily scribbled note to Elijah, saying, "So may my gods do to me and more also, if I do not kill you the same way you killed my prophets, and I intend to do it by this time tomorrow." Elijah read the note, stuck it in the pocket of his hairy tunic and headed south.

When he came to Beer-sheba he left his servant at this frontier outpost and pushed on into the wilderness for another full day. Then he sat down under a juniper tree and asked to die. But God provided him food for another forty days of travel, and he arrived at Mount Sinai, where God had established his national covenant with Israel, beginning with the words, "I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage."

Elijah took refuge in a cave, and while sitting inside contemplating his fate, he heard the voice of God. "Elijah, what are you doing here?" The prophet justified his retirement from the scene of action by referring to the desertion of the people. "I have been very jealous for the Lord God of hosts, because the children of Israel have forsaken the covenant they made upon this scared spot. They have even smashed your altars and beheaded your prophets. I am the only one left now, and they seek my life, to take it away." The implication was that Elijah had to stay in seclusion or the Lord would be out of business.

God ordered Elijah to go stand upon the summit of Sinai where Moses had been given the law on the tablets of stone. While standing on this lonely eminence the Lord passed by. First there was a tornadic wind whose force was so great that it dislodged huge boulders and fragmented them against each other. But the Lord was not in the gale. The wind was followed with a powerful earthquake which caused the mountains to rock and reel. But the Lord was not in the frightening tremor.

Then came a roaring fire sweeping across the landscape. But the Lord was not in the fire. And then came a still small voice. Somehow Elijah knew that God was in the voice. Once again he was asked to account for his presence in this deserted place, and again he repeated his doleful statement. The Lord ignored his lament and issued orders for him to leave his wilderness retreat and return to the very center of political action. In Damascus he was to anoint Hazael king over Syria, even though he would ravish the very land from which the prophet came. In Samaria he was to anoint Jehu to be king over Israel and to preside over the death of Jezebel, the Zidonian harridan.

Enroute he was to stop where Elisha was plowing and fling his mantle around his shoulders, thus designating him as his successor to head the school of the prophets, maintained since the days of Samuel. It was the still, small voice which sent him back into the arena. God can command the stormy winds of destiny to rip and tear. He can use mighty upheavals in the earth to accomplish his will. He can send a consuming fire to destroy and sear. But they are not his weapons. He is in the still, small voice.

THE TRANSCENDENT PURPOSE

Many of my brethren tend to forget this. They feel that God can better work in times of great upheaval, moving in upon the scene with noise and excitement, with shouting and gesticulation, with din and ear-splitting sound. It would be a little silly to affirm that God cannot so order any of these to fulfill an immediate end, but the ultimate purpose of God which will change the world will probably be wrought by those who wait and listen for the still, small voice.

The transcendent purpose of God is to restore unity to a world fragmented by sin. This is the mystery of his will, the good pleasure upon which is staked the whole claim of divinity, and its attributes of omnipotence and omniscience. God is going to restore wholeness and oneness to, a distorted and disoriented creation. One who proposes to work for God and with God must have this as his own dream. Every other project is secondary, and, if it becomes an obsession, is superficial.

Our task is to contribute to the fulfillment of this eternal vision, and however minute or infinitesimal may be our contribution, we must regard it, not in the light of its own immediacy, but as a part of the program which is as certain of fulfillment as that God has revealed it. Regardless of what else I may do in life, the supreme test of my identification with God is whether or not I have surrendered myself to this overwhelming design for the fulness of times. "That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him, in whom we also have obtained an inheritance."

I am not required to know how the purpose will be accomplished, but I am required to believe that it will be, and since faith is the mainspring of action, I must labor diligently to do what I can to serve my generation before I fall asleep. I am convinced beyond any suspicion of doubt that all of the current agony of division and disunity will some day pass away. Sectarian strife will be resolved in Christ. Racial prejudice, nationalistic pride and false patriotism, social barriers and intellectual snobbery— all of these will be melted away by the gentleness of the great dynamic of that love, which God is.

I have an abiding hope that this will come to pass, and therefore a firm conviction that it will happen. I no longer look at the things which are seen. These are transitory and temporal. My faith is fixed on things which are not seen and my confidence in their reality is unshaken. Not everyone who claims to follow Jesus is either as optimistic or as convinced as I am. Most of them want to see cataclysmic earthquakes or catastrophic conflagrations. They rest their hopes in wind and flame.

They forget that this is not the divine approach to majestic revolution. We are all tempted to employ the means which seem so successful in the achievement of goals in the culture about us. We are inclined to want to promote through use of professional talent anything which we seek to accomplish. And we are prone to measure things as does the world by bulk, drive and power. J. B. Phillips is right in suggesting, "In these days when power and size and speed are almost universally admired it seems to me particularly important to study afresh the 'weakness,' the 'smallness of entry,' and the 'slowness' of God as he began his vast work of reconstructing his disordered world."

God's ways are certainly not the ways of man. He waited thousands of years before making a direct invasion of the world of sin. During these centuries of preparation he put up with the moral lapses and vacillations of those whom he had chosen, exhibiting what one noted writer has called "a frightening patience," always awaiting the fulness of the times, refusing to be stampeded and never "losing his cool" as the now generation would phrase it.

The inevitability of fulfillment justified working through individuals who were in the world, and too often of it, as well. But the divine plan was never deflected because God chose to use human agents. Indeed it was the very weakness and frailty of these instruments which made the glory of God shine through more fully. "God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things that are strong . . . that no flesh should glory in his presence . . . according as it is written, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord."

Even when the moment had come of which the prophets had spoken and toward which angelic eyes had looked, it was not done as man would have done it. Unquestionably, God's great break-through of the flesh curtain was the most momentous event which had happened since he laid the foundations of the earth and the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy. It is difficult for us to envision it as it really was, because we have glorified and glamorized it with tinsel and streamers. We tend to think of the event as artists have depicted it upon Christmas cards or in medieval paintings. But the advent of the Word into the earthly dimension is the picture of a small-town peasant girl who was pregnant, frantically searching for a secluded spot where she could deliver the baby who was even now pressing her body for deliverance.

God's way always seems to be painfully slow and deliberate to those of us who pace restlessly back and forth in a terminal when a plane is five minutes late in loading. We want to cut through the red-tape, banish the delay, wind the clock, and get the show on the road. We are geared to crash programs and are always battered by the urgent "do it now." Because the earthly life span is so short we are under pressure and tension to get things moving. And we sometimes snap under the strain and shorten the period of service.

OUR CONSTANT GOAL

Certainly if we love God and are attuned to his magnificent purpose for the universe we want to see indications that things are happening which tend to its realization. But the news media assault our consciousness continually with accounts of events which are happening and which seem to indicate that the universe is literally "coming unglued," and getting farther from the oneness which God wants to accomplish. There are riots, revolutions, racial and class struggles, and sinister portents of complete disintegration of the social structure.

One danger is that we will become so frightened by what we see and hear that we will lose faith that God's will can be done on earth. Our negativism will then make it impossible for God to work through us effectively and we will cease to be channels of his divine creativity. It is very important that we never lose sight of the fact that no destructive force is greater than the dynamic of God. Our goal should be to serve the divine will by fastening our eyes upon the ultimate rather than the immediate.

I am not called upon to achieve God's purpose for the world, but I am called upon to achieve it in my life. Since his purpose is to unite all things in Christ, the sphere of my personal influence must be devoted to that end, feeble though my talents and abilities may be. Thus, I must begin to help in making the world whole, by being certain that I have been made whole. If I am ripped apart inside by emotional upheavals caused by sin or worry I must cast my care upon him because he cares for me. I must be reconciled to God so that the personality conflicts, the doubts and inner fears, may be resolved. One who is filled with anxiety and disquiet will not accomplish a great deal in bringing peace to mankind.

Then I must begin the unifying process where I am. This may be in the family circle. If I have lived a selfish, petulant life, I must allow the indwelling Spirit to transform me and create a real concern for my loved ones until I literally fulfill the scriptural injunction to "love one another warmly." This may be a very humbling experience.

For instance, one may be a dominating personality, aggressive in the business world, assertive and demanding. This tends to carry over into the home with the result that he never really listens to his wife or children. He leaves the impression that what they have to say is not very important to him. He never seriously asks their opinion about anything, even if it affects the family as a whole. He makes all of the decisions and hands them down. The others retire more and more into themselves, as the lines of communication sag and eventually snap. Even sex relations become routine, cold and with no intimacy of sharing.

Obviously it is a human tragedy when homes fall apart, young lives are scarred and bitterness replaces affection. This poisons the social stream and weakens the fibers of national security and strength. But of even greater consequence is the fact that it also stands athwart the path of God's will for the universe, postponing the fulfillment of our responsibility to the Grand Design. For this reason, those who are reconciled to God should be engaged at once in a ministry of reconciliation to those whom they know best. Chasms between themselves and loved ones should be bridged regardless of cost to personal ego.

Next, there should be a sincere attempt to become a real force for peace in the company of local saints. This means an acceptance in love of those one cannot like. And this requires more than grudging tolerance. Entailed is a genuine concern for the welfare of the individuals and for the harmonious functioning of the body. The reconciled one must resolve never to become a stumblingblock to others in the future, and also to remove those blocks which others have piled in the road in the past.

Peace must be waged. It must be practiced, preached and proclaimed. The thought of unity must be installed in all until it becomes a real passion, a living hope. The help of the indwelling Spirit must be sought for and implored since it is the unity of the Spirit which alone can suffice. Only the fire of the Spirit can burn out of our hearts the selfishness which makes us want to have our way, the ignorance which makes us strive and quarrel, and the arrogance which prompts us to think that God approves of our bigotry.

All of this seems slow and methodical unto us. It is not involved with lightning flashes, mighty winds, earthquakes or tongues of fire. We reason that surely God could step up the divine timetable and shorten the process. And yet nothing is clearer than the fact that God resists climbing the fence and taking a shortcut. The divine purpose insists upon plodding along the main road with awful patience, turning neither to the right nor to the left.

It is not because there has been no temptation to circumvent the agony of the long trek. Immediately after Jesus was baptized he was out into wilderness solitude where Satan appeared and offered him a real “marked down bargain.” Taking him up into a high mountain he showed Jesus all of the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them. He offered him world supremacy, the adulation of a fawning humanity, bypassing the cross and the crown of thorns, but Jesus chose the “long way home,” and the devil learned what some of us have not, that “the eternal years of God” are not too long to accomplish an eternal pleasure.

If I know my heart, and God grant that I do, I am committed to working with God in God’s own way. It is for this reason that I am content to send out this almost minuscule journal, testifying of my faith, encouraging my brothers, and confirming my love to all who have set to their seal that God is true, and have named the name of Christ. It is for this reason, too, that I am willing to go wherever the Spirit opens up a door, making myself vulnerable, and exposing myself to the questions of all, openly and unconcealed.

I do not need to become frantic. I do not need to panic. If the end comes for me it will not mark the end of his precious design. I shall do my little bit in the humble station in which he placed me and hopefully die with my armor buckled on and my face toward the walls of Jerusalem. But the march will continue and God’s will must be done. And his will is more important than my life, for I will consider that whatever happens to my life is his will.

THE COMING ONENESS

Some day the sheep of God will all be gathered from the sectarian hills. Those that were lost will be found, those that were driven away will be brought back, those that were broken will be bound up, those that were sick will be strengthened and made whole. The covenant of peace will be made with them, they shall lie down in green pastures, and there shall be showers of blessing. There shall also be one flock and one shepherd.

The sectarian spirit will be purged from the hearts of all who know the Lord. The factional attitude will disappear. Walls will melt under the rays of radiant love, parties will shrivel and die. Men will not want to be rivals, but brothers. They will not seek to become Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, or Church of Christ, but will be content to be followers of Jesus, constituting one body and led by one Spirit. The derogatory term “colored churches” will pass from the pages of journals and directories. Parenthetical identifications will fade from signboards and those who have been at cross purposes will come together as the purpose of the cross.

By what means will this be accomplished you ask? The answer is simple. It will be by the most powerful dynamic in the universe— love! Legalistic minds scoff at such a thought. Men of small vision and little faith deride it. So long have we attempted to bring about oneness by debate and discussion, by conference and concordat, that the very thought of its attainment through the pervasive and gentle influence of love makes a laughingstock of one who suggests it.

But love is the weapon of the Spirit and its awesome power is derived from that fact. It is the means God chose to capture and restore a creation which had gone berserk, and it is neither weak nor powerless. J. B. Phillips writes, “This method of making people whole by out-flowing love was and is extremely risky, but it was a risk that Jesus was prepared to take.” He also says in another place, “It would be a profound mistake to suppose that all the Pharisees disappeared soon after the death of Christ, or that they have no heirs or successors today. Indeed, it is true that there is much of the Pharisee in each one of us, and by that I do not mean that we are hypocrites, but simply that we would rather reduce religion to a code, both inward and outward, than take the tremendous risk of being invaded by and becoming part of vulnerable but relentless love.”

For weal or woe, I have hitched my wagon to the star of “relentless love” as my only hope of entering into the divine strategy for putting the fragmented universe back together. I have not adopted this route because it is easy. Indeed, it is just the opposite. It led Jesus to be mocked, lied about, beaten and nailed to a cross. I do not doubt that it will tear the bleeding heart from any person who is committed to it without compromise, but it seems to me that it is the only way now available. It was the way chosen by God. If there had been a quicker and easier method of achieving success in the Magnificent Dream of the Ages, I think he would have selected it.

If it appears like an exhibition of pride for one to say that he has become convicted that the love of God is the only power which can unify a fear-filled and distorted universe, and that he has opened up the flood-gates of his inner being so that this love may be channeled through him, I hasten to add that there are two things which must never be forgotten.

First, I am an earthen vessel, and no glory attaches to me as an individual. It is not the clay pot which gives value or beauty to the flower, but the flower which gives value to the container. I am worthless except as the Master sees fit to employ me as a vessel which he has fitted for use.

Second, the love of which I speak is not a sickly, sticky sentimentality. It is not a gushy affection. It is the essence and nature of God, unconquerable and imperishable. No man can develop it by sheer force of will nor capture it by the power of that evasive quality called personality. It can only come from the Holy Spirit, and is poured out into hearts which are stripped of all pride of human accomplishment, and which have been flung down before the throne in a final act of abject surrender, in a moment which leaves one naked and exposed for what he is, and even more humiliating, for what he is not.

Once the transforming love is poured out into the heart it must be brought into contact with the polluted world if it is to be a reconciling agent. It must be made vulnerable, assailable, liable to fierce and bitter attack. One who is motivated by it must “bail out” in full knowledge that he may be shot down, just as Jesus took a calculated risk when he adopted human flesh and plunged headlong into a world of sin. There must be a recklessness about the whole thing, a diving into the middle of the maelstrom of life, trusting only to an unseen hand to hold you against the tugging riptide of disaster.

Love never gives up. It is impervious to assault. It outlasts everything else. It validates every other gift. It confirms every righteous action. It is the only transforming, energizing power which can ever restore true order to a chaotic universe. Love is God moving into the human tragedy, divinity involving itself in a fragmented world, healing, restoring and making whole.

A few months ago I attended the annual convention of a college in Florida. Through the graciousness of the brethren I was permitted to share in a public dialogue session which lasted almost three hours. On the following Lord’s Day, a brother who has been my lifetime friend, attended a meeting in a Florida congregation. The preacher used me for his text. He sought to warn his audience of one whom they had never met. He said, “Brother Ketcherside tries to love everybody, regardless of who it is.” I have never heard an accusation to which I am happier to plead guilty. I commend my dissident brother for his perceptiveness and for his succinct statement of the dream of my heart.

I want to love tax-collectors and prostitutes, Sadducees and sinners. I want to love Pharisees also. I want to love black militants and hippies, the activists and the alienated. I want to love Chinese communists and Chinese nationalists. I want to love Russian communists, Jews and Greeks, black people and white people, red people and yellow. I want to love all from A to Z— Arabs to Zulus.

In another category I shall continue to love those who brand themselves Adventists, Baptists and Catholics, and from A, B, C, right on through the whole alphabet of sects and schisms, parties and professions. Jesus did not die for us because we were righteous but while we were still sinners. Not one of us has anything of which to boast before God. And Jesus did not get us out of what we were in to love us, he loved us and we came out of what we were in if it was not compatible with his marvelous grace. I want to love people out and I want to love them in!

What debate and derogation, harangue and harassment cannot do, love can accomplish. It can soften stony hearts, melt iron wills, and dissolve differences into thin air. It can batter down barriers and make opaque walls become transparent. In short, there is nothing good that love cannot do. It will overcome anything and outlast everything else. I have bound my soul in the bundle of life, and tied the sheaf with the cord of love, dyed red with the crimson gore of Calvary.

I am staking all I am and hope to be upon love. I am risking my entire life and being, throwing everything upon the table in one glad gamble that when all else shall fade into oblivion love will shed its sublime rays upon the new heaven and the new earth, and bind all together in one great unified whole, a new creation!

Spiritual Argonauts

Mission Messenger (August 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

In the days of boyhood, when dreams gave substance to life, I used to while away the hours with books. They constituted then, as they do now, the lighter-than-air vessels enabling me to leave the poverty-stricken world of reality and soar into the delightful realm of fantasy, the magic kingdom of make-believe, where I met characters much more fascinating than those encountered on our village paths. We did not have streets.

It was thus I became acquainted with Jason, the legendary figure whose untiring devotion to a single mission held me enthralled and made me oblivious for the time to the merely mundane happenings of my puny, and often cruel, little world. When Phrixus was transported to Colchis on the back of a ram with golden fleece possessed of magical powers of transformation, the fleece was stripped from the back of the mythical animal and fell into the hands of Aeëtes, king of Colchis. Jason dedicated his life to its recovery, and sailed on the perilous journey with the Argonauts. Eventually his mission became successful through his marriage to Medea, a sorceress who was the daughter of the king.

I have long held to a view with which I suspect that a goodly number of my readers will disagree. Simply stated, it is that the philosophic Greeks with a degree of wisdom not yet possessed by their contemporaries, whom they designated as barbarians because of linguistic shortcomings, sought to embalm in myths those beliefs, traits and characteristics, which they felt to be of such magnificent import that they should not be forgotten by subsequent generations.

All peoples have sought to preserve the wisdom in which they shared by incorporating it in literature. The Hebrews, who began as a nomadic race, were not noted for their originality, but being the chosen vessels of God to keep alive the concept of monotheism in the midst of a heathen culture, were vouchsafed the oracles of heaven, and these constituted their greatest literary contribution to humanity. The easiest method of preserving truths and memorializing events is by proverb and ballad, and thus, the Hagiographa, the wisdom literature of the Hebrews, contains both the proverbs of Solomon and other wise men, and the songs of David and other composers.

I am fully aware of the conclusions drawn by some of our modern gnostics, who try to make it appear that the records related to the life of Jesus, being cast in the Greek language, were mythologized by the writers. But I do not forget that most of these reject the supernatural and deny the divine breakthrough into the human arena. They deny the possibility of revelation and although they cannot blot Jesus out of human history they try to undermine the impact of his life and teaching with their conjecture that the apostles wove a cocoon of invention around fact.

There is a great deal of difference between the wisdom of this passing age seeking to perpetuate itself in myth, and the revelation of divine wisdom which is destined to outlast, and preside over the passing away of those ages which men have labeled by their discoveries. The Greeks embodied in Jason the thought that there are values of such superlative importance as to justify the dedication of one's whole being to the search for and pursuit of them with a fidelity which knows no compromise. It is my conviction that the whole human family must engage in the quest for a golden fleece, or the golden fleece, which can transform the lives of all who touch it.

The medieval alchemist believed that since this was a universe in which there was no unrelated atom or factor, there must be a secret which would unlock all secrets and bring about the ultimate. In his dingy and pitifully deficient laboratory, he probed for the way of transmuting all of the baser elements into gold; of searching for the universal solvent; of seeking the panacea which would eliminate all sickness and cure all ills; and of discovering the elixir of life by which one could conquer the hold of death.

What he failed to find in the material realm is available in the spiritual. And it should be the goal of every rational being who bears in his inner being the stamp of God's eternal image although scarred and distorted by sin. The golden fleece for which the argonauts of the spirit must search so diligently is truth. It is this which will transform us and free us from enslavement. Even the very search for it will spare us in time of distress.

When Jeremiah was informed that he must cry against Jerusalem and predict the imminence of her destruction, God gave a ray of hope. "Run to and fro through the streets of Jerusalem, and see now, and know, and seek in the broad places thereof, if ye can find a man, if there be any that executeth judgment, that seeketh the truth; and I will pardon it." Nothing is a greater safeguard for people than to seek the truth.

THE NATURE OF TRUTH

But what is truth? What is its nature? In its very essence truth is agreement with, or conformity to reality in whatever area it is being considered. When we speak of scientific truths we refer only to that which has been verified and indisputably established. When we speak of moral truths we refer to those teachings which are in exact harmony with the ethical or moral values which have been established by proper authority for the wellbeing of humanity.

It is a common mistake to speak of facts and truths as if they were interchangeable. All facts are truths, but not all truths are facts. Fact is from the Latin factum, a thing done. There are abstract truths but not abstract facts. The deeds that are performed and the words that are spoken, constitute facts. They can be apprehended by the sense of sight and hearing, and testimony may be borne to them by one who was a witness of them. In turn, that testimony may be believed, if rendered credible, by one who had no knowledge of the acts or statements.

Our relationship to God through Christ is not based upon abstractions or rationalization, but upon belief of facts. The Good News, or gospel, does not consist of a written code, a system of deductions, or a compilation of doctrinal requirements. It is composed of facts related to a person whose entrance into and exit from the material universe brought reconciliation and hope to lost mankind. These facts are seven in number, embracing the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification of the only begotten Son of God. All of these facts are substantiated by the testimony of witnesses, the first by men chosen and sent into the world, and the last two by the Holy Spirit sent down from heaven.

The gospel was proclaimed in its absolute fulness on the first Pentecost after his resurrection, and those who accepted its demands obeyed it fully that day. Not one word was ever added to the gospel. Nothing ever spoken or written after that date became a part of the gospel, although many letters were written to those who had accepted the good news. The gospel is the saving truth of God, and since it is an account of what God has done for us and is historical fact, it can and must be believed to come into the state of reconciliation or salvation from sin.

Never has God demonstrated in greater measure that wisdom which is divine than in his provision for the saving of the human race. If it had been made contingent upon arrival at a certain degree of knowledge related to abstract truth, only the intellectually elite could have attained unto it. The huge mass of mankind would have been doomed to destruction by an imbecility they could not help. As it is, the humblest aborigine in the outback can hear the story of how Jesus came to earth, lived, died and rose again, and can be saved through faith.

It is the tragedy of the ages that men have taken these simple truths and poured them into creedal moulds, defining and re-defining them, and creating a “structure of faith,” or “a system of faith” which can only serve to confuse, and which, instead of producing joyful acceptance, has contributed to endless debate and strife. In God’s plan there is but one fact which must be believed and one act which must be performed, to bring one into that glorious fellowship of the redeemed. That fact is that Jesus of Nazareth is the Son of God and the Anointed One, and that act is immersion into the relationship expressed by the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

Every person on this whole wide earth who trusts in Jesus upon the basis of the testimony of those who were his chosen envoys, and who validates the acceptance of the lordship of Jesus over his life by this initial and initiating step of obedience is in the fellowship. He is a child of God, a member of the one body, a citizen of the kingdom, and a living stone in the temple. He may be quite ignorant of many things, including the how and when of God’s forgiveness, as well as the truths upon which he will grow and thrive, but if he trusts in the righteousness of Jesus to deliver him, and is baptized to fulfill God’s righteousness, he is God’s child. God wants to accept all who come to him. He does not throw up intellectual barbed-wire entanglements through which one must work his way into freedom, as would some of the more aggressive children who feel obligated to guard the glory road and repel all who may be more ignorant (about some things) than themselves.

It was never the intention of God to reveal all truth to man. It was never his design to reveal any truth to man which man was capable of discovering and discerning by his own ability. It was only what eye could not see and ear could not hear, and what could not be deduced by rationalization that God has revealed through the Spirit. The sacred new covenant scriptures are not a textbook of scientific, mathematical, or even moral truths. They do not constitute a written code of ethics or a compendium of legal statutes. Their simple purpose is to reveal the truth concerning God's reconciling move into an alienated world, motivated by the dynamic of love, and culminating in a restoration to wholeness of every sinful being who comes to trust in this divine thrust as his only hope of extrication from the impending doom wrought by sin.

The word of God is true! It is unquestionably and undeniably so, being an expression of one who cannot lie, because of his nature, which is grounded in verity, without a shadow of change or variation. The word of God is truth, but not all truth is the word of God, from the standpoint of having been given by revelation. Truth is not contradictory, so those truths discovered in the laboratory or by exploration of the physical universe, are not in contravention to the truth which God has spoken.

Since the truth makes men free, men must be free to probe for truth in the whole universe. God has placed no limitations upon our acquisition of truth, except those we place upon ourselves through fear or inner trepidation. It is one of the pathetic and lamentable commentaries upon the human race that those who have claimed to know the truth of revelation have used it as an excuse to throw roadblocks across the pathway or those who are the real searchers for the golden fleece. We owe most enriching discoveries to "heretics" and not to defenders of the status quo. The latter have been so occupied with devising new means to torture and destroy the former that they have had little time to discover anything else.

QUESTIONS ABOUT TRUTH

It is my intention to face up directly to some of the problems raised by my own generation as relates to truth. If my approach to these seems simplistic and unsophisticated you will have to recognize that one whose thought-processes fall within these categories could hardly do otherwise than I shall do.

Some very wise men in our age are quite convinced that all truth is relative, and that no proposition enunciated by men can ever be accepted as absolute. They have lived to see certain truths accepted as axiomatic by philosophers of other days, not only challenged, but actually shown to be relativistic. Of course, the conclusion is that, given enough time and enough money for research, and every truth will be knocked from the saddle and rendered hors de combat.

It is obvious, I think, that no one who believes that all truth is relative, can ever state it with any real hope that it be accepted. If he thinks it is true that all truth is relative, he cannot expect me to accept that as an absolute. He is either stating a falsehood or a truth when he lays down the proposition that "all truth is relative." If it is a falsehood I should not believe it at all; but if it is a truth I can only regard it as relative. If it is an absolute truth that all truth is relative, then he who states it stabs himself with his own sword and is "hoist on his own petard."

On the other hand if it is not an absolute truth that "all truth is relative" there is left a loophole for some truth that is not relative. Since I am not particularly intrigued by semantic maneuvers, not even when they are my own, I can shorten the process by climbing across the fence and cutting across the pasture without going around the main philosophic turnpike. I am quite convinced that the real question is not one's concept of truth at all, but his concept of God which makes the difference.

In the final analysis, the question of whether there is absolute truth in a universe inhabited by fallible men, must be determined for each of us by whether or not we believe in an infallible God. This means that it is a question of faith and not merely one of rationalization. Do not be mistaken at this juncture. It is not a question of faith for just one party, he who believes in an infallible God. It is also a question of faith for the other who believes there is no such divine being.

If I start with an infallible God, based upon my interpretation of the evidence for such a being in the universe, I not only can believe there is absolute truth, but I am forced to believe it. On the other hand, if I start with fallible man as being the highest order of intellectual being, I must reach the conclusion that any proposition stated by such a being must be regarded as relativistic by all of his peers.

It is for this reason that I have argued, and still do when I can get anyone to listen, that truth in its origin and its ultimate is not propositional, but personal. That is, it is not embodied in propositions, either at its source or terminus, but in a person. Every proposition before it is expressed exists as a concept or mental image. Propositions are not conceived on paper but in minds. Before any truth was ever proposed it was first composed in an intellect. Thus, when traced to its source, infinite truth existed in an infinite mind, and was and is absolute, because of the nature of divine intelligence, which is not in degrees, but perfect. What makes truth absolute is that truth originated with God.

Jesus, the Word of God incarnated, declared, "I am the way, the truth, and the life." He did not mean that he was the embodiment of propositions about him, although these conveyed truths. But he was truth in its origin, truth so ineffable that we must await freedom from our flesh and blood in order to fully grasp it. The Word of God has not been exhausted by words of God. There is truth yet unrevealed. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." In its ultimate truth will again become personalized. Just as the light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world will preclude the need of sun or moon and resolve itself into the glory of God (Rev. 21:23), so truth affirmed, proclaimed and believed, will again be personalized in its creator and our benefactor.

Now, if you will permit, I should like to think with you about the truth which makes men free. At the very outset, let me affirm that every truth produces freedom to the extent that it is apprehended by an honest mind. It is the nature of truth to strike the shackles from men's hearts. Ignorance is dispelled, superstition is erased, and darkness flees, when the door is thrown open and truth is allowed to penetrate the inner being. Men are enslaved to the extent of their ignorance and there is no one of us who is wholly free from mistaken views, nor will we ever be in the flesh. It is a part of the human predicament that we will not be able to know everything, and will always be ignorant about much. Just as light pushes darkness back only to the extent of its wattage or power, so knowledge of truth dispels ignorance only as far as it penetrates.

THE TRUTH THAT FREES

At this point I wish to examine the implications of the statement of Jesus to certain Jews, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free" (John 8:32). I once equated the word truth here with the words spoken by Jesus. Now I am not so certain of that position. I am inclined to think that the truth which frees is the Son of God, and it is not the accumulation of facts about him but the experience of an intimate sharing relationship with him that brings freedom. Jesus is the truth who sets men free, and his word is intended to bring us to this experiential relationship.

Actually, the encounter which led to this statement began in the temple treasury when Jesus informed them that he was the light of life and that those who followed him would walk in light rather than in darkness. The Jews countered with the legalistic objection that his claims were valueless because they represented only his opinion about himself. Jesus responded that their judgment was on a purely human basis. He cited their law which validated testimony at the mouth of two or three witnesses and pointed out that the Father concurred in his testimony.

The exchange led him to say, “If you believe not that I Am (the I Am) you will die in your sins.” Because they could not grasp what he was saying about his relationship to the Father, Jesus declared, “When you have lifted up the Son of man, you will know that I Am (the I Am) and that I do nothing of myself, but I speak only the things which the Father hath taught me.” Upon hearing this, some of the Jews overcame their skepticism and believed in him.

It was to these that Jesus made the statement we are examining. Discipleship consists not of merely hearing a man once and mentally assenting to what he has said. It involves a consistent willingness to hear and to implement his teaching, conforming the life unto the message. Disciples indeed are the committed ones, those who continue in the word. But the purpose of the testimony is to lead one to Christ as the Truth and the Life. Life does not come from knowing scripture but from knowing Jesus.

“And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent” (John 17:3). “This is the record, that God hath given us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life” (1 John 5:11, 12). “You search the scriptures, for in them you think you have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me, and you will not come unto me that you might have life” (John 5:39).

In the same way it is Jesus who makes us free. We are exhorted to “stand fast in that liberty wherewith Christ has made us free” (Gal. 5:1). In the very context in which Jesus says we will know the truth and it will make us free, he explains his statement in these words, “If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.” The purpose of the written word is to guide us to the Living Word, and inform us how to walk in love as he loved us. Jesus is the great liberator. He sets the captive free. He is the truth who makes it possible for me to share in that liberty which belongs unto the sons of God.

It is very essential that we distinguish between the truth which saves and truths related to our salvation. All truths are equally true but all truths are not equally important. When one commits himself to Jesus as the truth, he thereupon pledges his allegiance to all truth as he learns or discovers it. If he loves Jesus he loves him who is the truth, and he will love truth for truth’s sake, because of the very nature of the one to whom he belongs.

But it is not necessary for one to know all of the truths contained in God’s revelation to be saved, else no one would ever be saved. When one is in Christ it is not so much how many truths he knows at a given time that counts, but rather his attitude toward truth all of the time. We are saved by the truth of the gospel, and the spirit of the gospel is Jesus Christ, the Son of God. There will never come a time that we will not be learners or disciples, but if we knew all truth at a precise moment, we would cease to be seekers after truth. One is not a disciple because of what he knows but because of who he follows.

So long as we continue to hide behind the dishonest facade that men are saved because of how much of the Bible they correctly understand we are going to be frustrated and divisive. An intellectual power structure will develop which will hand down to the uninformed and illiterate masses what they must subscribe to in order to be saved, and these written and unwritten creeds will be parroted by intolerant partisans who cannot explain them without calling in the clerical representatives of the local headquarters.

We will automatically damn millions of unfortunate souls who were born in areas of the globe where formal education was denied them, or where circumstances in life made it impossible for them to receive schooling. They will be forced to trust in the wisdom of men and not in the grace of God for salvation. God has made salvation contingent upon believing the report of a herald that he entered the world in the form of a Son and took the burden of my guilt to a cross where his blood atoned for my transgressions. I am saved by hearing, believing and responding to news. If my salvation hinges upon understanding, interpreting and assimilating a code of doctrinal and abstract truths, I can never know that I am saved.

Not only will I be doomed to go through my earthly life span always doubting whether I have learned enough to make a passing grade on my final examination, but I will develop a kind of Pharisaical arrogance which will make me draw back from all who have not reasoned out the same truths which I have discovered, or who have found truths I do not regard as such. Thus, I will make the faction composed of myself and my henchmen the dispenser of grace rather than the recipient of it, and conclude that no one can be in the good grace of God who is not in the good graces of the party.

I reject unequivocally this whole sectarian approach to the mercy of God. A knowledge of truths related to both nature and revelation is to be eagerly desired and fervently pursued. But neither in the natural or spiritual domain is life dependent upon how much one knows about abstract truths, or the nature of the domain in which he lives, moves and has his being. Some very ignorant people may survive in the world which is not very gracious, and some very ignorant people may abide in the family of the Father who is very gracious.

Knowledge is better than ignorance, but lack of knowledge is not a sin unless it results from a deliberate closing of one's eyes. There is a great deal of difference between blindness which one cannot help and which he strives to overcome, and the deliberate blindfolding of the eyes by one who prefers not to see. There are two kinds of ignorance— voluntary and involuntary — but only the first is sin, and it is sin because man is a responsible being, and by deliberately remaining ignorant chooses to fall below his potential.

We must make a distinction between transgression, disobedience, and error in thought or judgment. Only an infinite mind is capable of perfect knowledge. For those who are fallible the only possibility is to eliminate areas of error by a maturing process which is slow and often even painful. If perfection in knowledge is a requisite of fellowship with God there is no room for compassion and divine mercy is a cruel hoax. The great question must always be, not what think ye of this, or that— the millennium, the perseverance of the saints, or pacifism— but what think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?

It is more than slightly dishonest to urge men and women to choose Jesus, if there are a lot of hidden mental inclinations of our own which they must also choose, or be cast out of our synagogues as an indication to God that we are faithfully separating the goats from the sheep and saving him the trouble later on. The very least we can do is to print a copy of our policy and list all of the requirements, exemptions and stipulations, and hand it to those who come forward and urge them to read it and study it and consult with their lawyer before signing up by baptism.

It is a little bit diabolic to baptize people into Christ on the basis of one great proposition and then throw them out because of the fine print in our human creeds. We should meet them at the water's edge and see if they can pronounce our shibboleth, and if they cannot we should slay them as aliens lest we be guilty of murdering God's children later on. Only God can lay the axe at the root because only God knows the secrets of the heart. Any other would-be executioners are self-appointed and generally a little careless in their sideswiping. Fortunately they usually cut off their own foot while aiming at another's head, and go limping through life as an object of pity to those who prefer shaking hands than swinging fists.

TRUTH IS UNIVERSAL

The truth of God is a body of revelation composed of many members as is the physical body. Not all of these are essential to being. Some are essential to wellbeing. The selection of any of these and its elevation out of proportion to the rest is not a sign of faithfulness to God or truth, but an indication of a diseased heart. All truths are important only as they relate to all other truths and undue emphasis of one does not represent clear rationalization but warped thinking.

When such a truth becomes a standard around which a tribal encampment is formed, or a totem around which a faction engages in a war dance, it is made the basis of sectarianism, which is a work of the flesh. No truth becomes less true because of factional emphasis and this creates two dangers. First, the party which selects a truth as a rallying-point always neglects other truths in an avid and fanatical defense of its beau ideal, while those in other parties frequently deny that truth in order to destroy the rival faction. God has raised up an ensign around which Jew and Greek must rally. It is not a truth or a proposition, but the truth embodied in a person. "And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse which shall stand for an ensign of the people; to it shall the Gentiles seek; and his rest shall be glorious” (Isaiah 11:10).

Our tribal encampments, with each tribe around its own standard, separated from the holy place by a royal guard of the priestly caste, belongs to the legalistic age which originated on Sinai. It has no relevance to the covenant made at Mount Zion, the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, with its myriads of angels. It is indicative of the sad fact that God’s people have overlooked the significance of the unifying power of the blood of Jesus. They are living B.C. lives in an A.D. world. They are not really one loaf and one body!

It is ridiculous to give the name of a mere man to a truth uncovered by sincere study, and to build around the man and his discovery a system which results in a distinctive “ism.” Martin Luther, as a reformer, did a great service to humanity, when he dug beneath the rubbish of centuries and found and polished the lamp of “justification by faith” and lighted it again. But justification by faith and its concomitant peace with God, was not a truth of Martin Luther but of God.

When a party was built around the reformer and his voluminous writings, and it was mistakenly called “the Lutheran Church” that party was dedicated from that time forward to promulgating Lutheranism. As a humble disciple of Jesus I acknowledge every truth (and there are many) in Lutheranism. But I acknowledge none of these as Lutheran truths, for there is no such thing. Truth is the beneficent gift of a God who is love to all of his creatures, even as is the atmosphere we breathe.

Men may purify the air even as they may pollute it, but they cannot create it, and it is no more their atmosphere after they purify it than it was previously the atmosphere of those who polluted it. I hail with appreciation every scientist who purges the air of pollutants and takes us another step back toward its original purity, but I do not breathe it as his air, for it belongs to all of God's creation, even to those who do not recognize its source.

I appreciate more than I can express the efforts of John and Charles Wesley, John Calvin, George Fox, Roger Williams, and Pope John XXIII. I cheerfully give my approbation to any truth which they enunciated. But I am not a Wesleyan or a Calvinist. I am catholic in faith but I do not identify with "the Catholic faith." I am literally a baptist, and have demonstrated it in thousands of instances but I am not a communicant of the Baptist Church. I could not take the truth about baptism and build a sect around it. I am a friend of Christ but I am not in the "Society of Friends." I would never take a relationship, even of an amiable nature, and build a sect around it.

By the same token, I am not identified with a "Christian Church" party. I am fully aware that the disciples of our Lord were first labelled as Christians at Antioch in Syria, and I am thoroughly familiar with all of the arguments pro or con, relating to whether this designation was divinely bestowed or used in derision by the pagan society. I have no real feelings about its origin, but like the apostate Agrippa or the apostle Peter, I accept it as an adequate term to identify the followers of the Messiah. However, I do not forget that many who followed him suffered and died for their allegiance before anyone knew they were Christians. I would never take a name indicating a relationship and build an exclusivistic party around it. It is a truth that the disciples were first called Christians at Antioch, but it is not true that one cannot be a disciple of Jesus unless he acknowledges and adopts the appellation of Christian.

I am not identified with an exclusive party designated in the census records as "Church of Christ." Once I was a "Church of Christ Christian," just as at an earlier date I was a Lutheran. I was as honest in one as in the other. I knew some truths in the first relationship and many more truths in the second. But I did not quit studying God's previous revelation, and the same Spirit which helped me see the sectarian and exclusive spirit of Lutheranism helped me to see the sectarian and exclusive spirit of Church of Christism.

I am a Christian and I am in the community of saints created by the blood of my precious Savior. I acknowledge readily and freely every truth which my beloved brethren have discovered, insofar as it commends itself to me as truth. I cheerfully commend them in what I can conscientiously endorse or sanction, and in what I cannot approve I commend them not. But I am a free man in Christ Jesus. My allegiance is to the Lord and not to any institution. I am thus at liberty to accept all truth without at the same time endorsing a system which may include some error.

This leads to another very valid conclusion. I am also free to recognize and acknowledge every child of God as my brother and to treat him as such. Whether such a child of God is in the Church of Christ, the Christian Church, the Baptist Church, the Church of God, or any other party, he is my brother because he is God's child. I do not receive one because he is a Baptist but because he is a child of God. If I received him because he was a Baptist this would preclude the acceptance of all who were not Baptists and would make me a sectarian.

One becomes a child of God by the adoption of God. He becomes a Baptist by his adoption of the Baptist creed, just as another becomes a Methodist by his adoption of the Methodist creed. One is by the election of God, the other by the selection of man. So I do not receive Baptists, Methodists, or Presbyterians, for these terms are strangers to the revelation of heaven. I receive those who are the children of God, and if they happen to be among these, I still receive them.

I am fully aware of the fact that because I refuse to leave the brethren whom I love and with whom I have been more closely associated I will be accused of continuing as a sectarian.

But such an accusation overlooks one thing. One can be in a sect without being a sectarian, just as one can be in Russia without being a Russian, or in America without being an American.

Sectarianism is not a location but an attitude. It is not who you are with but who and what you are for. It is a spirit, a motivating principle, a dominating influence. The very word means a “party spirit.” It is one thing to be associated with a group of saints, but a wholly different thing to possess a party spirit. Through the Spirit of God I have been able to crucify the flesh and its works. I am able now, without qualm or fear, to move among all who love God and share with them my feeble insights. I praise His name for making it possible for me to serve others in love. What a thrill, what joy to know that I am his, and he is mine! And thousands of wonderful brethren are now being delivered from the sectarian spirit to joy and rejoice in Christ Jesus alone. This is the Lord’s doing and it is marvelous in my eyes!

As I view it, there is only one community of saints, or church, on earth. All who are in Christ are in it. He is the head of the body, and we are individually members of it. I am not joined to him because I am joined to others, but I am joined to others because they are joined to him. Our unity is in Christ and through him. It is not upon a horizontal but upon a vertical plane. If a brother is joined to Christ I cannot separate from him without separating from Christ. If I remain in Christ, I must receive all whom he receives.

I do not establish the relationship with Jesus by identification with a party, but by personal faith and obedience. And everyone else upon earth who believes and obeys is added to the one body, and is indwelt by the one Spirit. To deny the fraternity with God’s children is not a reflection against them but against myself and God, who is their father. To refuse to recognize his children does not destroy fraternity but derides paternity!

It is not my intention to rally a following around myself or any of my concepts. To do so would be to form another party. A non-partisan party is an anomaly and would be as sinful as any other party. Let men accept truth where they are. Let them respond to it, obey its demands, share it and allow its power to be felt. Let it work from within every party to leaven it with the love of God, to erode away the party spirit, to destroy the factional attitude.

I hold myself ready to accept every truth that I learn. I will not fear what men will do unto me. I am free from all men even while I am the servant of all. I will stand or fall to but one master. I will allow all others to be free under God. If a brother sincerely feels that he can better serve our loving Father in another segment of believers, he will go with my feeble blessing. He will be no less my brother while he is there and no more so if he returns to labor by my side.

The way for me is Jesus! The truth for me is Jesus! The life for me is Jesus! I want to walk in that way. I want to share in that truth. I want to love and live in that life. I shall rejoice in whatever may be his lot for me. “If I must boast, I will boast of things that show how weak I am. The God and Father of the Lord Jesus— blessed be his name forever!— knows that I am not lying” (2 Cor. 11:30, 31).

I am grateful that my unprofitable life has been spared to this day. I am thrilled that the Spirit has overflowed my heart, flooding it with the love of God. I am joyful because I have come to know and experience the truth, and he has made me free. Praise the living God, I’m free at last. It is a genuine thrill to be here as an argonaut of the spirit, and to look forward to that transcendent freedom when this mortal will put on immortality and this corruption will put on incorruption, and death will be swallowed up in victory. “O glorious victory, that overcomes the world!”

The Hope That Cheers

[Abstract]

A few days ago I received a letter from a young couple in a western state who were in the throes of a spiritual depression. They had been reared in the Church of Christ in Texas and had both attended since they were infants and had been carried in the arms of their parents. Now they were facing a traumatic decision. The situation in the local congregation was such that they felt miserable and unhappy and they saw no possibility of its changing for the better. Instead, they felt that it would grow worse.

They painted a rather grim picture of a congregation caught up in the enslaving bonds of legalism. The sermons on Lord's Day were sterile and dry, with the preacher grinding out the same old grist, and administering dosages of the same old pap, which had no relevance to life. The elders were good men except for their jealousy for their position and assumed authority. The congregation owned a nice physical structure, purchased chiefly with Texas money, but it had become a monastic setting from which the Spirit had fled. The young people had also departed the scene as they became old enough and about all that was left was the boast of loyalty, not to Jesus, but to tradition!

Recently a man and wife who were teachers in the local schools had been driven out as "liberals" because they had proposed closing down on Wednesday nights to allow the handful of “faithful” to visit other religious organizations or to remain home and share with their own families. After the suggestion had been made and emphatically vetoed by the elders, the preacher began to insinuate that there were subversives among them. The scriptures were quoted to show that “men would arise speaking perverse things to draw away disciples.”

The teacher and his wife, tiring of being harangued under cover, began to visit other places on Sunday nights, cultivating the acquaintance of prominent Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians. They began a prayer and study session for these in their home, only to be visited by the elders who informed them that they would not be allowed to continue unless an elder was present at each meeting. They had to be under the “oversight” in all public or private teaching of the Word. Without raising his voice, the teacher said that his first obligation was to God and he would not desist from teaching in his home or anywhere else that an opportunity was afforded. Charges were preferred against him of rebelling against the authority of the elders, and were signed by the preacher who wrote them out and by the elders who read them publicly. Notice of the “withdrawal” was sent to every congregation in the whole area.

The young couple who wrote me in their bitterness of soul wanted to know what had happened to the church. They were distraught and disillusioned. Their world had fallen in on them. I think they should not be so disturbed for what has happened was inevitable. And it is not limited to the Church of Christ but is quite characteristic of most religious denominations in our age, especially those which have known little of the grace of God, and whose members have regarded themselves as “keepers of orthodoxy” and members of the squad of “heavenly law officers.”

One of the first grave mistakes of our fathers, and they made a lot of them, was equating a movement inaugurated to restore unity, with the church of God referred to in the scriptures. After they had done so and had fastened on the designation “Church of Christ” to distinguish them from others, they began to think of themselves as the kingdom of heaven to the exclusion of all who did not at once join their number. One who searches the new covenant scriptures will realize that they describe the church but do not designate it with a title. When our immediate ancestors did so they denominated it and thereby launched it into the rivalry with other sects and denominations which continues until this very day.

In a sort of unwarranted arrogance they challenged all others to deny that the historical movement was scriptural in name, origin, faith, doctrine and practice, and convinced themselves by textual manipulation that what they had contrived was identical with what the apostles had planted and any deviation from the “traditional pattern” was heresy and apostasy. In the days when ignorance was widespread on the frontier, and few men could read, the scrap-doctors had a field day, but we now live in an age when men have been taught to think for themselves. With the current intellectual explosion every authoritarian structure is in danger and no religious party can escape the challenge.

Every dogmatic institution feels the threat of unprejudiced thought and seeks ways to inhibit and prohibit it. For decades it was dangerous to think originally in the Churches of Christ. All truth had been discovered. The plan of God had been perfectly restored. There was nothing left but to be faithful to our tradition, although we called it “the faith once delivered.” Any new thought was an innovation. Preachers became parrots rather than proclaimers. The church seemed to have borrowed a leaf from Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar:

Let me have men about me that are fat,

Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights:

Yon Cassius has a lean and hungry look;

He thinks too much: such men are dangerous.

Now we are passing through a period of soul-searching and re-examination, and this is good. It is also upsetting and those who like for things to move with unrippled calm are often disturbed. But the "sea of glass" is in heaven. So long as we are upon earth we will have troubles and there will be waves. Such a condition is necessary to test our faith and our steadfastness.

My hope is not founded upon parties and movements. These are the work of men, honest men who seek to recapture the divine purpose. But I am grounded on the Rock of Ages. My identification is with him. I shall not be moved away from the hope of the gospel. Come what may, my life is hid with Christ in God. I intend to stay so close beside him that nothing will shake me.

I know a brother and sister in Christ who are no longer young. Realizing that one day they will come face to face with the Lord of glory they began sometime ago to use the largess with which God had blessed them to mail out copies of trenchant material showing the corrosive and spirit-shrinking influence of the legalistic spirit. For this they have come under the suspicion and criticism of the local "somewhats." Every Sunday morning without fail the preacher issues veiled warnings of "the subversive influence among us." Sermons are punctuated with the suggestion that "if you do not like the church you ought to get out of it."

But while this aging couple may not like much of what passes for religion, they love the church. They are willing to spend and be spent for it. So they return each Sunday to their modest home to pray for those who think of them as dangerous traitors to the very cause for which they have sacrificed so much. The number of such people is growing. They are not all youthful revolutionaries, either. Many of them have whitened locks and walk with stooped and bent frame.

They have grown tired of bigotry and intolerance. They are fed up with negative preaching by the products of schools created to defend the sectarian status quo. They are doing their own thinking. They are studying afresh the revelation of heaven. They are casting off the partisan garb in a desire to don the robes of righteousness. And it is because of this that the spirit of factionalism has fallen upon hard times and the spirit of fellowship is growing in the land.

The secret of life is wrapped up in him who revealed the secret of the ages. The commandment of God which assures that what we ask will be granted is to pledge allegiance unto him and to love one another as he has loved us. Let not one who does this spend his time in nurturing remorse, or in nourishing hostility or fear. As Charles Sumner has expressed it:

The world, with ignorant or intolerant judgment, may condemn; the countenance of companion may be averted; the heart of friend may grow cold; but the consciousness of duty done will be sweeter than the applause of the world, than the continuance of companion or the heart of friend.

Argument from Silence

[Abstract]

It has been my intention, God being my helper, to refrain as much as conscience will permit, from direct confrontation with other editors among the brethren. If they differ with my position I prefer to publish notice of their presentation and urge my readers to secure it and read for themselves. I want no rival except Satan and I do not intend to edit a partisan journal.

Occasionally, however, I feel it necessary to state my convictions in opposition to an editorial, and when I do, I seek to be as objective as possible without being objectionable. I now find myself at the place where I must again disagree with my brother, Reuel Lemmons, editor of Firm Foundation. I propose to say a little about his article “The Music Question,” as it appeared in the issue of June 20.

I would prefer, of course, to have my reply appear in the pages of Firm Foundation, but there is no hope of my “crashing the barrier.” The last two articles I submitted were returned with curt and polite notes to the effect that our brother does not intend to provide me an audience where I can exhibit my thinking about the fellowship of the Spirit. He wants to protect his readers from any views on the topic which he does not regard as orthodox, so he has pulled the paper shade over the window. I respect the right of the brethren to read what is said on all sides of an issue without clerical interference. I do not think my readers are so ignorant they must be fed only pre-digested journalistic fare. For that reason, I will again print his editorial in full, so that you may have both positions before you for study.

Brother Lemmons regards himself as the golden mean between two extremes. Almost all editors feel this way about themselves, but he advertises himself as walking in the middle of the road. This is intended to conjure up an image of a faithful stalwart marching squarely down the white line in the center of the pavement while everyone else is slogging through the weeds and underbrush on the right hand or on the left. This is hardly a picture of reality. Our brother remains in the middle of the road by dashing frantically from one ditch to the other. Occasionally he slips and sticks one foot into the swamp up to his knee. His distracted supporters hardly know from week to week which flag to wave.

I mention this so that if my reply seems outdated by the time it appears, I urge you not to throw the paper away. Save it, and when the merry-go-round makes its circuit, it will be appropriate again. Brother Lemmons is not wholly to blame for this. He is caught in an editorial vise. He edits a paper for a many-hued party, which he acknowledges is quite inconsistent, so he is forced to develop chameleon-like traits, if he is to please all of what he refers to as the “heirs to the Restoration movement.” But here is his editorial. Read it carefully.

THE MUSIC QUESTION

One of the main roadblocks on the path to unity among heirs of the Restoration is, admittedly, the use of instrumental music in the worship of the church. Many feel that this is the main difference between two great wings of the movement. We have repeatedly maintained that the instrument is not the problem; it is a symptom of the problem. The reason why we have two bodies, almost totally out of fellowship with each other is not the instrument; it is a difference of attitude toward the Scriptures.

Usually when we say this certain liberal writers ridicule the idea, but they are careful not to deal with it. We feel that it must be dealt with and settled before there can be any real hope for closer fellowship.

Rooted as far back at least as the Protestant Reformation are two attitudes toward the authority of the Scriptures. One holds that where God has not specifically legislated concerning any matter we are free to do as each chooses to do; the other holds that God's failure to allow is tantamount to prohibition. Both groups have the same respect for God's plain and specific commands; it is in the realm of God's authority in areas of silence that we differ.

There are some areas where all of us respect the authority of God in areas of silence. In the Lord's supper we have unleavened bread and fruit of the vine. Why? Because God's Word says so. Why do we not have ham and gravy on the Lord's table? Because the Lord's failure to allow is tantamount to prohibition. We have only two items because the two items are specified. The very failure to specify anything else we accept as prohibition against anything else. By what reasoning can we exclude ham on the Lord's table and include instrumental music?

Conrad Grebel, in his book Spiritual and Anabaptist Writings says, "Whatever we are not taught by clear passages or examples must be regarded as forbidden, just as if it were written: this do not . . ." Detrich Philip in his Enchiridion or Hand Book says, "Many ancient and modern teachers have examined into and concluded . . . that whatever God has not commanded, that he has prohibited. Hence all worship and service that is not ordained or instituted by an express command of God is wrong."

We believe this principle to be a righteous one. We do not see how anyone really serious about restoring the faith and practice of the first century church can afford to be presumptuous in any area where God has not authorized us to go.

The principle has its application in many areas other than the instrumental music area. Because God has not specifically prohibited a missionary society many assume that it is all right to have one. Others feel that since God is silent about a superstructure for the pyramidal organization of congregations into a super church machine it is all right to have one. Others feel that God's provision for congregational church government excludes by its very silence such organizations. To be consistent one would have to apply the authority of God in areas of silence to the instrument question as well as to the church government question. By what logic could one be free in one area not specifically prohibited and bound in another area just as free of specific prohibition?

And we find among non-instrumental people an inconsistent application of the principle also. Some who would not consider using the instrument because of God's prescription for vocal music and the absence of his command for anything else, will stoutly defend methods of regulating, governing, and controlling the work of the church about which the silence of God is profound. If the silence of God is enough to forbid the use of the instrument why is not the silence of God enough to forbid the creation of other institutions to do the work of the church? If the lack of any Divine directive is grounds for excluding something from our worship why is not the same lack of Divine directive grounds for excluding non-scriptural organizations from our work?

There are many things other than the music question that indicate this difference in attitude toward the Scriptures. Both sides should be extremely careful in dealing with them. If God's failure to say, “Thou shalt not . . .” frees us to do as we see best, then there are vast fields of freedom that none of us have dared yet to explore. Practically anything would go, for God has said, “Thou shalt not . . .” in very, very few instances in the New Testament. On the other hand if we are bound to interpret the absence of a direct command as a prohibition, many of our own projects are suspect.

Because of the unwillingness of most heirs of the Restoration to apply with any degree of consistency either interpretation, a large segment of the Restoration movement has given up as wholly untenable the entire Restoration plea and hold it invalid. Before there can be any degree of unity between the elements that remain we must honestly deal with the question of the authority of God in areas of silence.

REPLY TO THE FOREGOING

The use of instrumental music is not really a roadblock to unity. It is only a mental block to the recognition of unity upon the part of certain men who love instruments of music, or love their opposition to them, more than they love brethren. Unity is the gift of the Spirit. We are to keep it in the bond of peace. Every person in whom the Spirit of God dwells is united with Christ and I am united through Christ with every such person. Those who think of themselves as united with a “great wing of a movement” are obviously going to remain aloof from those in the other wing. They are sectarian. What we must realize is that a “movement” cannot get off the ground on only one wing. No movement can really move while its wings are threshing each other. It will remain grounded!

Wings are for the birds. I am no longer the least bit interested in being a member of a wing. I am a member of the one body and it embraces every single one of God’s precious children. Jesus is head of the body not lord of a wing. Brother

Lemmons is not going to contribute one thing toward what he calls “closer fellowship” by merely being “Wing Commander” of an exclusive party which he mistakenly identifies as the called out community of the Prince of peace. We do not have two bodies, as he puts it. There are two wings, which are sects, both of which mistakenly think they are “it.”

Our brother is eminently correct in maintaining that “the instrument is not the problem.” He is seriously off base when he asserts that “it is the symptom of the problem.” The real symptom is an article such as our brother wrote. It betokens a grossly mistaken view of what constitutes worship of God, and a childish approach to the majestic fellowship into which we have been called of God. The problem is the same as it was at Corinth, the carnality and immaturity which allows men under the guise of faithfulness to the Father to kill off his other children and to set at nought their brethren as if the scriptures had been utterly “silent” on the matter.

I think that a lot of perceptive brethren on all sides are getting fed up with the constant drumming on the theme, “It is a difference of attitude toward the Scriptures.” Brother Lemmons has been trying to produce harmony by sawing away on this one fiddle-string, and he is out of tune even on it. This accusation is a red herring which has been dragged back and forth across the trail for almost a century, and every time brethren set out on the road to peace, someone brings it out again and they are led off baying into the wilderness until they become exhausted.

As usual, our brother makes it appear that only “liberals” will deny his thesis. The word “liberal” is a dirty word to readers of the Firm Foundation and it rouses the rabble. Our brother uses it to frighten off anyone from making a reply to his article, or to keep the gullible from reading a reply if one is made. But the tag “liberal” is another red herring, more fishy and smelly than the first.

I'm no longer frightened by the silly terms brethren use as brands and stigmata. Everyone is a hobbyist to some and a liberal to others. I can bring you a pile of religious magazines in which Brother Lemmons is assailed as a "liberal" and one of them says he "out-liberals the liberals," whatever that means. Any person who does not accept our brother's diagnosis or take his prescription is a liberal. I am not going to ridicule his idea about what is affecting the "wings," but I do say it is simply a rehash of a simplistic and unworkable approach which contains no answer to the problem and will only prolong the agony.

In the first place, he projects an image which is as counterfeit as a three dollar bill. He writes as if there were "two great wings," one of which has a correct approach to the scriptures, while the other has a fundamentally warped idea of interpretation. The idea is that if those who use instrumental music will approach the scriptures as do those in "the right wing" we will have "hope of closer fellowship." Then, pray tell us why those in the "right wing" are more divided than almost any other group on the face of the earth?

Brother Lemmons is the authority for stating recently that there are more than two dozen segments of the non-instrument wing. Some of these exhibit a greater degree of hostility and bitterness toward one another than do people in the world who are alienated from Christ Jesus. There are more than twenty-five little wings in this one great wing. Indeed, if brethren who use instrumental music all gave it up for "the sake of unity" they would then have to decide where to cast their lot. If they went with Brother Lemmons they would come under fire from one direction as liberals, and from the opposite as hobbyists. They would soon learn that "the authority of silence" is pretty flexible and can be bent around like a licorice rope to justify what you want while condemning what the other man has.

I deny that our current problem is rooted in "two attitudes toward the authority of the Scriptures." That is just not the case and as long our brother keeps on thinking and writing that it is, he will aggravate and perpetuate the problem while offering no solution. I have, for several years, refused to make a test of union or communion out of a congregational decision to accompany praise with the sound of instrumental music, despite my own personal preference and conviction. I have moved freely among all segments of the restoration movement heirs, sharing with them my insights when permitted to do so, and listening to them when they refused to listen to me. I can speak from some measure of experience.

My brethren who use instrumental music respect the authority of the scriptures. They love the Bible. They teach respect for it and inculcate a deep and abiding reverence for its precepts. They do not intend to wilfully and maliciously oppose God's will in anything. It is a false accusation against these brethren to say that they do not regard the authority of the Scriptures. It is just not true!

Brother Lemmons admits that both groups have the same respect for God's plain and specific commands. This means that all equally and cheerfully accept what God has said. They all hear what the Spirit has spoken to the churches. This is interesting! Will obedience to the plain and specific commands make one a child of God? Is one saved if he keeps all of the commands? Does Brother Lemmons respect the plain and specific command not to set at nought a brother? What about his attitude toward the command, "Welcome one another, therefore, as Christ has welcomed you for the glory of God"?

But he replies, "It is in the realm of God's authority in areas of silence that we differ." Can an honest difference about what God has not said destroy the relationship created by doing what God has said? Can a mistaken view about something not revealed damn one who properly respects all of God's plain and specific commands? Does not Brother Lemmons make God's silence more authoritative than his revelation? Who is to interpret and enforce the authority of God in areas of silence? Who is to determine why God did not speak? Who will fill in the blanks? Who will determine for all men everywhere the purpose and motivation of the infinite Father in areas where he has not deigned to command?

Where does the Bible speak about “the authority of silence”? What book, chapter and verse plainly defines and delineates it? Our good brother affirms that as far back as the Protestant Reformation there have been two attitudes toward the authority of the Scriptures. “One holds that where God has not specifically legislated concerning any matter we are free to do as each chooses to do; the other holds that God’s failure to allow is tantamount to prohibition.” But these are not attitudes toward the authority of the Scriptures. They are personal attitudes of those who respect the Scriptures. These are presuppositions used as a frame of reference in which to approach and know the will of God.

These are mental spectacles through which to read, but there is a difference between the spectacles and that which is read by their use. Spectacles are donned before the reading begins. What Brother Lemmons needs to do is to quit accusing sincere brethren of lack of respect for the authority of the word of God and attack their spectacles. Why does he not do so? The answer is plain. He also has spectacles. The presupposition of those who oppose Brother Lemmons is secured from the same source as that from which Brother Lemmons secured his presupposition, that is from human deduction.

There is no scripture which says “God’s failure to allow is tantamount to prohibition.” That is a human deduction from what a certain school of thought thinks is taught in the scriptures. God did not say that. The Holy Spirit did not reveal it. Our brethren have rationalized about the implications of certain isolated statements and incidents recorded in the scriptures and have fashioned an intellectual approach or bias, to interpretation of scripture, which they believe is fair and honest, but which they now mistakenly equate as equal to divine revelation. Brother Lemmons' entire thesis is that unless you agree with his presupposition you do not respect the authority of the Scriptures. Other brethren respect the authority of God's Word but they do not think that Brother Lemmons is the divinely-ordained optometrist for the whole family of God.

This places the matter in proper perspective. A great many brethren respect the authority of God who do not bow to the authority of Brother Lemmons. They love the Word which came from heaven but they do not put the word which proceeds from Texas in the same category. They know the difference between the firm foundation of God which standeth sure, and the Firm Foundation which our good brother edits and which sometimes wobbles. Many brethren do not think that Brother Lemmons can speak for them in areas where God has not spoken to them. It would thrill their souls if Brother Lemmons would be as silent as God is in "areas of silence."

HAM ON THE TABLE

The ham and gravy on the Lord's table is a little bit childish. A lot of thinking brethren are full up with it. They wish our brother would quit passing it. Read this once more: "Why do we not have ham and gravy on the Lord's table? Because the Lord's failure to allow is tantamount to prohibition." Is that the only reason Brother Lemmons does not place ham and gravy on the Lord's table? Is it the real reason? Has my brother never learned the principle of apposition as relates to the selection and interpretation of symbols? Does he not realize that even finite men in choosing symbols seek to find those which naturally or logically depict the thing to be symbolized or memorialized, and it would thus be charging God with folly to imply that ham and gravy might be apt substitutes for bread and the fruit of the vine in portraying and proclaiming the death of the Son?

Our brethren have too long indulged in such trifling in debates. We need to pray for them that they will mature beyond this state. I have no hesitancy in saying that it is not merely the “Lord’s failure to allow” which keeps me from having ham and gravy on the Lord’s table. A great many brethren believe they can furnish reasoning by which they can exclude ham on the Lord’s table and include instrumental music with their praise. They would like to ask Brother Lemmons some questions about how he can oppose instrumental music while freely including some things he already has, and I do not mean ham and gravy. Since I am not in any sense a defender of the use of instruments, even as an aid or an expedient, I will allow brethren who are to handle that phase of the problem.

Our brother refers to Conrad Grebel and cites a quotation from what he calls “his book on Spiritual and Anabaptist Writings.” Brother Lemmons is confused. The quote is from an anthology of texts printed in the Library of Christian Classics, XXV. It is entitled Spiritual and Anabaptist Writers: Documents Illustrative of the Radical Reformation and Evangelical Catholicism. It was jointly edited by Angel M. Mergal and George Hunston Williams. I mention this because several of my readers I have encouraged to become researchists in The Radical Reformation as opposed to The Protestant Reformation and The Catholic Counter Reformation. Brother Lemmons also makes reference to “Detrich Philip,” who was really Dietrich (Dirk) Philips, whose book of 650 pages was issued in 1564 under the title of Enchiridion or Handbook for the Christian Soldier.

I happen to be a great admirer of Conrad Grebel, leader of the Swiss Brethren. I appreciate Felix Mantz of Zurich, in whose home Grebel launched the Anabaptist Movement by baptizing George Blaurock, January 21, 1525. But Brother Lemmons quotes from these men because he thinks they agree with his views. He would drop them like “hot potatoes” if he knew how they applied the principle which he says is righteous. I have previously dealt at length with our brother’s use of the word “presumptuous” in this connection. You will find it in the chapter called “Facing the Issues,” starting on the first page of my book Our Living Pattern [title of the bound volume of Mission Messenger for 1970 —e-Editor]. That chapter explores fully another editorial in which our brother cites scriptures which, at the time he used them, he felt would justify his position.

INCONSISTENCIES

But now I am especially interested in the candid admission that “We find among non-instrumental people an inconsistent application of the principle also.” I want to enquire if our brother puts these inconsistent ones in another “wing of the movement” than the one he is in. Does he withdraw from them? Does he exclude them from his “fellowship”? If not, why not? Why condemn them for their inconsistency in application of a principle if he is flagrantly guilty of inconsistency in application of another?

He writes, “Some who would not consider using the instrument because of God’s prescription for vocal music and the absence of his command for anything else, will stoutly defend methods of regulating, governing and controlling the work of the church about which the silence of God is profound.” This can mean nothing else than that our brother is in the fellowship and working with men who, to use his term, violate “the realm of God’s authority in areas of silence where we differ.” Why does he continue to labor with these who ignore the authority of scripture in those areas in which “the silence of God is profound”? Our good brother should blush to mention inconsistency in application of principles.

I challenge him to name those “among non-instrumental people” who will “stoutly defend” their intrusions upon areas of silence. Let the truth be known.

He wrote a whole series of articles attacking what he was pleased to designate the “hidden body and poison of error” of Brother Ketcherside. He mentioned my name fifteen times on one page of his journal. But he will never name those to whom he now alludes. They are members of his party. They are allied with the faction for which his journal speaks. They are in his “wing of the movement.”

Will our brother be specific about the “methods of regulating, governing and controlling the church” fostered by our non-instrument brethren where the silence of God is profound? What are these methods? Who is guilty of promoting them? What are the “other institutions to do the work of the church”? Is he referring to orphan homes, homes for the aged, or homes for unwed mothers? Is he talking about the Herald of Truth radio and television programs? Does he refer to the annual conventions (called lectureships) where churches make their displays, present their financial appeals and have a clearing-house for missionary involvements? Is he talking about “preacher training schools” where one congregation becomes a committee of the whole to train preachers for others? Is he referring to the one-man pastor system which we seek to conceal under such innocuous titles as “local evangelist”?

What are these “other institutions” created by non-instrument brethren? I challenge my good brother and fellow-editor, who has made this public accusation, to clear the air. He is quite open about instrumental music. In the interest of that consistency which he rightly espouses let him now level with us on these other matters.

Brother Lemmons asks a point-blank question. “If the lack of a Divine directive is grounds for excluding something from our worship, why is not the same lack of Divine directive grounds for excluding non-scriptural organizations from our work?” While he grows gray and becomes aged waiting for an answer to that one from Tennessee or Texas, I would like to ask him a question. “If the endorsement of instrumental music is grounds for your excluding brethren from your fellowship, why is not the creation of other institutions to do the work of the church grounds for your exclusion of brethren from your fellowship?" Do you not argue that both are guilty of violating "areas of silence"?

Let me tell you the reason why our brother will continue as he does! He is a member of an anti-instrument party. Firm Foundation is a journalistic mouthpiece of an anti-instrument party. The partisan test of the faction is an attitude toward instrumental music. This is the "Jolly Roger" which flies over the party fortress. If you are opposed to instrumental music you are with the "in group." Regardless of your position on war, divorce and remarriage, legalized abortion, social drinking, betting on horse races, racial hatred, or even those three "C's"—cups, classes and colleges, you can stay in. These have nothing to do with loyalty to Jesus. They do not affect your membership in the Lord's church. You can smoke cigarettes until your fingers turn brown, your lungs are seared, you cough your guts out, and have to beg money to buy schoolbooks for your children, but you need not worry as long as you are "sound on the music question"!

Brother Lemmons will never exclude those who endorse the "many projects of our own which are suspect." Do you know why? Because they are our own. And the "our" refers to the anti-instrument faction. These are "non-instrumental" people who invent instruments to help them in the work of the church but deplore human instruments to help in the worship of the church. The fact is that it is only when you have instruments which you claim aid in worship that you are cast out of the synagogue; aids to the work only cause you to be sniped at from behind the bushes, but you can stay in and worship with us.

THE REAL ISSUE

All I have said thus far is introductory. It will indicate that I am nauseated with the whole maggot-infested bill of fare served up by our rival restaurants which claim to exist to feed the spiritually-starved multitude. In their partisan establishments the milk of the word has become clabbered, the strong meat has become putrid and the bread which came down from heaven has been allowed to grow mouldy. And what I say is not limited to only one of “the two great wings of the movement.” Neither of these has a copyright on ignorance, littleness or bigotry. I have found some of the most narrow, legalistic, nit-picking minds among brethren who use instrumental music I have ever found on earth. Identification with those who conscientiously oppose instrumental music does not mean you are devoid of graciousness; identification with those who endorse it does not make you a paragon of virtue. Instrumental music is not the litmus-paper test for spiritual acidity or the vinegary disposition.

Now let me get on with the real issue. In his final statement, Brother Lemmons says, “Before there can be any degree of unity between the elements that remain we must honestly deal with the question of the authority of God in the areas of silence.” This is precisely what Brother Lemmons cannot do. It is impossible for him to deal honestly with this question, and since he cannot do so, he will never promote unity. He is destined to make pieces of the body rather than to make peace within it. He has no formula for unity, no strategy for waging peace. He can only aggravate the sore. He can never provide balm for its healing.

Brother Lemmons cannot deal honestly with the question because he already has his mind made up. He equates his philosophic approach to scripture with scripture itself. His prescription is God’s will and it must be bound upon all. He is the doctor and all others who enter into dialogue with him are patients. Actually there are no areas of silence for our brother. He has filled in all of the blanks. God has spoken in plain and specific commands through the apostles, and in areas of silence through Brother Lemmons. Areas of silence are no longer valid for others because our brother has spoken. The non-instrument brethren are the official interpreters, the supreme court, in areas of silence. If you disagree with them you have lost your case, and any attempt to appeal beyond their jurisdiction will result in banishment, forced exile and ostracism. The organizational Church of Christ has become the “god of the gaps.” These are serious charges but I do not think they can be successfully denied.

There is little real difference in principle between the authoritarian Roman Church and the Church of Christ. Both claim to be the one holy, catholic and apostolic church of God upon earth. The first has an infallible interpreter; the second an infallible interpretation. When the pope speaks ex cathedra, what he says becomes dogma, and when our brethren render the official version of what God meant when he did not speak, it also becomes dogma. One must subscribe to it upon the pain of excommunication. If he ventures near one of our seats of higher learning he is subjected to an Inquisition. Rome has its college of cardinals and we have our cardinal colleges. As a result of our “Great Schism” we even have our Western Church with a sort of holy see in Texas, and the Eastern Orthodox with international headquarters close to Disney World.

And we can no more produce peace with our present stance among the fragmented heirs of the restoration movement, than Rome can promote unity among what she refers to as the “separated brethren” in the Protestant Reformation. Our only appeal is “Come unto us all ye that are heavy laden, and swallow your consciences as you come!” Our proposal for unity is what is known as the snake and frog proposal. And we are not the frog! We only think in terms of complete surrender— not to Jesus, but to us. Regardless of how you stand with Jesus, if you do not stand with us, you are out. It is the party spirit, not the Holy Spirit, which counts.

The Church of Christ “wing” represented by Brother Lemmons is not a unifying element in the religious world. The other wing is not too much better off in that regard. As proof of the fact that Church of Christism cannot unite the religious world one needs only to remember that it has fragmented our segment of the heirs into a couple of dozen splinters. The question no longer is “Who split the log?” It is now, “Who shivered our timbers?” How can our brother talk of restoring unity between the wings when his own wing looks like a cyclone hit it, and all of the feathers are clobbering one another over the air waves? Can such polemical pinions ever produce peace?

Then, is there no hope? Indeed there is! In very truth, I have never been more optimistic in my whole life. We are facing the dawn of a whole new day. It will not come as the result of efforts of Brother Lemmons. Leaders of factions will never produce it. They will hinder it. But the winds of change are blowing. There is a new “great awakening” coming, praise God! And just as the previous one produced non-conformists such as Barton W. Stone and Thomas Campbell, so this one will introduce men of stature, men of God, who will transcend our sectarian barriers. In generations to come their names will be hallowed as peace makers even as now they are harassed as heretics.

But what about “the authority of silence”? It can never be woven into a creed to be used as a criterion for measuring the faithfulness of others. We dare never formulate a theological confessional yardstick enabling us to ask, “Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that the silence of the scriptures forbids the use of instrumental music in conjunction with praise?” Areas of silence can govern only individual consciences. I can never use my conviction in such areas as a means of judging or a ground for despising brethren. I must let them stand or fall to their own master. I must have my conviction to myself.

I am going to receive my brethren. I am going to welcome them— all of them! I am going to receive them in spite of their hangups over music, spiritual gifts, orphan homes, television programs, the clergy system, educational institutions, cups, classes, colleges, or Firm Foundation editorials. I doubt that I will ever fully endorse the thinking of any other man. I never did, and unless I lose my own mind, I doubt that I ever will. I don't even endorse what I thought ten years ago. Praise the Lord for that!

Reuel Lemmons is my brother. So is James DeForest Murch. I do not have to go to a unity meeting to learn how to be in fellowship with either one of them. Jesus settled that for me on the cross in a new covenant written on the hearts of men and signed in blood. Nothing that my brethren conclude in a motel session on unity will unsettle it for me. Jesus is Lord over my life and I intend to obey his plain and specific new command, the one about loving one another as he loved us all.

The way for Brother Lemmons to “honestly deal with the question of the authority of God in areas of silence” is to quit playing God with the lives of other brethren. It is not the authority of God which divides us, it is the authority Brother Lemmons and other preachers seek to exercise where God has not spoken. Let's receive our brethren in Christ, in spite of their presuppositions and mental spectacles, and then we can talk with them the rest of our lives about our differences, not as warring and hostile tribesmen, but as brethren beloved in the Father.

I do not believe God wants his children to become outcasts, driven off and theologically murdered because of their opinions about the things that we make such great issues. Let congregations of saints who respect the authority of the word determine how they will render their praise, and let the rest of us respect congregational autonomy enough to keep our “whickerbills” out of their business. If they are wrong God will straighten it all out. If I am mistaken in my human weakness as I strive to please the Father, let it be in receiving His children!

About Movements

Mission Messenger (September 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

The continuing tragedy of the ages is that good men, in an honest attempt to offset division, seem always to end up fragmenting further those whom they seek to unite. The problem is thus augmented by the very ones who seek to solve it. Every reformatory movement grows old and crotchety, suffering from hardening of the arteries and high blood pressure, with all of the symptoms of aggravated senility. Such noble attempts are like the dauntless pioneer who blazes new trails through an unbroken wilderness, only to eventually retire to the front porch of his cabin to puff on his corn cob pipe, and hold his trusty rifle at the ready, to gun down anyone who would dare explore beyond his clearing or staked-out claim.

The reason for this is obvious. Men equate the movements for which they live with the church for which Christ died. Any criticism of their creation is regarded as an attack upon the ramparts of heaven. But the search for truth and ultimate meaning is endless. Those who think they have arrived have actually departed. There is nothing wrong with writing a personal creed, for a creed is but a statement of what one believes. The sin is to cease writing creeds, and bind yourself today to defend the immature faith of yesterday.

One is truly safe only so long as his creed is Christ, for Christ is living, vital and active in the universe. He is the same yesterday today and forever, but I am not. I must grow and develop and be transformed. To argue that I must not change my mind because Christ is unchanging in nature is, in its final analysis, to argue that I no longer need Christ. One who is flawlessly perfect in appearance requires no mirror, unless he seeks only to admire himself.

A movement which ceases to move soon becomes a monument. There is a great difference between the two. A movement heralds hope for the future while a monument portrays only the glories of the past. It is absurd for those who live in the twentieth century to be shackled to a movement of the nineteenth century. To do so means acceptance of men who were caught up in history on the same basis as the Savior who was caught up to heaven. The canonizing of heroes always involves the crystallizing of their views, and results in venerating traditions under the guise of fidelity to the faith. There is a great difference between walking in the old paths, and wallowing in the old ruts!

Only an open-ended movement holds forth any hope of uniting the saints. The moment we shut the gate to hold what we have gained, we forfeit our freedom and forsake our ideal. It is those confined within walls who are in prison and not those who are without. When a movement becomes “a church,” by whatever title it may be designated, it automatically casts itself in the role of a sect, and must be prepared to engage in all of the petty rivalry and paltry politics which are a part of the sectarian stance. To call a scriptural name over a party no more makes it the body of Christ, than a cow becomes a horse by so designating it. The body of Christ has no specific title and needs none.

It is a little silly and quite absurd for anyone to castigate “the denominations” while arguing for a special designation or denomination for the party of his affiliation. To denominate means to name, to give a title to, and any person who defends a particular name as the one authorized by heaven only accuses the Holy Spirit of forming a denomination. Clever debaters who affirm that their exclusive faction is “scriptural in name” do not realize that in trying to establish their contention they only succeed in proving it is unscriptural.

Perhaps our greatest hope for the future lies in the fact that so many are becoming restless and tired of the institutional image with its trappings and tom-foolery. They are weary of tenting on the old playground, and they want to shoulder their packs again, not to march off into the sunset, but into the Risen Son. We are strangers and pilgrims on the earth. A stranger is one who sojourns in a land which is not his own; a pilgrim is one who seeks a better place. To be one of these without the other is not enough!

The trumpet is sounding again for ears which were not previously attuned to its stirring summons. There is little time left to mourn over the mistakes of the past, or to extinguish the gray ash of the campfires around which we huddled, by the gushing fountains of tears. Let the dead past bury its dead! Tomorrow will be brighter than today. The millions of the earth are stirring in expectation. The future belongs to him who dares to capture it as his own!

Let us not embalm truth in an attempt to preserve it. We are not here to save the truth, but the truth is here to save us. Let it be free, and let those who proclaim it be free. Let them be free to go where they can, let them be free to penetrate the fragmented worlds of our day. Let them be free of the grasp of skeletal hands from the sepulchers, and of the rusty fetters of tradition. The voice of heaven is heard again summoning us to new tasks and new responsibilities. Let us heed it!

The Body of Christ

Mission Messenger (October 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

One of the most thorough studies of the community of the reconciled as constituting the body of Christ is found in a remarkable section of that division of the First Corinthian letter which we designate as chapter twelve. It appears in a context of the regulation of spiritual gifts when used in the public gatherings of the saints to praise God and edify one another, but there are many incidental lessons to be learned from a study of what Paul wrote. We can refer to only a few of them.

1. The unity of the body is a unity in diversity. Indeed there could be no functioning organism upon any other basis. “If the whole were one single organ, there would not be a body at all; in fact, however, there are many different organs, but one body” (verses 19, 20). “There are varieties of gifts, but the same Spirit; varieties of service, but the same Lord; and many forms of work, but of the same God” (4, 5, 6). The members are no more alike than are the hands, feet, eyes and mouth of the physical body. Fortunately, in the human body the members are not dedicated to the formidable task of making one another over, for to do so would make it impossible for the body to exist.

2. There are no useless members or superfluous parts. Just as every fleshly organ has a function to perform, so there are no non-functioning organs in the body of Christ. No one is merely “going along for the ride.” God has made no provision for spiritual hitch-hikers who get their transportation at the expense of others. There are no parasites. “But in fact, God appointed each limb and organ to its own place in the body, as he chose” (18). The task of each member is to determine the sphere in which he can function and then do whatever is commensurate with his ability. We are not all equally gifted.

3. The unity of the body is the natural result of adherence to Christ. So long as all are joined to him they need be no more concerned about being one than the various members of the physical body need to worry about their joint relationship. There is one great difference. In the human body some members are joined to the head only because they are joined to other members, but in the body of Christ all the members are joined to one another only because they are joined to the head. There are no remote or secondary members in the spiritual body. The oneness is produced by Jesus. “For Christ is like a single body with its many limbs and organs, which, many as they are, together make up one body” (12). Our unity is personal and is found in the person of Jesus.

4. Every member of the body comes into the relationship in identical fashion. Regardless of the variety of gifts and services, or the differing degrees of knowledge and understanding, and these are many and pronounced, the relationship to the body was established by the same process. Here there can be no difference for the simple reason that the conformity to any other procedure does not bring one into the body relationship. Regardless of how sincerely one may do something else, sincerity is not the key which unlocks the door, but compliance with God’s will. Such compliance transcends all national, ethnic, and social considerations. “For indeed we were all brought into one body by baptism, in the one Spirit, whether we are Jews or Greeks, whether slaves or free men” (13).

5. In this new relationship we are all sustained by divine provision. Our hunger is appeased, our thirst is quenched, our life is renewed, and our growth assured, by partaking of the Spirit. In baptism we are led into the element, but in our new relationship the divine nature is imbibed by each one. The Spirit leads us into baptism into the one body, that He may dwell in the body of each of us, for the body is the temple of the Spirit. "And that one Holy Spirit was poured out for all of us to drink" (13).

6. The body of Christ is not a human organization, but a divine organism. A human organization depends upon legislation, regulation and manipulation by men. It cannot function without an official board, or without laws and bylaws, charters and covenants. In an organization the entity is created and receives its life from without, but an organism provides life from within. In an organism the body provides life for the members, in an organization the members provide life to the body. Human organizations are always affected by death, and when all of the members enter the grave, the organization ceases to be. The body of Christ is not affected by death, since death only transfers the members to a closer association with Him, uninhibited by the limitations of space and time. A body is never dead so long as the head is alive, and death has no dominion over our head. He met death and overcame it once for all!

7. Membership in the body is not contingent upon being able to perform the same function as any other member of the body. The foot can transport the physical body to the place of work, and may even help the hands earn a living. This is especially true in the operation of a machine equipped with a treadle or foot-operated lever. One does not ordinarily steer his car with his feet, nor apply the brakes with his hands, although he may do so if he is a stunt man or a serious cripple who has specially-built appliances. But the foot should not be envious of the hand or count itself out, because it cannot do the work of a hand. "Suppose the foot should say, 'Because I am not a hand, I do not belong to the body,' it does still belong to the body." (15).

8. Membership in the body is not dependent upon recognition of one's relationship or value by another member. Our relationship is not created by men on earth but by God. It is He who appointed each limb or organ to its own place in the body. No other person on this earth can affect your relationship to Jesus. No man can add me to the body, no man can eject me from it. The pronouncements of persons against me are powerless unless I allow them to affect me. "The eye cannot say to the hand, 'I do not need you.'" (21).

9. Division in the body is avoided through recognition that those who seem to be more frail and unseemly are actually indispensable, and by exertion of special effort to give honor to those who might be regarded as humbler parts. It should never be forgotten that parts are essential to the body, but parties are detrimental to it. Parts help it to function, but parties hinder its functioning. The quickest way to form parties is to create cliques. Those who are left out will soon be out. God needs us all and we need one another. "All of us are smarter than any of us"!

An Old Remedy

[Abstract]

One of the biggest problems most of us face, I suspect, is dealing with the opposition of what Paul refers to as “wicked and unreasonable” men. It is still true that “all men have not the faith” and that one can be in “peril among false brethren.” Much as we would like to have our associations always run smoothly we must face up to the fact that they will not, and this requires the adoption of a philosophy, or the development of an attitude, which will keep us from coming unglued when the tensions are great.

I have found an old prescription upon the shelf of the divine pharmacy which seems to me to be a genuine guarantee of one’s mental and spiritual health when under attack, and it has worked wonders in my own case. The bottle bears the label “Elixir of Psalm 37,” and a proper dosage of it taken when stress arises will help you conquer the inner strain and come through to calmer and brighter days. I would like to analyze the entire content, but time and space will not permit of such a complete diagnosis, so I will content myself with a cursory examination of the first few verses.

Verse 1. Fret not thyself because of evildoers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.

The Hebrew word translated fret is charah, to blaze up or get hot. Verse 2 shows that evildoers are short-lived and if you can “keep your cool” you will outlast them. If you allow anger to inflame you, there is a danger that you will go down before they do, and that way you will leave the field to them. “Blowing your top” is a good indication that you are light-headed, and “flipping your lid” is an admission that there is a screw loose which should have been tightened before the pressure gauge popped off.

Envious is from qana, jealous, and it is possible that jealousy has killed more people than workers of iniquity. The “green-eyed demon” gnaws away at your insides and will literally eat holes in you. Your sleep will be ruined, your digestion upset and your disposition spoiled. A jealous person is one who is afflicted with poison envy. What I have said thus far relates to the negative aspect, and now I want to move to the four-fold positive recipe.

Verse 3. Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.

Note that while those who jealously spend their time planning evil and revenge will be lopped off like weeds, those who simply plant their roots in the soil of faith will not only continue to live but are assured of being sustained. The process of trying to “get even” is the most costly in which one can engage. Vengeance belongs unto God and when we seek to exercise it we pay the price for playing God. We need to trust God. He will work things out in his own good time.

The word for fed is raah, shepherd. The thought is that God has his eye constantly upon us. He will guide us, lead us and feed us. A sheep does not have to turn aside to “bump off” a wolf while the shepherd is there. Verse 39 declares that God is the strength of the righteous in the time of trouble, and verse 40 says that he will help them, deliver them and save them, because they trust in him.

Verse 4. "Delight thyself also in the Lord; and he shall give thee the desire of thy heart."

It is difficult for many of us to do this because we have been taught to be afraid of God. We think of him as stern, relentless, exacting and oppressive. It is only within the past few years that I have been really able to delight in him. I am no longer uptight or scared stiff like a motorist hauled before a police judge for an alleged infraction of the legal code.

God really wants to give us the things that will make us happy, but sometimes we are so miserable and depressed they would only make us sick. No mother is going to give a child ice cream if she knows it will upset his digestive apparatus. If we can really tune our hearts in on the divine wave length and be happy in the Lord we can receive the desires of our heart without reservation. I no longer fear what men do unto me and my joy knows no bounds except my own capacity for rejoicing.

Verse 5. Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him; and he will bring it to pass.

The word commit is a translation of galal, to roll over. The picture conveyed is that of one who has a load which is too heavy to carry, and which he is forced to push or roll along because he cannot shoulder it. The literal rendering would be "Roll thy way upon the Lord," that is, to let God shoulder your worry and care. "Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you."

Our accomplishments are in the hands of God. We dare not make our plans as if he did not exist. We cannot say that we will go into such a city. We cannot say that we will live there during the next year. We cannot prophesy how much we will make. All we can do is to submit to the divine will and allow him to bring it to pass.

Verse 7. Rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.

The word rest is a term which means to be silent, to sit relaxed without engaging in debate or controversy. Only one who is truly convinced that his cause is right can sit quietly without recrimination and wait for God to vindicate his cause in the ongoing history of the world. Many become loud and clamorous because of their inner insecurity. They must defend and propagate their cause while they live, knowing that once they are gone it will collapse.

When one is unreservedly convinced of the righteousness of his position, and is firmly sold on the idea that he is working together with God, he can afford to quietly state his case and leave the outcome to heaven. There need be no frantic attempt to solve every problem or to gain recognition. One can “go with grace and leave the driving to God!”

The secret of the fulfilling life is found in the words “in the Lord,” or “unto the Lord.” Trust in the Lord, delight in the Lord, commit your way unto the Lord, and rest in the Lord. This eliminates fretting and panic, and provides security even while others are laying plots against you. The life of trust is the happy life, the life of joyous freedom and holy abandon!

What Is Your Life?

Mission Messenger (November 1972)

[Abstract]

An Address Made to a Midwestern Youth Conference

All of us here today entered life the same way. All of us will leave it the same way. We gained access by the door of birth, we will exit through the gate of death. Our coming was not voluntary. It is likely, if we are rational at the time, our going will not be. But, between these two crises, spanning the entire distance is the greatest of all adventures, the one called life. Its success or failure is primarily a matter of volition, of personal choice. Life, at least in a relative sense, is what we make it.

What is life? What is your life? This startling question challenged the writers of the Bible. It still challenges the modern scientist. It invades the gleaming laboratory where a white-coated researchist seeks to reproduce life from the isolated tissue in a test tube. It constantly creeps into our own intellect, interrupting our meditations and stimulating our imaginations. In its final analysis, life and death may be more closely related than we like to think. Death has been defined as separation. What we call life is but a sequence of separations. Our maturity at any stage of existence may be gauged by our response or reaction to such separations. In some respects, we die often, and by the same token, we are born frequently.

1. Our first separation is at birth. It is appropriately called delivery. It gives us individual status. It makes us a separate entity in a vast universe. After conception we exist as an embryo, then a fetus for the period of human gestation. During this time we are in the mother, but not, in reality, a part of the mother. No human being is ever truly a part of another, but always apart from every other. Birth separates us from our sheltered abode. By it we enter the world on our own and by our own struggle. We literally fight to gain our “place in the sun.”

2. Later, comes visual separation. The toddler wanders into another room. He realizes that he is separated from his mother. Unaware how he got where he is, and not knowing how to return, he sits down and gives vocal expression to his need for companionship.

3. Intellectual separation really begins in our democracy when the child starts to school. Often it is a distinct shock when thrown into strange surroundings, the mother leaves him and returns to the home which has been the foundation of his security. Because he is a social being, the child soon adjusts, if normal, to his new surroundings, and additional companions.

4. More complex in its problems is the personality separation which begins in adolescence. The child is still in the home, remains under parental discipline, but is growing apart from the parents. He feels in the home but not of the home. Nature has contributed to the effect by physical and mental changes. The boy finds his voice changing and becoming deeper. Hair begins to appear upon various parts of his body. The girl finds her figure becoming more rounded. The menstrual cycle begins.

Contemporary with these physical alterations occurs certain mental and intellectual processes. It is a period of overt revolt against discipline with a secret longing for its application; a period of doubting which intrudes into the religious and moral spheres. There is a recurring question as to whether the indoctrination of the parents has been correct, a fear that the past has not provided a proper basis for the future.

Recognized for what they are, these symptoms can become a part of an enriching experience. Improperly evaluated, they provide a period of stress, strain and storm for both parent and child. Unfortunately, in too many cases, neither is qualified emotionally to render proper decisions, or to view the developing pattern objectively.

5. Marriage is both a separation and a union. This is evident from the edict of God, "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and cleave unto his wife, and the two shall be one flesh." "Leave" and "cleave." That the term "leave" was not used in a purely geographic sense is evidenced by the patriarchal practice of establishing the married sons and their families in proximity to the rest of the clan. Actually, there can be no real mating of a husband and wife until both cut themselves loose from the mother or father image. "Mom-ism" as it is labeled by modern psychologists is clearly a sign of immaturity. It is also the basis of much marital discord.

6. The final separation is that of the spirit from the body, the immaterial and immortal from the material and mortal, with the consequent decay and decomposition of the latter as it returns to its primal elements. We call this death, using the term in a desperately final sense. But in some respects we die often, for we die each time there is a separation. By the same token, in some sense we are born anew each time. A chapter is finished, a new one begins. But the word "finis" can never be written at the close of a human existence, for the book is never finished. Even the eternal state is but a new adventure, a new experience of the spirit, unending as the spirit itself. "Dust thou art, to dust returnest; wast not written of the soul."

The careful observer will see a design in these separation experiences. They are not irrelevant or unrelated. Each is a preparation for the succeeding one. The separation from the uterine abode prepares us to stand upon our own feet. This, in turn, prepares us to walk out of the range of parental vision, and this makes it possible to go to school without having the parent present in the room. Thus we are freed to formulate our own thoughts, develop our own concepts, and crystallize our own views apart from parental inspection, and so we are prepared to break away from another shelter, the home, as once we struggled out of the womb. So we are prepared to form a new union, and since our only means of perpetuation on earth is by procreation, we begin new lives to continue our ideals after our bodies crumble and merge again with the dust.

Since life is a sequence of separations, maturity at any given time is the proper reaction to such separation. None of us is ever completely mature, for the experiences in previous phases of our cycle have become imbedded or ingrained in our subconscious mind, and occasionally, under impulse, these float to the top and express themselves. This explains why the most brilliant executive has to be “babied” by his wife. Too, we cannot divorce ourselves from our ancestry who have provided our genes and chromosomes. Oliver Wendell Holmes said, “Our heredity is a bus in which all of our ancestors ride, and every now and then one puts his head out and embarrasses us.”

A NEW CREATION

These remarks will serve to introduce my theme for today. It will relate to the greatest separation of all, a majestic transformation so complete and powerful that God calls it “a new creation.” Like other separations it is referred to as death, and the change resulting from the experience is distinctly called “the new life.” We are not surprised then to read in one passage, “You are dead and your life is hid with Christ in God,” and in another, “You must be born again,” and in still another, “The life I now live, I live unto God.” Death, birth, life— this is a part of the pattern of our social existence. It is also a part of our pattern of spiritual existence.

We have already learned that normal separations always look to the future. They are separations for preparation! Thus, they are not meaningless or purposeless. No less is this true of the great transformation. To properly understand it, then, we must view it in a proper frame of reference. We are products of divine power. The spirit that abides in our tents of clay is a part of the Eternal One. It thirsts for God as the body does for water. Man was no more made to exist without God than to exist without water. He can never reach the apex of the purpose of his being outside of God. Nor can he ever know real soul satisfaction while God is outside of him. Man in God and God in man—working together in a harmonious symphony of finite and infinite— this is the ideal.

But man possesses a will. Without a will he could not be a man. So essential and sovereign is that will, that even God will not trespass upon it. Man must choose to accept God as a partner in his life. God will not intrude upon a heart which rejects him. The most frightening fact about the human personality is its power to will, its right to choose— to choose God or reject him. That which makes it so frightening is the fact that once a man makes a choice he must accept the responsibility which is attendant upon it, and the consequences which accrue from it. He cannot choose the consequences. They are part of the package. Eternal destiny depends upon your choice!

We are by nature curious beings. We want to probe into the known and the unknown. Curiosity and dissatisfaction with things as they are, these are the twins which have made possible our progress. When we were little, curiosity was primarily concerned with our origin? “Mother, where do little babies come from?” This was one of our chief queries. Now, if we are mature, we have become true philosophers, interested in the reason and purpose of our lives.

Have you ever questioned yourself at night in the seclusion and privacy of your own room, hidden by the darkness from every eye but that of God? Why were you conceived at the very moment you were? How did it happen that, of all the ova in your mother's body, the very one from which you sprung, came into contact with the one sperm from many millions of your father's cells, which gave you being?

Why were you born at this precise time in the history of the world? Why were you born white instead of red, yellow or black? Why were you born in an antiseptic delivery room in a hospital in the United States, instead of in a steaming shelter in the dank jungles of the Orinoco, or in a mud and wattle hut in Africa? Why do you have the privilege of going to school with capable instructors while millions of boys and girls, without even a schoolbook, sit or squat on a dirt floor, listening to a missionary as their only hope of learning anything? How does it happen that you were tucked into a warm bed with clean white sheets when millions of babies lie in their own filth and vomit, with flies crawling in and out of their ears and nostrils? Why does it happen that you can come home from school, sit down to a warm meal, and eat to repletion, when millions of earth's children are never free from the sharp, gnawing pangs of hunger, while with bloodshot eyes, blackened and cracked lips, and swollen bellies, they await death from starvation?

We feel that we can determine why Noah, Moses, Elijah, Jeremiah and Daniel appeared upon the world scene just when they did. We can understand why, when God needed a man of world vision and indomitable courage, Saul of Tarsus would be there, lacking only conversion to Jesus to launch him upon his way— and upon God's way, for then their way was The Way. Some of us think that John Wycliffe in England, John Huss in Bohemia, and John Calvin in Switzerland, like that other John, the son of Zacharias and Elizabeth, appeared in God's good time. Martin Luther, in Germany, freeing the people from papal domination; and Abraham Lincoln, in America, striking the shackles from the hands and feet of helpless, cringing slaves—we can see why they were where they were when they were! But why are we here and now?

Well, there are still wrongs to be righted. There are still slaves to be freed. God's will is not yet done on earth as it is in heaven. Perhaps even now God is asking you a question. When Elijah sat in the gloom of his cave, the Lord came to him and said unto him, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" The husbandman seeking for vintage-gatherers, said to a group at the eleventh hour, "Why stand ye here all the day idle?"

Did you know that you are a tree, a fig tree, of God's own planting? Jesus gave a parable about a fig tree in Luke 13:6-9. The owner came repeatedly and looked for fruit, but found none. He said to his farm manager, "Behold, three years I come seeking fruit on this fig tree, and find none; cut it down, why cumbereth it the ground?" The manager interceded. "Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it and dung it, and if it bear fruit, well, and if not, then after that thou shalt cut it down."

This year also! How do you know this will not be your last year, your last chance? You have had sunshine, light and blessing from God, far greater blessing than millions on the earth's surface. Why? Was it just for your own benefit, ease, pleasure and luxury? Was it just for you that God gave you a shelter, ample food, a car to drive, access to educational institutions, and a land of democratic ideals? Were you planted in the vineyard just for you? Or does the Master expect some response, some fruit? Has he found fruit, real fruit, not merely attending "church services" or "going to church"— but real fruit? Or have you only been Living for self, and self alone,

And nothing else beside

Just as if Jesus had never lived,

As if Jesus had never died?

This year also! How do you know but what the decree has gone forth, “Cut him down,” and you are spared only because grace has said, “Lord, let him alone this year also!”

What does it mean to have Christ in you? The apostle writes to the Colossians (1:27) that the mystery of God, hidden from all previous ages and generations, now revealed unto his saints is “Christ in you, the hope of glory.” I take it that if this is your hope of glory, there is no means of attaining it except by Christ in you. Is Christ in you? Many of you were baptized years ago? You have long been in the church. You have been planted in the vineyard. Do you have an appreciation of Christ in you, the hope of glory?

Perhaps it is time for another death and burial— not re-baptism. Certainly not! That is not the problem, but a death to self and a resurrection to the unselfish life— a crucifixion of material ambition, and a resurrection of spiritual responsibility. Only a transformed life can make a transformed world. There is a sense of urgency, for we may have just this year also!

Has your life been fruitless, foolish and futile? Do you feel beaten, bruised and battered by the complexities and frustrations of life that pile up about you? Then let’s start today — now— to do something about it. We can change things if we become changed beings. We can change the schools we attend, the congregations where we belong, the communities in which we live, the clubs and associations with which we hold membership. You can do this, through Christ in you! You need not change your job, move to a new location, or enter another field!

What are the requirements of a life that is Christ-centered? How can we get the Savior of men to move in? He said, "Behold, I stand at the door and knock. If any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in unto him." The first thing is to hear his voice. The second is to open the door! Many have pretended to do both who have never done either. The church is filled with people whose lives are empty. They've come in but kept Jesus out. They have a form of religion but deny the power. If you want to test whether you are willing to hear Jesus a good place to start is with his own test of discipleship. "If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me."

What have you ever really denied yourself? Money! It is no real denial if you still have a bank account! Sleep? Would you stay up all night to fish for men like you would to run a trot line? Food? Did you ever go hungry, and miss a meal, so you could send its cost to a starving person? But none of these things are really what Jesus is talking about. He is not talking about things to give up. He is talking about self. You can deny yourself sleep, money, food, and the whole bit, and never really deny self at all!

THE NEW REFORMATION

Dr. Elton Trueblood says there are four marks of the new reformation in our time. He lists them as follows:

1. Commitment. This is an emphasis on total dedication to the will of God insofar as this is revealed to us, in every avenue of common life.

2. Ministry. This is the realization that in true Christianity every member is a minister of Christ.

3. Fellowship. What is discovered is the redemptive quality of fellowship, especially in the small group. We have found again, as the early Christians knew, that a man cannot be a Christian in his solitariness.

4. Voluntary discipline. This is the recognition that all power needs discipline. It must be harnessed to be effective.

These are all very vital. Each could well become the theme of an entire day's discussion. I must limit myself to the first—commitment. Dr. Trueblood correctly states that rightly understood this could effect a spiritual revolution. A half-hearted, inexpensive Christianity which does not demand our time, talent and treasure, is cheap and worthless. Commitment does not start with giving money. It does not begin with taking part in the program. Paul says of the Macedonians that they did not give their money first, but “first gave their own selves to the Lord and unto us by the will of God.”

If you try giving your money and talent before you give yourself, it will be a burden. You will groan, complain, moan and cry about the way the money is spent, although you never give your fair share of it. You'll resent having to study and appear on the program and murmur about hiring someone else to do it. All of these are signs and symptoms. Just as a man can be in the world and not of it, so he can be in the church and not really of it. And just as the truly converted man presents a problem to the world, so the uncommitted man presents a problem to the church. Lukewarm discipleship is really not discipleship at all. It wants to belong to Christ and keep what it has. It wants to eat its cake but still have it.

Suppose that today, sitting right here in this audience, you suddenly, seriously and soberly— you who have been baptized into Christ— decided that from now on you would be God's man or woman. Suppose that today was your Damascus Road, and you came face to face with Jesus who was knocking at your door. One can do that in the presence of others you know. Saul of Tarsus did. Those who were with him saw no man. Suppose you suddenly realized how drab, disconsolate and disturbing your Christian experience had been, how humdrum and hopeless and helpless your life has been. Now, you mentally throw open the door and let Jesus come into your heart, so that you have “Christ in you, the hope of glory!” What differences would occur?

I do not know, of course, for each life is different, but I venture to suggest a few things. The first great alteration would be in the matter of important decisions which affect your whole life and character. You are a girl! You want to marry, to love and be loved, to have a home, to give birth to babies, to nourish, cherish and rear them “to women good, and men!” But now, in your choice of a husband you are not motivated so much by the fact that one is tall, dark and handsome, that he drives a beautiful and expensive car, that he has a number of stylish suits and is a good dresser. You are committed. Christ is in you! Perhaps you make your decision on your knees.

You do not ask if you will have a modern ranch house with wall-to-wall carpeting, or if you’ll be able to show off your new ensemble in fall and spring. Instead you say, “Dear Lord, is this the man I want to father my children? Will he sit beside me in meetings because he honors you, and not just out of respect for my wishes? Will he go with me to visit the sick and sit up with the dying? Will he open up his arms to take in a helpless little orphan to grow up with our own little ones? Will he read the Bible with me, share his confidences with me, and be a real daddy to our little ones? Or, will he be more concerned with golf and sports than with persons and souls? Will he turn to the sport pages and never to the sacred pages. Help me, dear God, to make the right choice, for your sake as well as for mine!”

You are a boy! You are in school and you must choose the course of study which will shape your future. There is money to be made in the field of electronics, aeroplane designing, or structural engineering. If you choose these fields you may become wealthy, famous, respected, and see your name in headlines. But in the deep recesses of your heart there is a call to serve the helpless and underprivileged of the earth, to share our learning and discoveries, to share the Christ with the distressingly ignorant in remote parts of the globe. So you study agriculture that you may qualify to go to Laos, Burma, Africa, or somewhere else where farmers toil to wrest a living from eroded and enfeebled soil. And as you prepare to show them how to produce more bread you break unto them the bread of life.

Perhaps you decide to study the Russian language and still develop technical skills so you will be ready when God knocks down the iron curtain and says, "You who are ready, enter in!" And you choose for a wife, not a cry baby, or a mama's girl, but a brave, consecrated woman who is not afraid to spend and be spent for the Lord's sake. When the day comes that we are truly committed, out of such a filled auditorium as this there will go forth an apostolate of the fellowship of the concerned ones to the far-flung reaches of the earth, so that letters will filter back with strange stamps and peculiar addresses from "Greenland's icy mountains to India's coral strand."

Suppose that you are older, and now, this very morning, face to face with destiny, you truly commit yourself. You are already established in your vocation. What will happen to you? Great things!

Marvelous things! Unbelievable things! You are a schoolteacher. But next Monday morning your room will have a strange appearance. It will look like a field. The familiar faces of the pupils will look like waving grain. You will lift up your eyes and look on the fields. You will see they are ready for the harvest. You will inwardly pray that God will make you a reaper, not that he will send you a reaper, but that he will send you as a reaper. You will not wonder if you should resign as a teacher to go out into the field of God. You will recognize that you are already in that field. He who teaches history as the footprints of God in human affairs; geography as the imprint of the Creator upon the material universe; or science as true knowledge seeking to know the great First Cause, is a “laborer together with God.”

A builder builded a temple,

He wrought it with grace and skill;

Pillars and groins and arches

All fashioned to work his will.

Men said, as they saw its beauty,

“It shall never know decay.

Great is thy skill, O builder:

Thy fame shall endure for aye.”

A teacher builded a temple

With loving and infinite care,

Planning each arch with patience,

Laying each stone with prayer.

None praised her unceasing efforts,

None knew of her wondrous plan;

For the temple the teacher builded

Was unseen by the eyes of man.

Gone is the builder’s temple,

Crumbled into the dust;

Low lies each stately pillar

Food for consuming rust.

But the temple the teacher builded

Will last while the ages roll,

For that beautiful unseen temple

Is a child's immortal soul.

The world needs committed men and women who are scientists and salesmen; carvers of marble and cutters of meat; dentists and dredge operators; fishermen and furnace repairmen. Such men and women recognize that their true vocation is their calling—their Christian calling. They do not do these other things merely to make money, to build bank accounts, to own houses, or drive cars, but to pay expenses while carrying on their real vocation in life. They are children of a King. They are foreign emissaries, sojourning in a land which is not their own. Thus they sanctify any occupation they touch. Because Christ is in them, and they are his real temples, they bring Christ into whatever environment they come while making a livelihood.

The truly committed soul is a witness for the Christ that is in Him. His transformed life is a constant testimony of what can happen to the surrendered life. He does not base his choice of location upon the fact that there is a “faithful church” there; he may actually feel called upon to go where there is none at all. It is a sign of our weak, diluted, watered-down twentieth century Christianity that we plaintively ask, “Is there a faithful church there?”

The early Christians went into all the world. They deliberately chose to go where no one believed. When we restore the fellowship of the concerned, and the apostolate of the committed, men will again write to congregations they cannot find time to visit: “My constant ambition has been to preach the gospel where the name of Christ was previously unknown, and to avoid as far as possible building on another man’s foundation,” so that “they shall see, to whom no tidings of him came, and they who have not heard shall understand.”

How can we make the committed life serve the practical purpose which God intended. Let us assume you are from a rural or small town area. The congregation is in the doldrums. No impact is being made on the community. Once or twice a year an evangelist is imported for a week or two. Advertisements are put in the paper. Handbills are passed out. After the flurry of excitement the congregation settles back into a routine which is little more than a rut. You are a junior in high school. What can you do?

Let us further assume that today— right now— here in this humble and unadorned auditorium in a big city, you suddenly come to yourself. Your spiritual eyes are opened. You throw open the door and let Jesus come into your life. You recognize for the first time that he is really there. What can you do? One thing you cannot do, and that is sit in a meeting like this all of the time. It would be easy to share in God’s grace but impossible to serve his purpose if you could. You have to return home. It will be different there. But you will be different also. The difference will be Jesus!

What can you do? You will be tempted by the unconcern and indifference of others. They will laugh off your intensity as a case of “puppy love” for Jesus. They will regard it as a passing fancy, a whim. This means that you will need to pray a lot. You will have to talk it over with God, for it is likely no one else will understand or care too much. You can pray at night before you go to sleep, or silently in study hall, or on the way to school. You can do this when doubts surge in and faith ebbs out. Replenish your supply of faith by prayer!

You will have to read your Bible a great deal. It is food for the soul. You are probably undernourished anyhow. You ought to make it a regular, unvarying routine to read the Bible every day. Do not try to read too much at a time. Read a brief portion. Read it several times. Think it over. Get its message. Digest its content. Think about it when you are not reading. The Holy Spirit will help you and strengthen you. Inside of the consecrated, committed soul is a real powerhouse.

Now let the inner light begin to shine forth. Let your life and works begin to leaven the community. Perhaps there is a weekly newspaper. Go to the editor and tell him that you would like to contribute a little column each week on moral and spiritual truths, that you will keep it very brief and non-sectarian, a matter of general interest which will elevate the community. This will mean that you will become an avid reader, and you'll have to cull good material from many sources for your columns.

Start a fellowship of concerned ones in the community. There are other high school youngsters who feel the way you do. Call a meeting of them in your home and tell them about the wonderful organization called New Eyes for the Blind. These people do not ask for money, but only for old spectacle frames, old gold or jewelry which has been discarded. You collect these and mail them in, and they are worked over, fitted up, and sent all over the world to hospitals in remote areas, and everything is furnished free. Residents of old folks' homes, senile and poverty-stricken patients in our own country are furnished glasses to enable them to read or to watch television and while away lonely hours.

If you can sing, gather together other young people who like to do so, and form a group to sing wherever there is a welcome or a need. Do not limit the personnel to one religious group in the community, but find those who are committed anywhere and ask them to share. You need not forfeit any personal conviction you may have to sing out for Jesus. Perhaps you can assist in times of sadness at a funeral service and cause broken hearts to know the balm of Gilead.

There are aged and shut-in folk in every community. Most of them feel as if life is passing them by. A visit from young people filled with vitality and life changes the whole aspect of their existence. All you need do is to show a little interest in them, go on Sunday afternoons for 30 minutes to each home. Take some little item of food or some other small gift. You will lay up treasure in heaven.

Take an interest in boys and girls. Little ones will make you their heroes if you have time for them. Qualify to teach the Bible classes for little children. Be humble, but anxious to help. It will surprise you what you can do when Christ is in you, the hope of glory!

One transformed life could leaven a whole community. Think how much harm one boy in school can do when he is wild and undisciplined. But good is more powerful than evil. "A little leaven leavens the whole lump." It is the affecting of lives through little things that makes a powerful impact. It is not holding a big meeting once per year, or having a high-powered evangelist in from a distance that will transform a community. As it is from the heart of an individual that his life is changed, it is from the heart of the community that it is transformed. External forces may help, but in the final analysis all change will be worked from within.

We read with a high sense of adventure the tremendous feats of men like Dr. Thomas Dooley, of Saint Louis. Here was a vibrant young man who felt called upon to stay in Laos after the war, to reach the poor suffering forgotten men and women who were without medical care. This young man, denied himself the blessings of marriage and the comforts of a stateside home to train young natives to minister to the needs of others. His is a saga of real courage and bravery. We salute this young Roman Catholic physician who gave up pleasure, luxury and ease, for dedicated service to neglected humanity.

Or, take the case of Dr. Albert Schweitzer, who until the hour of his death at an advanced age, was still active and concerned about others. In his earlier days he was president of a university, but imbued with a sense of the world's need, he reached a sudden decision one night, resigned and the next morning enrolled as a freshman in the medical school of the university he had headed. He never lost sight of his mission, and when he graduated he went far up an African river to establish a medical mission in the jungle at Lambarene. So, this man who was a world authority on the musical compositions of Johann Sebastian Bach, became even more widely known as a great humanitarian. He concluded that the best way to serve God was to serve your fellowmen.

Many of us feel that if we could imitate such feats of moral and spiritual daring, that life would be worthwhile. But we may be called of God to serve in another way and to minister to other needs. There are still opportunities for spiritual adventure all about us. Our own community is crying for leadership. There are many who would serve if only someone took the lead. We need to develop followship as well as fellowship. Our service may be in what appears to be a humble sphere, but if we are faithful to it what a difference it will make. Perhaps the midweek service is ill-attended and often dull. What a difference it would make if one young person enthusiastically urged all of his peers to come — not merely as spectators— but as participants. A little thing? True, but it might spark a revival of flagging zeal to the salvation of the whole congregation. We cannot all be Dooleys. We cannot all be Schweitzers. But we can all be what God wants us to be.

THE COMMON SERVICE

Again, let me emphasize that we need butchers and bakers, barbers and bus drivers, bankers and babysitters, who are Christ-filled and committed. J. B. Phillips, in his book New Testament Christianity, has this to say:

If the church is to make any worthwhile impact on the surrounding community, if it is even to speak with a voice worth hearing, it must have the active committed support of all true Christians. I repeat, I do not think that the many delightful casual Christians whom I know have the slightest idea how they sabotage the power and witness of the Christian fellowship by their haphazard attachment to the church. Now, we have already admitted that the early church was compelled to be a close-knit fellowship in order to survive against all the forces of paganism. The forces of paganism are no less powerful today, although they are not nearly so obviously dangerous. Modern materialism, secularism, abysmal ignorance about God and His plan for life, are very real enemies on the side of darkness, and the lone Christian does less than nothing for the army of light when he remarks: 'I find I can be just as good a Christian without ever joining the church.' This whole question of entering fully into the worship and work of the church must be faced by all those who genuinely desire to serve Christ in this modern age.

Dr. Trueblood puts it in these words: "The fourth minimum criterion of membership is the acceptance of vocation. This is a magnificent idea and requires some explanation. It means that all true members must be fountains, not cisterns. It means that each member must be willing to think of himself as engaged in the ministry, by a divine imperative. If 'member' is to regain positive significance in our vocabulary, we must think of all recruits as entering a new estate, beyond clergy and beyond laity. In the new order there are no clergymen and no laymen, but all are engaged in the same divine vocation, which means putting the claims of the Kingdom of God first, no matter what profession one may follow. The formula is that vocation has priority over profession."

We often sing a song written by my good personal friend and respected brother in the Lord, James DeForest Murch, which goes like this:

The world all about me has now no allure,
Its pleasures bring pain; its wisdom is vain;
I seek a foundation, that's steadfast and sure,
I'll put Jesus first in my life.

The Lord Jesus died my salvation to win,
He went in my stead, to Calvary and bled;
Redemption impels me to give up all sin,
I'll put Jesus first in my life.

I know there's a home for the ransomed and blest
When death is no more, when struggle is o'er
For those who love Jesus and give him their best,
I'll put Jesus first in my life.

Though earth's tribulations continue each day,
Though pleasures may call, though evil enthrall,
His grace will protect me forever and aye,
I'll put Jesus first in my life.

In all that I say, in all that I do,
Throughout the world of toil and strife
By day and by night, through trust in His might,
I'll put Jesus first in my life.

I challenge you today to mean the words of that song, to make them real to yourself.

I challenge you to no longer regard them as mere poetic expressions set to music, but as a living and vital goal of your personal life.

I challenge you now to seek a foundation that's steadfast and sure.

I challenge you to give up all sin under redemption's impelling power.

I challenge you to love Jesus and give him your best.

I challenge you in all that you say, in all that you do, by day or by night, to put Jesus first in your life.

First in your choice of a life companion, first in your choice of a life profession, first in your thinking, first in everything!

If you have not yet come into real relationship with Jesus, repent and be immersed into Him; if Jesus has not yet come into you, hear his voice and open the door. We come to Jesus by his invitation, he comes to us by ours. Let him come in, fill your soul with surging power, your heart with transcendent hope, and your life with rewarding service.

God give us men! A time like this demands

Strong minds, great hearts, true faith and ready hands;

Men whom the lust of office does not kill;

Men whom the spoils of office cannot buy;

Men who possess opinions and a will;

Men who have honor; men who will not lie;

Men who can stand before a demagogue
And damn his treacherous flatteries without winking!
Tall men, sun crowned, who live above the fog
In public duty, and in private thinking;
For while the rabble, with their thumb worn creeds,
Their large professions, and their little deeds,
Mingle in selfish strife, lo! Freedom weeps,
Wrong rules the land and waiting Justice sleeps.

The Way of Holiness

Mission Messenger (November 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

It seems always to be true that you cannot please everyone. In their preface to the 1662 edition of The Book of Common Prayer, the producers wrote: “Although we know it is impossible (in such variety of apprehensions, humours, and interests, as are in the world) to please all; nor can expect that men of factious, peevish and perverse spirits should be satisfied with anything that can be done in this kind by any other than themselves.”

This fact inhibits a lot of brethren from taking positions which cut across traditional interpretations. They seek security in silence. Not being frightened by what others may say about me or do to me, I have no hesitancy about speaking out on matters which may become controversial. For that reason I beg leave to disagree with a commonly accepted view of Isaiah 35:8, which the King James Version renders: “And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those; the wayfaring men, though fools shall not err therein.”

The last statement is generally understood to teach that God’s entire revelation is so clear and lucid that even a traveling man who is not too bright, can grasp it perfectly. I have often had good brethren tell me, “The Bible says that its teaching is so plain that even a fool shall not err therein.” Apparently it is not as plain as such folk imply because the Bible does not say that at all. In fact, Peter says there are some things in the scriptures which are so obscure that unlearned, as well as unstable men, are liable to warp and wrest them. It is just not true that God's word is always so plain that "any fool can understand it." I think a lot of brethren misunderstand even this passage.

The statement under consideration, contrary to my earlier and childish sermon outlines, which were borrowed from older brethren who ought to have known better, is not even considering the relative ease of grasping facts which compose divine revelation. It is not saying that the casual nomadic wanderer, even though he may be a nitwit or dullard can be free from error in his understanding.

Instead, the prophet is painting a beautiful word picture of Zion's future when the ransomed and redeemed shall return with joy and gladness, singing as they come. The wilderness and dry land will be glad, and the desert will rejoice and blossom like the crocus. This will be achieved by abundance of water, a symbol of the outpouring of God's grace and mercy. Waters shall break forth in the wilderness and streams burst out in the desert. The burning sand will become a pool and the thirsty ground springs of water. The haunt of jackals will become a swamp. Grass will turn into reeds and rushes in the marsh which will result where once only burning sands prevailed.

In such surroundings returning pilgrims need an elevated roadway, and the prophet declares that one will be provided which will be designated the Holy Way. Since it is provided to accommodate those who have been freed from bondage and is not a public thoroughfare it will be properly guarded and adequate safety precautions will be taken.

Four kinds of persons and animals will not invade its precincts, or travel over its surface. The unclean shall not pass over it. Fools shall not practice their error upon it. No lion shall be there. No ravenous beast will come upon it. "They shall not be found there, but the redeemed shall walk there.” The unclean and fools are contrasted with the ransomed of the Lord.

The New English Version is probably correct in translating: “And there shall be a causeway there which shall be called the Way of Holiness, and the unclean shall not pass along it; it shall become a pilgrim’s way, no fool shall trespass on it.” I say “probably correct” because the Hebrew at this point is a little obscure, and in itself illustrates the point that we are making.

The term “causeway” is an excellent rendering in the light of the immediate context, and better expresses the thought than highway, which no longer means an elevated route as the word indicates. The causeway leading through the watered plain which once was desert will be designated the Way of Holiness and will be reserved for use by a holy people. Unclean ones will not be able to use it for their immoral practices, and fools will be barred from traversing it to propagate their error.

This example serves to bolster a principle of interpretation which I have followed through the years. Simply stated, it is that any interpretation which relies for its validity upon one version to the exclusion of all others, is probably a faulty one. I rather suspect that the King James Version is responsible for many more errors than most of us are willing to admit. This brings up the question as to what to do with sermon outlines which we have inherited. I never like to recommend the course others should take, but the one I have pursued is the easiest. I threw all of my outlines in the fire. This makes it essential that I take a fresh look at things every time I prepare to speak. And a fresh look frequently means a fresh outlook!

Faith and Baptism

Mission Messenger (December 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

I have made a promise which I must keep before this year expires. It was made a good many months ago to a sister in Christ whom I dearly love and revere. It has to do with an explanation of my position on baptism. The good sister honestly feels that I make too much of immersion in water when I insist that it is essential to entrance into the family circle created by the blood of Jesus Christ our Lord. She thinks that I weaken the scriptural concept of justification by faith and that I insist upon faith plus something else as a ground of justification before God. I agreed that I would set forth my views on the matter during this year and the time has come to redeem my pledge.

Before I address myself more directly to the theme at hand, I must define what I mean by baptism. Many of my present readers are drawn from segments of the religious realm which seriously disagree with me as to the action and subjects of baptism, and this requires an explanation of what I mean by the term. My definition is provided simply for clarification and not to arouse antagonism. I do not care to promote either hostility or debate, nor to impose my thinking upon any other person. But, as used in this article, baptism is the immersion in water of a believing penitent, as a response to the Good News proclaimed concerning Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah, Lord, and Son of God.

My personal position, based upon my understanding of the new covenant scriptures, is that such immersion is essential as a validation of one's faith and to entrance into the kingdom, that is, the rule of heaven, under the dominion of God's Son. One becomes identified with the elect or called-out company of saints when he trusts in Jesus, by reformation of life and immersion in water as an initiatory act. By baptism he is transferred from a state of alienation into a state of citizenship.

I shall endeavor to avoid some of the cheap dodges and warped theological approaches of debaters to whom baptism has become a mere factional rite, and face up to the matter as sincerely and openly as I can with my limitations and weaknesses. It is my fervent hope that all of us may thus be drawn closer to Him who is in us "the hope of glory."

In view of the clear and repeated teaching of the new covenant scriptures on the subject of baptism, I find it difficult to account for several things in our present age. Why should there be a question as to the importance of a subject upon which the Spirit has spoken so often through Jesus and his envoys? Must we assume that what the apostles wrote about it is so trivial that it can be calmly ignored or disregarded at will? Why should men now give a different answer to those who enquire of them what to do, than was given when the glad tidings were first announced? Was the answer then given by the Spirit wrong? If not, can any other answer be right now?

Again, it is generally agreed that, since the revelation of God as relates to the salvation of mankind, was not limited to the intellectually elite, but was for all, those interpretations which would naturally occur to the interested and unsophisticated reader may be assumed to have the greatest weight. How does it happen, then, that those passages which deal with baptism are subjected to such philosophic treatment and manhandling that they no longer find a way of explaining baptism, but actually explain baptism away? Is the spirit of the modern "expositors" the same as the Spirit which inspired the writers? If so, why does it undermine and water down the apostolic teaching?

Was there ever an unimmersed person in the company of the primitive saints? Can one go to the book of Acts, which was a continuation of the narrative of “the things most surely believed” by the disciples of our Lord, and establish that any person was ever admitted to the community of the reconciled ones who was not baptized? How can a company of believers in our day identify with that established by the apostles when composed not only of those who have never been baptized, but who run the whole gamut of attitude from mildly discounting its value to openly scoffing at its importance?

I am committed to the task of trying to follow as closely as I can in the footsteps of Jesus. That is what it means to me to pledge allegiance to him, which is referred to in the apostolic scriptures as “believing in his name.” Since he emptied himself and took upon him the form of a slave, I consider it to be a part of my commitment to empty myself and take on the form of a servant. And that emptying process involves getting rid of false pride and of divesting my heart of any thought of equality with God.

In submitting to the will of the Father Jesus did everything the Father asks me to do with one exception. He believed in the Father and personally testified of that faith. He did not repent of sin because he was guilty of no sin. No guilt was ever found in him. It is true that he was made sin who knew no sin, but he could not repent of it for it was the sin of others. He atoned for that for which he could not plead guilty.

But he could be baptized and he was. Certainly he was not baptized to secure forgiveness of sins. That is not really the highest motive for being baptized, and can never be. It is probably not “the design of baptism” in the sense that a great many legalistic partisans employ the term to score a point on Baptist seminarians. Actually, when Jesus made the long trek to be immersed, the preacher sought to dissuade him on the grounds of relative merit or worthiness. He suggested that Jesus ought to baptize him, rather than vice versa. But Jesus quickly lifted the whole thing out of the realm of comparison or contrast of administrator and subject, and put it in proper perspective.

His reply to the astounded John was, “Permit it to be so in this instance, we do well to conform in this way with all that God requires.” Thus Jesus chose to launch himself on his personal ministry of proclamation by visible demonstration of subjection to God’s will. “From that day Jesus began to proclaim the message, ‘Repent for the rule of heaven is approaching.’” And God honored his conformity with the divine requirement by sending his Spirit to abide upon him and by acknowledging his Sonship. If the Father took occasion at the baptism of Jesus to declare his good pleasure with him, it seems to me a little absurd to expect him to declare he is well pleased with me while resisting his requirement!

Or, to put it another way. If John was reluctant to immerse Jesus because of the superiority of Jesus, should I not be reluctant to oppose being immersed when I know that Jesus cheerfully insisted upon being personally baptized? The highest motive for doing anything is that God requires it. This is the basis upon which Jesus was immersed. He said, “I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me” (John 6:38). He also said, “I do always those things that please him” (John 8:29). I must conclude that baptism is the will of the Father and that it pleases him. Shall I not teach the will of God and urge upon all to please him in this particular?

It is my conviction that when God raised Jesus from the dead he put everything in subjection under his feet (Eph. 1:20-22). All authority is vested in him. He is absolute in power although the universe has not yet come to recognize this. Respect for authority is not demonstrated by mere verbal acquiescence that one is lord. It can only be manifested by doing what the authority demands or requires. Jesus clearly endorsed this principle when he asked, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord; and do not the things which I tell you?"

One of his earliest acts of authority which involved both earth and heaven, was to commission his envoys to go into all the world and announce the Good News to every person. That Good News was the account of the divine breakthrough of God in the form of a Son and the hope of reconciliation by this startling act. It was the news of what God had done for man in dealing with the sin situation. And since sin is a universal malady, the remedy had to be made known universally. All of the world is accounted guilty before God and all need the Good News.

When man is confronted with such a Message he must respond to it in some fashion. One who is in prison and is offered pardon and freedom must respond to the offer. He cannot shrug it off or ignore it in the hope of avoiding a response, because shrugging it off or ignoring it is his response. An offer of amnesty from heaven has to be met by the captive of Satan when he becomes aware of it, and whatever action he takes deliberately, will guarantee that he will never be the same again. The prisoner who chooses to remain in confinement by spurning an offer of pardon, can never be the same. Regardless of how he rationalizes his original deed which brought about his incarceration, he can never forget that he continues to be imprisoned as a result of his own stubborn will.

I hold that any universal offer of freedom from sin with its guilt and effects, by its very nature must be simple and understandable, and any conditions of response must also be clearly stated and within the power of every man to perform. It is obvious to the most casual thinker that if the offer is couched in philosophical terms or requires a certain state of educational attainment to apprehend it, it will not be adapted to a universal need at all. Such an offer would be merely a tantalizing hoax to the masses.

By the same token, if the response to be made transcends the power of man to perform, the offer is not good news at all. It only sinks one further into a state of hopelessness and helplessness. But such is not the offer of a beneficent Creator and Father. The Good News does not consist of what we must do for God, but of what God has done for us. And what he has done is within the context of time and place, and is, therefore, verifiable by the criteria to which man subjects all historical events. The laws of evidence must be applied to any historical situation to authenticate and render the testimony credible, that is, believable to rational minds.

I am a little hesitant about pursuing another angle of this because we have so many careless, slipshod and traditional reasoners posing as theologians, and functioning as interpreters in our day. But the response of man is not a part of the Good News at all. That man can make a response to the offer of heaven is good but it is not news. Heaven has never made an offer to man to which man cannot respond. The requirements of heaven in every age have been commensurate with man's ability to perform. The domain of mythology may have its Zeus and Tantalus, but not the realm of revelation.

When the Good News was first proclaimed, and the remarkable conclusion reached, the terms of human response were not announced until the conscience smitten auditors cried out asking what they must do. But if they had never asked, the Good News, consisting of the seven great facts would have been complete. Responding to or rejecting the Message does not affect the Good News, as one can determine by reading what happened in Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:44-49).

It would have been incongruous for Jesus to have commissioned the envoys to take the Message to all men without informing them of the conditions of human response.

Accordingly he said, “Go into all the world and proclaim the Good News to every person. He who believes and is baptized shall be saved, he who believes not shall be condemned.” That which was to be believed was that which was to be proclaimed, and this consisted of the life, death, burial, resurrection, ascension, coronation and glorification of Jesus. All of these are caught up in the one profound and magnificent proposition that “Jesus is the Messiah and the Son of God.” Accordingly, a belief or trust in this one divine declaration was all that was required, so far as faith is concerned, to enlist one under the banner of God’s Son.

But Jesus has been raised up and made “both Lord and Christ.” And while one can acknowledge belief in the proposition that he is the Son of God by verbal testimony, he cannot acknowledge lordship by this method. That Jesus is the Son of God is a matter of personal affirmation based upon acceptance of credible testimony, that he is Lord of one’s life is a matter of personal demonstration based upon the obedience of the will. Lordship creates a master-servant relationship, and it is not the servant who orally expresses his love for the master who is necessarily faithful, but the one who obeys what his lord commands.

“Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven” (Matthew 7:21). This does not condemn a verbal acknowledgment of lordship. “Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am” (John 13:13). But it is not enough, for confession of lordship with the mouth proves nothing without the accompanying deeds which validate the acknowledgment. Thus Jesus asks, “Why call ye me, Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?” (Luke 7:46). He immediately proceeds to show that one who hears his sayings and does not do them will not be able to stand against the elemental forces of life. “And the ruin of that house was great.” It is for this reason our Lord declared, “Blessed is that servant whom, when his lord cometh, he shall find so doing.”

There is absolutely no way in which one can show that he is serious about the master-servant relationship than by doing what the master requires. Lip-service can never be a substitute for obedience. Untested faith is like an unstamped letter. What it says may be good but it is not going anywhere. Obedience is the validation of belief, and our acceptance of the Lordship of Jesus is tested at the very outset. “He that believeth and is baptized.” These are the words of Jesus and no amount of equivocation will alter or abrogate them. So long as the gospel is valid, this will constitute the heaven-ordained response to it. The message to be announced and the response required to it are both given by the same authority. To accept one and deliberately reject the other is a defiance at worst, and a denial at best, of that authority in heaven and on earth!

I could spend time writing about the philosophy of baptism and upon occasion I have done so, but that would serve no particular purpose just now. To explore the rationale for a specific requirement of God would make it no more binding than the simple statement of Jesus. One does not obey a command of God because it is proven to be intellectually acceptable and apropos, but because it is a command of God. If one truly believes in God he is going to do what God says, whether he ever understands the divine reasoning behind it. In fact, a refusal to obey a divine command until it is put through the mental human wringer and found to meet the demands of human appropriateness is to substitute the human thought process for the will of God. One becomes his own lord under the guise of accepting the Lordship of Jesus!

Again, it will be noticed that I have had no recourse to what the apostolic epistles have to say about baptism. My reasons for not referring to them are quite simple. These epistles are not a part of the gospel at all. Everyone of them was written to those who had already responded to the gospel and had been delivered from the power of darkness and translated into the kingdom of God's dear Son. The gospel was proclaimed as fully and completely on the first Pentecost after the resurrection of Jesus as it has ever been, and nothing written later was ever added to it. Those who obeyed it upon that day did so fully and were as much a part of the community of the reconciled ones as any person after the canon of new covenant scriptures was compiled.

Not one statement about baptism in the epistles was ever made to encourage the recipients and readers to be baptized. Indeed, it is apparent that the apostles assumed without question that every person who was the subject of a letter addressed to a congregation of saints had been baptized. It never entered their minds that anyone would be in the community of the reconciled ones who had not been baptized. They stood in doubt about the lives and behavior of many in the congregations, but not about how they came into fellowship. "For ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Gal. 3:26, 27).

References to baptism in the epistles were not made to furnish arguments for the saints to use upon the heathen to convince them of the necessity of baptism. Instead they were given to urge the disciples to continue to live up to the commitment which they made in their initiation into Christ Jesus. "But now, after that you have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn you again to the weak and beggarly elements, whereunto you desire again to be in bondage?" Quotations from the epistles may bolster the arguments made for baptism, but the submission to baptism is upon the ground of the authority of our Lord.

It will be remembered that I defined baptism as immersion, and this always brings up the question related to those who have had water sprinkled or poured upon them as "a mode of baptism." I have a very deep and abiding compassion for all of these, having been born into and reared in a traditional background which resulted in my being “christened” by the Reverend Mr. Peterson, of the Missouri Synod Lutheran Church, before I was a month old. I have no wish to be critical or judgmental, but it seems to me that if I am to be a disciple of Jesus I must mean the same things by the terms Jesus used as he meant when he used them.

Whatever Jesus meant by baptism I must mean. If I substitute another meaning then I am talking about something else. Fortunately the catholic position is that baptism, in the context of Jesus and the apostles, was immersion. Upon this matter there has never been any major scholarly difference of opinion, and the occasional divergent view has been expressed by someone who had a theological axe to grind, and such axes are proverbially dull. One flies in the face of all scriptural intimation and implication and of most scholarly dissertation when he seeks to justify anything except immersion. I am grateful that when I became old enough to obey my Lord I did not spend precious time and energy trying to justify my sprinkling at the hands of a sincere and August minister, but simply submitted to burial into the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. I confess that I am not at all enamored of theological systems, but I am desperately serious about pleasing my Lord.

I regret the further need of replying to the shallow thinking of some of my brethren who have not yet learned that we are not under law, but under grace. It is apparent from a study of the apostolic epistles that unity was based upon community and not conformity, and is possible only in diversity. Since maturity in thought and learning is a gradual process, unity can never be predicated upon simultaneous arrival at a given level of knowledge since all human knowledge is relative. When I assert this obvious fact I am asked why I insist upon baptism as the point at which one enters the fellowship of the body, and why there is not room for divergency of opinion on this matter also.

The whole problem centers around the lack of ability to “distinguish between the things that differ,” a quality for which Paul prayed in behalf of the Philippians (1:10). Baptism is a response to the gospel, understanding of doctrine is a process of learning. Just as all of us entered our earthly families by the same door of birth, so all of us enter the divine family through the door of the new birth. But while all of us must come into the world by the same way, there is room for growth and development after birth.

No two people on earth have identical degrees of knowledge at the same time. By one Spirit we are all baptized into the one body, but in the body there is room for varying degrees of knowledge, even about that one Spirit. So long as our brethren are unable to distinguish between gospel and doctrine, between the birth process and growth, between the new covenant and the new covenant scriptures, they are doomed to create division and perpetuate spiritual ignorance upon the earth.

The time has come for summarization of my personal views. I regard belief of the Good News and baptism into Jesus Christ as essential to entrance into the fellowship of reconciliation. I would not attempt to claim relationship to my Lord in the one body except upon this basis and in compliance with these conditions. As I view it this in no sense weakens the concept of justification by faith. Much of what I know about baptism I learned from the same source from which I learned about justification by faith.

In Romans 5:1 Paul asserts we are justified by faith, and have peace with God. In Romans 6:2, he affirms that all were baptized into Jesus Christ, and thus into his death. Does he mean by the latter statement to weaken or nullify the first? Is it not more in keeping with the integrity of the Spirit to conclude that the faith which justifies is activated and animated? Unless baptism is a demonstration of faith it is useless; unless faith is operative in obedience it is dead. I hold no brief for either a useless baptism or a dead faith. Trust in Jesus must be vital, not vitiated; apostolic and not apathetic. A living faith in a living Savior is manifested by living within his will.

Faith at work is not faith plus something else in justifying us. Rather, it is faith manifesting, demonstrating and validating itself in the only manner that is possible. There can be no example of faith until faith becomes exemplary. I can never forget when men quote Romans 5:1 to show that we are justified by faith, that Paul closed that epistle with these words: “Now to him that is of power to stablish according to my gospel, and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery, which was left secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known to all nations for the obedience of faith.”

Let the final words of my feeble epistle be those of the majestic letter of the apostle, “To God only wise be glory through Jesus Christ for ever. Amen.”

Our Tragic Traditions

Mission Messenger (December 1972)

[Abstract]

My heart goes out to a number of young preaching brethren in these days. Many of them are forced to work under conditions of servitude to censorship and criticism which tend to make life intolerable and destroy the desire to excel in love. I fervently pray for each one as I learn of his plight and entreat the Father in his behalf. To illustrate what I mean, here is a rather lengthy excerpt from a letter I have just received.

I am the youth minister here, or the assistant minister according to our letterhead. I took this position when I graduated from college and have been here now less than a year, but the hopes and plans I had when I came have already faded, and I am disappointed and disillusioned. The regular minister is a legalist whose sermons are a rehash of traditional arguments. He does not really study or think objectively, but gives a different title to his talks which he dutifully extracts from his little bag of tricks. The audience is starving to death, but never having had real food, they are unable to diagnose their condition and do not know they are hungry.

Recently in a circle of high school kids the question was asked if God had any children out of the Church of Christ. I expressed my feeling that the family of God was not limited by our activities and a God we could capture in our box was not big enough to be the God who loved the whole world. One of the kids evidently blabbed it because for three straight Sundays we were assailed from the pulpit about the dangers of liberalism, which was spelled out to mean thinking that there were Christians outside our group.

There are four elders and one bishop. The latter owns the largest automobile agency in the area, and rules the congregation like he runs his business. The other elders are stooges and attend the officers meetings simply to get their orders. There have been two divisions of the group in the past over the dogmatic attitude of the leading elder, who is very arbitrary.

He asked me to have lunch with him this week and informed me that reports had filtered in that I was advocating 'Ketcherside doctrine.' I asked him what it was and he said he could not tell exactly as he did not always know what Ketcherside was talking about. I asked if I could borrow his books or material by Ketcherside, but he admitted that he had never actually read anything you had written, had never met or heard you, and had never corresponded with you. But he attended a noonday luncheon for elders and preachers last year at which the evangelist who was conducting a local meeting had warned that the greatest threat in the United States today was Carl Ketcherside.

This evangelist said you were sweeping the young people off their feet and there was now an underground cell of Ketcherside workers in every college, and the worst part of it all is that the students who were generally influenced by your teaching on fellowship were the most brilliant in school. He also said you had cleverly offered to appear at Abilene Christian College, David Lipscomb College, and Pepperdine College, and present publicly before the student body your views on fellowship and be questioned by a panel of faculty members and the whole audience. But he also said that to accept your proposal would be suicidal because there wasn't a man on either faculty who could handle you.

The elder ended up by cautioning me to watch my step and said they were considering a raise in salary for me next year if the congregation considered I was sound in my teaching. But if the word got around that I was shaky on the fellowship question it would ruin me here and all over the brotherhood. Now, what shall I do? Shall I conceal my thinking and take the raise in salary, or tell the truth and ruin my future in the Churches of Christ?

Characteristic of young people in our day, our brother put it bluntly as you will agree. In my reply to him I pointed out that none of us can make decisions for others, nor impose our thinking upon them. It is important, I think, that we not act impulsively and that we do not allow our emotions to overpower our reason. Things are not always as black or white as we try to make them, and sometimes there are alternatives and options which we do not see when we are in the eye of the storm and all in a dither. While we are being battered back and forth like a sparrow inadvertently caught in a badminton game it is difficult to think clearly.

I commit my own life to the Father and surrender it completely and He sometimes opens up doors in what I thought were solid walls. He also closes some doors and later I am thankful that I did not barge through them just to have my way. I have a great deal of compassion for my younger brethren who are caught up in the politics of the institutional meat-grinder but I am optimistic about them. With that unquenchable courage of youth they will find the way out!

My real concern is for the brethren who have created a narrow and intolerant sect which forces men to sacrifice integrity and personal honesty to be retained within its fold. Nell and I are old-fashioned enough that we still like Harold Bell Wright's book The Shepherd of the Hills and the interesting sequel to it, The Calling of Dan Matthews. Wright was originally a preacher in the restoration movement and his portrayal of the struggle of the young preacher, Dan Matthews, against the solidified and rigid institutional church in the fictitious town of Corinth was ahead of its day. I was reading it for about the third time recently and I was struck by some things said by the old Doctor, who, although not a member of the congregation, was a better friend to the young preacher than were the elders. Read this:

It is their religion to worship an institution, not a God; to serve a system, not the race. It is history, my boy. Every reformation begins with the persecution of the reformer and ends with the followers of that reformer persecuting those who would lead them another step toward freedom. Misguided religious people have always crucified their saviors and always will. . . . There is no hatred, lad, so bitter as that hatred born of a religious love; no falsehood so vile as the lie spoken in defense of truth; no wrong so harmful as the wrong committed in the name of righteousness; no injustice so terrible as the injustice of those who condemn in the name of the Savior of the world.

What has happened to us is that we took simple scriptural statements, ran them through our theological wringer, and fashioned them into a parody or burlesque for which we claimed scriptural sanction. Our traditions became the fuel to stoke the fires of human ambition and feed the insatiable maw of pride. We have thus made what we call “the eldership” into a dictatorship, exercising power in some cases by threat, insinuation and innuendo. While deploring papal authority we have borrowed the idea of the Spanish Inquisition, and a little group of men meeting behind closed doors can decide the fate and the future of a humble brother not even allowed to present his case before the saints.

The word of God does not teach the absolute power of any group of men over the family of the Father. There is no government, in the divine plan, without the consent of the governed. The word of God does not teach that I must dump all of my money allotted to relieve human needs, into institutional coffers to be dispensed by those who will not deign to consult me. It does not teach that I must contribute financially every Sunday or suffer the pangs of eternal damnation. It does not teach that all of my alms must pass through that humanly-created device dubbed “the local treasury,” and that the only way I can do good is by proxy and single-handedly.

I think that we are rearing up a group of younger brothers and sisters who are fed up with the political maneuvering which passes for the will of God to the unthinking who mistake fellowship in Christ for conformity with the system. Things will change and that for the better, but, as it is in any period of transition, there are those who must suffer. But cheer up! The heretics of today will be the heroes of tomorrow. All that you need do to be a hero is to die and wait a hundred years. I think it is worth it, even though you’ll not hear the acclaim! Why not try it?

The Scale of Values

Mission Messenger (December 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

In 1970 Alexander Solzhenitsyn was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature. He was not allowed to claim the award publicly because the Soviet Government refused him permission to travel to Stockholm. He had already prepared his acceptance speech, and although he was not able to present it, the speech was recently published in the Nobel Foundations yearbook. I have read it three times.

Perhaps I was motivated by a sense of obligation to thus pay tribute to an author who could not freely speak to the world on his own. Or, perhaps my interest was sparked by a spirit of protest against a despotic power and its arbitrary attempts to control and suppress thought. I rather think I was seeking to understand, to penetrate the mind and soul of one who, while denied the privilege of writing in the full glare of the sunlight of liberty could still act creatively under the gloomy clouds of suspicion and prohibition.

The theme of the undelivered thesis is that “during the past few decades imperceptibly, suddenly, mankind has become one— hopefully one and dangerously one— so that the concussions and inflammations of one of its parts are almost instantaneously passed on to others, sometimes lacking in any kind of necessary immunity.” This rather frightening oneness has not come from an internal desire for unity but has been thrust upon the world by international broadcasting and printing.

Alexander S. declares that while one part of the world learns what happens to another and once remote part of the universe in a minute, it may have no yardstick, no sense of values, by which to measure the meaning or power of the happening. Such yardsticks can only be matured and assimilated over many generations of specific conditions in individual countries and societies. They cannot be exchanged in mid-air.

It is his conclusion that “one world, one mankind cannot exist in the face of six, four or even two scales of values. We shall be torn apart by this disparity of rhythms, this disparity of vibrations.” He asks some very penetrating questions about a co-ordinating force for all of the value scales and comes up with the idea that a means exists, and that means is art and literature. He says, “They can perform a miracle.”

By art and literature, experiences we have never lived through can be portrayed and described, and we can become aware of the weaknesses and strengths in the experiences of others. There will come recognition and awareness as if we had personally shared in the very life patterns of others. We will thus come eventually to share a universal sense of values which will provide a criterion for measurement enabling us to survive.

I do not want to be cast in the role of one who writes derogatorily or even deprecatingly of either art or literature. I recognize the power and influence of both, but I do not share the optimism of Solzhenitsyn that they can create for mankind one system of interpretation for good and evil deeds, showing us how to embrace the first and avoid the other. I cannot forget that both can be prostituted and become mere propaganda tools.

Long ago, a philosopher said, “Literature has her quacks no less than medicine, and they are divided into two classes; those who have erudition without genius, and those who have volubility without depth; we get second-hand sense from the one, and original nonsense from the other.”

And it was a fellow-countryman of the Nobel Prize winner, Nikita Khrushchev who said, “The supreme social mission of literature and art is to raise the people to struggle for new victories in Communist construction.”

Art and literature can never become the yardstick for human behavior because they are expressions of sinful men. Granted that they represent the attempt of man to rise above himself, to transcend the human predicament, it still remains that these brainchildren are attached to their mental wombs by the umbilical cord of human imperfection. And they must always bear about them the inherited traits and characteristics of those who conceived them.

Calvin Coolidge caught this viewpoint when he said: “Not long ago I happened to visit an exhibition of modern pictures. It was held in Pittsburgh and almost every nation was represented. As I looked at those pictures I felt that I could see through them, into the minds of the nations which had created them. I could see the torment out of which they had been born. If that nation’s psychology was still diseased, so was its art. The traces of neuroses were unmistakable.”

I am committed to the proposition that the creativity of natural man is inadequate to take human behavior and weave it into a pattern upon the loom of experience which will unify the world. Instead, we must have a perfect being from outside, untainted and uncorrupted, who can move into the human spectrum, test it and try it, and be tested and tried by it, without succumbing to its evil. Only such a life can ever be the test of value judgments universally.

I know such a one. He is the only one in history. There will never be another. He is unique. All of the attributes of deity were invested in Him. In Him dwelt all the fulness of Godhood bodily. His life gave new depth to art and lifted it to new heights in doing so. He created a whole new realm of literature. But it is not the art or the literature which provides the dynamic for life. It is His person. He alone can unite the world in life for without Him it can only be united in death. But he conquered death! He lives today!

Our Russian literary giant is mistaken. Art and literature will not work a miracle. Miracles must come through the supernatural, and art and literature only strive to attain the supernatural without ever doing so. The real miracles, validated as historical facts, are those which establish the claims of Jesus to be the Messiah and the Son of God. What a difference it would make if the Russians came to believe this and sought to unite humanity under the banner of the King of kings and Lord of lords. I eagerly pray that they will believe!

Facing the Future

Mission Messenger (December 1972)

Volume 34

[Abstract]

As men grow older they seem often to postpone decisions which deal with the inevitable. I have sought to avoid that approach to life and death, and for several years I have had most of the arrangements made in case I should be called away quite suddenly, or not return home from a flight. The safe deposit box has been placed in Nell's name, the deed to the cemetery lot is at hand, and the will has been properly prepared.

Sometime ago I began to meditate upon what course I should pursue with regard to MISSION MESSENGER. Long ago it was decided and announced that it would not be perpetuated beyond my decease. I have always regarded our list of subscribers as a kind of sacred trust, and although the mere payment of a dollar per year does not nearly take care of the cost of a subscription, I have steadfastly refused to sell, rent, or loan our list to those who have sought to secure it to propagandize another cause. I would no more barter the names of our journalistic family than we would those of our natural family.

I have never regarded this paper as a business venture. It is a medium of sharing truth.

It was also made clear that there was no one else really involved in the production and mailing of the paper except Nell and myself. The tremendous monthly task has been borne year after year by the two of us, with the bulk of the task falling upon Nell, due to my absences from home, sometimes for several weeks at a time. We have also been assisted in some of the wrapping by our son Jerry, his wife Emily, and their two boys, Gryfon and Erik. Upon occasion, the other grandchildren, Dawn and Andrea, have helped while visiting us.

So important, however, is the role of both Nell and myself, that we could not perpetuate the work if either of us crossed over to be with Jesus. Accordingly, we have understood that whoever survived would mail out one more notice announcing that the paper had expired with the death of the other.

It was almost thirty-five years ago that the paper was started as a free mail out piece, providing news of our party proceedings in the state of Missouri. The cost was borne by five brethren. When we began to receive subscriptions we kept the names and addresses in a loose-leaf notebook, and when mailing time came we sat down with our children around the kitchen table, each took a page containing names and we addressed the papers by hand. Now there is a large cabinet with address stencils for almost 7500 readers scattered all over the globe. The paper wings its way into many countries as well as to all fifty states of our union and every province in Canada. It is obvious that we cannot always continue to mail it out.

I began praying about the Father's will in the matter while in Colorado, and at 2:00 a.m., one night in Michigan, I finally reached a decision which I am here announcing subject to the divine purpose in my life. If Nell and I live and can have the health and strength to continue until that time I will deposit the mail sacks containing the final issue of the paper at the weigher's office on the dock of the main post office in Saint Louis, on December 1, 1975. Thus will end one exciting and thrill-filled era of my earthly sojourn. It is understood, of course, that the Father may stop my pen and typewriter ahead of schedule.

After having been a factional leader and debater for a number of years, the grace of God moved in to make my life much happier and more profitable and I began to write upon the marvelous fellowship in Christ in 1957. At the time I did not know where my prayer and study would take me. I only knew that I wanted to go where he led and follow his precious way. And if we survive to continue through the final year, the theme of my writing, and the title of my last bound copy will be simply "Fellowship."

The decision to cease publication will relieve many of our faithful financial supporters whom we love in the Lord, and without whose glorious fellowship we would long since have gone under. It costs many thousands of dollars per year now to produce and mail the paper. We have watched the frightening increases in cost which have sunk great printing enterprises, but every year, although we have had no backlog of resources of our own we have paid every bill and started the new year free from debt. We mailed the whole first year of papers for less than it costs us now to send out a monthly issue. It is interesting when large bills come in and you know how meager is your exchequer, to see those bills paid month after month, often by contributions from saints whose faces you have never looked upon.

We have sought to avoid sending out letters asking for help. This is obnoxious to both Nell and myself, and we could not bring ourselves to beg from our brothers and sisters. I always quietly laid the burden at the feet of Jesus and left it there while I went on to try and carry out my task. I have never had a salary contract, never stipulated a fee, and never made any demands of a congregation as a condition to my coming. I have never known in advance what I would receive and have never worried about it. And now, here we are, brought safely through thus far, and still trusting that our God will see us through to the end. Praise His wonderful name!

If our plans are carried out as here announced it is my intention to destroy the files of my private exchanges of a controversial nature with brethren in the Lord. I have already burned most of them because I do not want to reflect against the memory of any person who differed with me. I do not care to perpetuate any arguments I have used except those which already appear in print. I shall do away with the address stencils, and keep only the card file of addresses so we can write to some of our former readers and friends. Such a list soon becomes obsolete in any event. I regard my earthly pilgrimage as quite insignificant and once it is completed that is enough.

December 1, 1975 marks no retirement for me. I have resolved not to retire. My life is wrapped up in the lives of others. Research and writing constitute my greatest joy. So I shall teach and write, and continue to share until the dusk becomes so heavy that I cannot see and I must prepare to listen for the call from across the river. I shall continue to remain open to the divine will and wish and I am confident that whatever he would have me do, or wherever he would have me go, "my Lord will make a way for me."

One thing that has given me some concern and that is how to handle subscriptions so that we will be honest and not take an unfair advantage of any person. I have come to the conclusion that we will keep all of our readers informed of the plan to end publication with the final issue of 1975, and all may subscribe with that in mind. Against the suggestion of many of our friends we will keep the subscription price at one dollar per year. Of course this does not begin to pay the cost of getting twelve issues to a subscriber, but we do not want to raise the price at this time. It would seem like an exhibition of a lack of trust. One way that you could help would be to renew now for three years, and that would guarantee your subscription for the life of the paper.

We shall not return any money after we cease, but instead will use any surplus as it comes in to mail out free books to college and university students. Thus, if you subscribe now for three years and send a check for ten dollars, we will place seven dollars in the fund to send out books. We mailed out over five hundred copies of Simple Trusting Faith upon request and are now in the process of sending out copies of The Royal Priesthood. We want to keep helping young minds as long as we can.

In 1973 I will be answering scores of questions. I have been saving many of the queries that I have received in public forums and in private correspondence. I think you will like to read what I have spoken and written on the issues of the day. We humbly ask an interest in your prayers. We are deeply grateful for your help. Nell joins me in this expression of deep gratitude to those of you who have helped carry the financial burden and make this feeble effort possible!

About the Word

Mission Messenger (January 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“He who will not reason is a bigot; he who cannot is a fool; and he who dares not is a slave.”— William Drummond.

The dawning of this new year brings me to a task which will cause many of you to think of me as presumptuous, despite the fact that I am motivated by a wholly different desire than to appear proud or arrogant. I am going to attempt to answer some of the questions which brethren have asked me for the past several years and to share my views in this fashion, hoping that I may thus be able to clarify my position for those who affirm that they have difficulty in understanding what I have sought to convey.

It will be understood, of course, that I am offering my own opinion as to what I conceive of God’s word as teaching, and it is given with no thought of being dogmatic or authoritarian. It is binding upon no one further than his own knowledge and conscience lead him to accept it as valid and true. I shall love those who cannot concur with it as much as I do those who agree.

I am constantly made to smile when I receive letters, generally from much younger brethren, who feel obligated to include the statement, “Of course, I do not agree with all that you write.” The fact that they must issue this little gem of protective thought says much more about them than it does about my writings. And it says even more about the kind of sectarian framework in which we operate. Why should anyone ever feel obligated to say that he does not fully agree with all that another thinks? That should be taken for granted by all who do not think of the kingdom of heaven as a parrot jungle.

I have repeatedly said that we can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. The variety of mental capacities is as great as that of physical characteristics. We should share insights for mutual upbuilding and strength but we should never impose our thinking upon another, seeing that he has the same right to interpret the word of revelation as ourselves.

It is not expected that the answers I give will either please or satisfy all of my readers, and none of them will be offered with that goal in mind. Those who regularly peruse this little journal are upon all sides of every issue that is raised and we cannot stereotype them. I am thrilled that this is so. I would not want it otherwise at the cost of their personal integrity.

My approach will be one of honest and open declaration. I will not conceal my feeling about any issue that is raised. I have nothing to hide and nothing to gain by unfairness. I am happy to answer and will do so on the basis of scripture as I understand it. I am committed to seeking the will of God as revealed in the new covenant scriptures, and it is upon that foundation I rest my case, come what may. And I will begin by answering questions about my attitude toward the word of God. These questions have come from various sources at various times. For the sake of continuity of thought I will combine them here without identifying the ones who have asked them, except in rare cases.

REVELATION AND INSPIRATION

1. Do you regard the entire Bible as being given by the revelation of God?

I do not. All scripture is given by inspiration, but it was not all given by revelation, as is clearly taught in the scriptures themselves. God is a divine economist and he never does for a man what that man can do for himself, or what another can do for him. Man was made a rational creature, capable of observation, study and research, and qualified to make deductions from his findings or thought processes. Whatever man can discover for himself God has never revealed, for to do so would be to obviate the function of reason and defeat the very purpose for which rational powers were bestowed.

Revelation is from apokalupsis, which means to uncover, to lay bare, or to make naked. It is always related to the disclosure of that which has been previously hidden or concealed. Revelation is the action of God in uncovering for man what man cannot discover for himself. Stated another way, it is the discovery afforded by God to man of himself or his will, over and above what he has made known by the light of nature or reason. Man has discovered many truths about the universe in which he has been placed, and will discover many more in the future. But the human mind is finite and limited. The divine mind is infinite and unlimited. There are truths known to God to which man cannot attain regardless of his aspiration. If these are made known to man it will be by the action of God in revealing them.

Isaiah records God as saying that his thoughts are not ours, and his ways are not ours. The gulf between human thought and divine is as great as the distance between heaven and earth (55:8, 9). Man cannot reach up to God “for who hath known the mind of God that he may instruct him?” If man comprehends the thoughts of God it will be because God has relayed them to him. And God will only reveal to man the thoughts which are beyond the ability of man to ascertain by his rational powers.

Man can best learn by what he sees with his eyes, the visual method; or by what he hears, the audible method. He is not limited to these, however, because he can take the data that he assembles and by the faculty of judgment or perception, can run it through his mental computer and arrive at conclusions which, in turn, can be used as the foundation of extended and wider outreach. But whatever he needs to know for his wellbeing, above and beyond his ability to discover, God must reveal to him.

Thus, the apostle writes, “That which the eye hath not seen, and the ear has not heard, and which has not been determined by the mental processes concerning God’s provision for those who love him, God has revealed unto us by his own Spirit, which alone is capable of unlimited knowledge, including the deep thoughts of God” (1 Cor. 2:9, 10). What the apostles observed and heard, they simply recorded as they saw and heard it. No revelation was required for such matters.

Peter makes this all quite clear. He affirms that the apostles did not derive their testimony from artfully contrived myths when they testified that the Lord Jesus Christ was revealed in majestic power. Instead they were eyewitnesses of a demonstration in which they not only saw him in a glorified state, but personally heard a voice from heaven acknowledging him as a beloved Son, pleasing unto the Father.

But the apostles, or envoys, were not limited to what they saw or heard because, Peter said, “we have also a sure word of prophecy” (2 Peter 1:16-19). Now prophecy is revelation. The prophet speaks under divine impulse and brings forth a divine message. Prophecy does not come by the will of men, but holy men of God speak as motivated or empowered by the Holy Spirit. It is clear that the scriptures contain the testimony of chosen witnesses, as well as the revelation of God.

This is aside from the point we are concerned with at the moment, but I cannot forego mentioning that one event which has always come under attack by liberal theologians and rationalists is the transfiguration of Christ. All sorts of explanations have been drummed up to make it appear that this is a myth. It is interesting to note that Peter who was present for the occasion, uses it as a demonstration that the apostles did not follow cleverly designed myths, in making known their message.

But back to our question. Because the scriptures teach otherwise, I do not believe that all scripture was given by revelation. I do believe that all holy scripture was given by inspiration (2 Timothy 3:16). What is inspiration? “Inspiration of God” is from theopneustos and means “breathed into by God.” Inspire means to breathe in, expire means to breathe out. To inspire is to give life, to expire is to die. Inspiration does not have so much to do with origin as with survival. It provides power and vitality. God breathed into the body of scripture compiled from what his ambassadors saw, heard, reasoned out, and received by revelation, and that body became a living and perpetual testimony to all men.

I accept the sacred scriptures as the God-breathed communication to man, given under the direction, or by the agency of the Holy Spirit, and I expect to be guided, governed and directed by this word. I have no intention of trying to please God by dependence upon the wisdom of this passing age, for I know and am persuaded that “the wisdom of this age is foolishness with God.”

REVELATION AND INTERPRETATION

2. Do I understand that you make a difference between revelation and interpretation, and if you do, what is it?

I do not make a difference between them. I simply recognize the difference which inherently exists between the two. Revelation is the uncovering of the thoughts of the divine mind for the purpose of conveying divine concepts to man.

Interpretation is the application of the human mind to what is revealed for the purpose of apprehending the divine concepts. One is the act of God, the other the act of man. Revelation is perfect for the achievement of the divine purpose, but interpretation, being human, is imperfect in its approach to revelation.

Our ability to correctly interpret or understand the will of God, or anything else, is dependent upon many factors. All that which has previously been unknown can be understood only in the light of the known, and this is contingent upon background, culture, education, early training, and other circumstances. So God's revelation is infallible, but our interpretation is not. It is for this reason that God has finished his revelation, but man does not finish his attempt at interpretation, the striving for correct understanding.

Many preachers continually exhort the saints to study, which is but another way of saying that they should seek to explore more fully the divine revelation with a view to achieving the correct interpretation. Yet these same preachers think that they already have an inerrant and infallible interpretation, and any deviation from the traditional view is a denial of "the authority of God." Such men ought rather to warn the humble brethren against further study, lest they learn some truth for which they will be "cast out of the synagogue." Nothing is more dangerous to the status quo than further serious study.

On July 4, 1823, Alexander Campbell wrote the preface for The Christian Baptist, "a periodical paper pledged to no religious sect in Christendom, the express and avowed object of which is the eviction of truth and the exposure of error." Mr. Campbell well knew some of the trials which would beset him and he made this very poignant observation:

It is a rarity, seldom to be witnessed, to see a person boldly opposing either the doctrinal errors or the unscriptural measures of a people with whom he has identified himself, and to whom he looks for approbation and support. If such a person appears in any party, he soon falls under the frowns of those who either think themselves wiser than the reprover, or would wish so to appear. Hence it usually happens that such a character must lay his hand upon his mouth, or embrace the privilege of walking out of doors . . . If this had not usually happened, we should have had no Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists, etc. If the party from which these sects sprang had received the admonitions and attended to the remonstrances of those bold and zealous men who first began to reprove and testify against it for alleged errors and evils existing in it, no separation would have taken place. Had the well-meant remonstrances of Luther, Calvin, and Wesley been acknowledged and received by the sect to which they belonged, the mother would have been reformed, and the children would have lived under the same roof with her. But she would not.

In a word, I hold that God's revelation is finished, but my interpretation of the revelation is not. Each passing day finds me with new insights and a greater perception of the truth. I interpret many passages differently than I did five years ago, because my grasp of their significance is more profound. One who ceases the process of interpretation at a given point does not prove his faithfulness to the written word. He only freezes his ignorance at that level. It is true that dragon-flies can skim lightly over the surface of water which is so deep that an elephant can scarcely wade it, and we seem to have a lot more dragon-flies than elephants.

Interpretation, or understanding, is simply the intellectual cloak with which we clothe the inner man, and I can no more wear the same mental coat that I wore when I began preaching at the age of twelve years, than I can wear the same coat for my body. The understanding which seemed adequate in my immaturity is no longer adequate for my present state. And I refuse to be confined to the strait-jacket of yesteryear in order to be consistent with my past. It was Ralph Waldo Emerson who wrote:

A foolish consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds, adored by little statesmen and philosophers and divines. With consistency a great soul has simply nothing to do. He may as well concern himself with his shadow on the wall. Speak what you think now in hard words and tomorrow speak what tomorrow thinks in hard words again, though it contradict everything you said today. ‘Ah, so you shall be sure to be misunderstood.’ Is it so bad then to be misunderstood? Pythagoras was misunderstood, and Socrates, and Jesus, and Luther, and Copernicus, and Galileo, and Newton, and every pure and wise spirit that ever took flesh. To be great is to be misunderstood.

3. Why do we need to interpret God’s word at all? Why can we not just take it for what it says?

This would probably work if you were infallible, which you are not. You must interpret God’s word for the very same reason you must interpret any other interpersonal communication. The purpose of all such communication is to convey mental images from one intelligence to another. Unfortunately, the image reception depends not solely upon the transmitting intellect but upon the receiving one as well. If both intellects were infinite and infallible there would be no problem, but when one intellect is infinite and the other is finite, or when both are finite, there is room for distortion, and careful and prolonged study may be required to assure clarity. And some people seem to have been born without a “fine-tuning” button.

It is the nature of communication which makes interpretation imperative. No one who studies the word of God diligently can do so for long without changing his mind concerning the meaning of certain passages. If one is led to a different view of a scripture now than he had ten years before, at which time does he take the Bible for what it says? Did he take the Bible for what it said ten years ago? If he did not, why not? If he did, does he cease to take the Bible for what it says when he changes his mind ten years later?

One who holds that the Bible does not require interpretation must never alter his views but must cling to what he concluded upon his very first reading of it. But the Bible itself teaches that we must grow in grace and in knowledge of the truth. How can you grow without changing, since all growth demands change? The fact is that those who offer this puerile objection are constantly trying to explain what the scripture means, and thus interpret it. They write articles, print papers, put out tracts and publish books setting forth their deductions from the scripture. They deliver lengthy discourses in the pulpit and over radio expounding and expostulating on the implications of God's Word.

We must never forget that those who want you to take the Bible for what it says, really want you to take it for what they say it says. If you explain a scripture you are interpreting it; if they explain one, it is what the Bible says. The final criterion is not what the Bible says at all, but it is their understanding and exposition, and unless you concur with them, you will be excluded. Theirs is the official, dyed-in-the-wool authoritative explanation, but it is not interpretation. Actually what they are really saying is that as they interpret God's word it does not require an interpretation. No scholarly person will make an assertion that the scripture requires no interpretation and when someone does you can be sure that he is both superficial in his thinking, and badly mixed up in his practice.

I have a great deal of compassion for those who seek to defend their indefensible orthodoxy by making it appear that the scriptures speak so plainly to them that they are always in the right and cannot be wrong. I went through that same period when I was much younger than I am now. When a question arose, I took my Cruden's Concordance and looked up all the references which might have any bearing, near or remote, upon the problem at hand. Then I read all that had been said about it in the past issues of our official party journal, and examined all of the books that had been written by the loyal brethren. After that I examined everything else available, and when I made up my mind, it was always what the Bible taught, and required no interpretation.

One day it dawned upon me how silly it was to send missionaries across the ocean to explain to others something that required no interpretation. Apparently we thought that none of the brethren were “wayfaring men,” because we were always quoting that the way was so plain that the wayfaring man need not err therein. Once when I was in California a young brother handed me a tract he had written to explain why the scriptures need no interpretation.

BIBLE AND WORD

4. Do you take the position that the Bible is the word of God, or that the word of God is contained in the Bible?

This question undoubtedly stems from the strife which has grown out of the contention between modern theologians, some of whom, under the influence of form criticism, have been led to regard the Bible as a cultural outgrowth rather than a divinely-given book. But I am not a part of the “theological rat race” and I do not allow myself to become involved in what I regard as a silly semantic merry-go-round. When questions like this are proposed the questioner asks them from a particular stance which he has already assumed and obviously he expects you to answer them while standing on the same “circle of turf.”

I never try to put words in the mouth of another man to enable him to define his position, nor do I allow others to select the words for me with which to explain mine. I just like my own terminology better than a Saul’s armor furnished by others.

Certainly, not every word contained in the Bible is the word of God, as anyone can easily determine by reading the book of Job. Here, in one volume you also have the words of Satan, Job, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, Zophar the Naamathite, and a young man by the name of Elihu, a Buzite who stood it as long as he could and said he either had to speak or pop! All of these had their say before the Lord entered the discussion and wound it up. So when I am asked if the Bible is the word of God I am forced to say that some of it is.

And since the revelation of heaven does occur within the context of space, time and history, and it was gathered up (I happen to think under the guidance and protection of the Holy Spirit), and incorporated in what we call the Holy Bible, it does not make me choke to say that I believe the word of God is contained in the Bible. All this will help you to understand why I am not at all concerned with the verbal pegs upon which men hang up their mental overcoats.

What I am interested in doing is making it clear that I receive the word of God without doubt or quibble, as a divine guideline for my feeble human existence. I trust it, respect it, revere it, and I intend to allow the sacred scriptures to take me by the hand and lead me into a closer walk with the Living Word, the Son of God, and my precious Lord. The written word provides for me teaching, reproof, correction and instruction in the just life, and I need everyone of these. I love the word, all of it, and praise God for giving it to us!

But deliver me from becoming embroiled in the theological Donnybrooks where men become so engaged in fighting over the place of the Bible in God's purpose that they have no time to give it a place in their own lives. I am sure that the devil has a hearty respect for the word of God as being of divine origin, but that will not keep him out of the lake of fire. And I prefer to allow my daily and routine behavior to testify of my reverence for the testimony of the Lord which is certain, "making wise the simple.” It is this last which gives me hope.

It was J. B. Phillips who wrote: “I must, in common justice, confess here that for years I had viewed the Greek of the New Testament with a rather snobbish disdain. I had read the best of classical Greek both at school and Cambridge for over ten years. To come down to the koine of the first century A.D. seemed, as I have sometimes remarked rather uncharitably, was like reading Shakespeare for some years and then turning to the vicar’s letter in the parish magazine! But I think now that I was wrong: I can see that the expression of the Word of God in ordinary workaday language is all of a piece with God’s incredible humility in becoming a man in Jesus Christ.” I agree heartily with that!

THE SACRED CANON

[5.] On more than one occasion you have written concerning the inspiration and consequent authority of the scriptures, and have said they are the only reliable and infallible source of authority, with which I concur. This is my question. How do we know that those men who were responsible for compiling the New Testament canon accepted and rejected the proper writings? If you had been a member of the council would you have accepted such books as The Didache, The Shepherd of Hermas, The Gospel of Peter, etc.?

This question has been proposed by a perceptive brother in Christ who is a successful general agent for an insurance company in southern Florida. He has been a source of strength to me since I first came to know him and I am pleased to give expression to my views regarding the important issue he has raised.

On the college and university campus the same question is frequently posed and men and women are anxious to remove any lingering doubt about the constituency of the new covenant scriptures. This is altogether proper, because if we have works included which God did not intend to include, we have a corrupted compilation, and if there are works left out which God intended to include we have an imperfect version. Certainly the authority of the scriptures would be affected if it could be shown that they suffer from either unwarranted addition or omission.

I find a very hazy view upon the part of many as to how we came to receive the new covenant scriptures in the form in which we now have them. A very common error is that a council was convened to vote upon which of the many extant writings were to be accepted and included, and which were to be left out of the sacred canon. One thing that encourages this fallacy is the propaganda of the communications department of the Knights of Columbus to the effect that we owe the compilation of the scriptures to the Roman Church. The impression is created that an ecumenical council selected for the purpose gathered up the epistles deemed worthy and bound them in a single volume. This is not the case at all!

It is true that The Third Council of Carthage, which met in 397, in one of its creedal statements stipulated that only “canonical” books were to be read in the churches. It then listed exactly the 27 books that we have today. But they were listed because they were already recognized as “canonical.” So the council did not establish the canon. It just exhibited it. In 419 The Council of Hippo repeated the identical list of books as specified by the Carthaginian Council.

The Greek word kanon means literally a straight rod used for a rule or measure. We still use the word “ruler” to designate a piece of wood or metal with which to measure length. The idea of straightness can still be discerned in such derivative words as cane and canal. The latter is a trench for carrying water which cuts straight through the land. The clerical term canon comes from a clergy house whose members entered into a covenant to follow a certain rule for their lives.

The word kanon occurs twice in the new covenant scriptures. In 2 Corinthians 10:16, it is translated “line,” and in Galatians 6:16 it is rendered “rule.” “As many as shall walk by this rule, peace be upon them.” The “sacred canon” consists of the books which measured up, that is, which passed the tests, or met the requirements. But what was the test? It is obvious that before a piece of wood can be used for a measure it has to be measured. The reason we can use a one foot ruler as a guide in school is because someone else has determined beforehand its proper length and marked it off in inches and fractions of an inch.

The same thing holds true with the sacred canon. Proper authority had to define the rule by which writings must be judged as worthy or unworthy of inclusion in a collection of materials esteemed to be from God, and this had to be done before the writings came into existence. It is recognizable by most people who believe in a revelation from God, and who accept that in these days God has spoken to us through his Son, that the Son should establish the criterion for measurement of the validity of that which is esteemed to be from God. In other words, the living Word is the measure of the written word, in order that the written word may correctly represent the Living Word.

While he was yet among men on earth Jesus chose, called and commissioned a college of apostles to be his envoys or ambassadors to an alien world. An ambassador is a minister plenipotentiary, that is, a diplomat possessed of full power in the representation of his government. So one of these apostles wrote, “Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us: we pray you in Christ’s stead, be ye reconciled to God” (2 Cor. 5:20). This is very clear. As ambassadors entrusted with the word of reconciliation, God spoke through the apostles and they acted in behalf of Christ in presenting their message and entreaty.

Jesus assured them while still present with them that the Holy Spirit would teach them all things and recall to their memory whatsoever he had said unto them (John 14:26). He affirmed that the Spirit would guide them into all truth and show them things to come. To receive the apostles was the equivalent of receiving Jesus (Matt. 10:40). They were to sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes.

The primitive saints of God recognized this and thus accepted apostolicity as their measuring rod. A writing, in order to be included in the sacred scriptures had to be written by an apostle, or by one close to an apostle, so close that apostolic endorsement or sanction could be given to it, thus establishing its veracity. At first the apostolic letters were scattered by their very nature, but as time passed congregations became aware of the need for preserving these vital documents and began to secure copies of them and to gather them as treasures to be passed on through the grace of God.

This required a listing of those regarded as authentic and by the fourth century there were ten distinct catalogues of the books of the new covenant scriptures. Six of these were identical with our present canon. They are the lists of Athanasius (A.D. 315), Epiphanius (370), Jerome (392), Rufinus (390), Augustine (394), and the list of the forty-four bishops assembled at the Third Council of Carthage (397) which I referred to previously. Augustine was present for that occasion.

Of the other four catalogues, three are identical with ours except for omission of the Revelation. These are the lists of Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem (340), the bishops assembled at The Council of Laodicea (364) and Gregory of Nazianzum, bishop of Constantinople (375). Philaster, bishop of Brescia (380) omits Hebrews and Revelation.

Eusebius has been called “the father of church history.” He was probably born in Palestine about A.D. 260, and became one of the most learned men of his day. He quotes from practically every one of the books and assigns them to the authors as we know them. But he investigated what the Christians thought of the writings available to them, and as a result of meticulous inquiries he reduced the books to three classes: (1) Those universally received as the genuine works of the authors to whom they were accredited. He includes the four gospel records, Acts of Apostles, all the epistles of Paul, the first epistle of John, and the first epistle of Peter. (2) The writings on which there was not unanimity of opinion. Eusebius says that here the greater majority accepted the books, but because of a few voices raised in doubt he placed them among the contested ones. He mentions James, Jude, 2 Peter and 2 and 3 John. He adds that some placed Revelation in this class. (3) Those universally regarded as spurious. He enumerates Acts of Paul, Revelation of Peter, Epistle of Barnabas, The Didache, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Gospel According to the Hebrews.

It does not bother me that some of the books were placed in doubt before they were placed in the canon. It only helps me to realize that such books had to prove their worthiness to be received. They were not accepted upon whim but according to a rigid standard. I am convinced that the canon as we have it is complete and unadulterated. I am perfectly willing to risk my hope of eternity upon the testimony of this wonderful volume containing the word of God.

My position is not based upon an emotional hangover from a glamorous childhood affection, but upon mature reflection stemming from my own research. I accept the canon because of the testimony of the "church fathers;" the heretics who sought to combat it; and the Jewish and heathen adversaries who sought to overthrow it. I accept it because I believe that the internal evidences sustain it. I have read all of the apocryphal books related to the new covenant scriptures. There is no comparison, believe me!

My own copy of The Apocryphal New Testament is the London edition of 1821, and as I read the contents, my wonder is not that they were not included in the canon, but rather that they were ever remotely considered for it. Such works as “The Acts of Paul and Thecla” and “The Epistle of Paul to Seneca” bear upon their faces an indictment of their forgery, or, at least of their inferiority.

I happen to hold that the compilers of the canon were not “inspired” in the accepted sense of that term. God never wastes either divine power or gifts, and what man can do by reasoning and through study and research, he is permitted to do. And surely man could discover the revelation of God which had been uncovered for him, without additional supernatural demonstration. I do believe that the Spirit exercised supervisory concern in the compilation of the canon, but this was done providentially, and providence never makes use of the supernatural but always orders and arranges that which is natural to achieve the goal of God.

It seems incongruous to me that the Spirit would provide a message essential to the eternal welfare of mankind and then allow it to be lost or adulterated until its power would be eroded away. I believe that the Spirit was the vehicle for the transmission of the word and now enlivens and enables the word. I am quite convinced that what we call the Bible as we have it is as God gave it. I intend to continue to allow it to guide my weak and unprofitable life.

The question as to what I would have done if I had been a member of the conciliar convocation at Carthage is purely academic. As Dr. Joseph Angus remarks in one chapter of his unique handbook, “It is very remarkable that no General Council from the earliest times undertook to define the Canon. The Scriptures of the New Testament were their own attestation.”

In my own book Deep Roots I have this to say on page 38: “The Bible was not written by the church. It was written to the church. The books were not accepted as canonical because the church had produced them but because it had received them. The authority stemmed not from their acceptance but from their origin. Canonicity did not create authority nor increase it, but simply recognized it. It was in the giving and not the gathering of the books that the authority resided.”

On the following page I say this: “The authority does not reside in a volume but in a revelation. The Bible is not an authorized collection of books, but a collection of authorized books. The books were accepted because they measured up to the rule of the canon, they contained a revelation from God. They were not holy scriptures because they were selected for the canon, but they were accepted into the canon because they were holy scriptures.” What I wrote so freely in 1966, I repeat just as freely seven years later.

The Bible is my map on the journey of life, my bread for daily sustenance of the spirit, the staff upon which I lean, and my counsellor in times of doubt. I have proven in the laboratory of my own heart its supreme worth and its power to transform. I rejoice in its every word and every line and I thank the Giver of Life for the hope conveyed to me in its pages. I am not at all bothered by the canon by which the scriptures were selected and compiled, but I am concerned with my life which will be measured by them.

6. Were the documents which compose the canon sacred at the time of their writing or did they become sacred later on because they were gathered and compiled?

Really, this question, proposed in a “rap session” in a university student union building by a very astute young doubter, is an old one. It is also a sort of trick query raised by those inclined to be skeptical or critical. There is nothing sinful about either of these, for a skeptic is literally one who is thoughtful and reflective, and a critic is one who measures what he sees and hears.

But behind the question is the argument that the apostles merely wrote personal letters with no idea they would be gathered to constitute the Bible, and it was not until such compilation by the church several hundred years later that they were regarded as sacred. Thus the “sacred scriptures” did not originate as such but they were elevated to this by the church.

In recent years this has formed the basis of the fallacious propaganda of the Knights of Columbus that the Bible is the product of the Catholic Church. The contention is that we owe a debt to Rome for giving us the sacred volume.

Outside of the Roman Church one of the chief exponents of this idea in the preceding century was Henry Drummond, Scottish theologian and lecturer, who attempted to reconcile the principles of evolution to evangelical Christianity. He argued that “The Bible came out of religion, not religion out of the Bible. The Bible is a product of religion, not a cause of it.”

The question of the “sacredness” of the scriptures at the time of their origin can be very misleading. If the epistles written by the apostles were produced under the guidance of the Spirit, the question is not how the writers or recipients regarded them, but how God regarded them. The term sacred is from the Latin sacrare, holy or hallowed. Certainly if the new covenant writings were the special work of the Spirit they differed from all other writings of the same age or era, in that they originated in divine wisdom and not merely in human thinking. They were holy scriptures, as contrasted with profane, that is, unsanctified compositions.

Whether the apostles knew they were helping to write “the Bible” is of no consequence. The word “Bible” is one which we have adopted to designate the gathered books which met the standard of authenticity and genuineness. God did not give us a Bible, but a revelation in various parts and in various times. We call the collection of the documents containing that revelation the Bible. Whether or not the writers knew that a collection of their writings would occur is of little concern. Their task was simply to write as motivated by the Spirit. The act of preserving their writings, or the method of doing so, was left in the hands of providence.

It is important, I think, to determine how the apostles regarded the content and purpose of their writings at the time. Were the letters which they wrote and the words which they spoke considered to be simply an expression of their own thoughts, or a revelation from the Spirit? Were they reputed to be of any special authority, and thus binding upon the hearers and readers? In determining this we must rely upon the testimony of the apostles themselves. They alone are capable of testifying directly as to their view of their words. Let me mention a few considerations drawn from letters written by one man to one congregation located in the very heart of a vicious and immoral pagan culture.

a. Paul declares that when he came to Corinth he “declared the attested truth of God without display of fine words or wisdom” (1 Cor. 2:1).

b. He affirms that he spoke “God’s hidden wisdom, his secret purpose framed from the very beginning to bring us to our full glory” (1 Cor. 2:7).

c. He asserted that the Spirit had revealed to the envoys of Jesus things which could not be ascertained by visual or audible means, or by the rationalization process (1 Cor. 2:9).

d. He believed they had received the Spirit of God for the precise purpose of knowing “all that God of his own grace gives us” (1 Cor. 2:12).

e. He said that the words in which the message was couched were those the Spirit of God selected, and not those which human wisdom dictated. “And because we are interpreting spiritual truths to those who have the Spirit, we speak of these gifts of God in words found for us not by our human wisdom, but by the Spirit” (1 Cor. 2:13).

f. Those who claimed a prophetic insight were to validate it by acknowledging the apostolic letters as of divine origin. “If anyone claims to be a prophet or inspired, let him recognize that what I write has the Lord’s authority” (1 Cor. 14:37). Certainly, if the Spirit was operating in a man he would recognize His own words and revelation.

g. Paul contended that the tradition which he passed on, for a tradition is simply something handed over or handed down, originated with the Lord. He did not arrive at it by his own research and it was not given unto him by other apostles previously chosen. “I commend you for always keeping me in mind, and maintaining the tradition which I handed on to you . . . For the tradition which I handed on to you came from the Lord himself” (1 Cor. 11:2, 23).

It is not necessary that I multiply references or pile up quotations. I do not know if the apostles were apprised of the fact that there would be a compilation of their material into a single volume to be designated as the holy Bible. I rather doubt that such was the case. But I am convinced that they wrote with full recognition that they were chosen instruments of God to receive the divine revelation and hand it to succeeding generations as the tradition of heaven. That it was given a place with the scriptures is proven by Peter who wrote, “So also our beloved brother Paul wrote to you according to the wisdom given him, speaking of this as he does in all his letters. There are some things in them hard to understand, which the ignorant and unstable twist to their own destruction, as they do the other scriptures” (2 Peter 3:15, 16).

Let me make it clear that, so far as I am concerned, the new covenant scriptures contain the revelation of God’s will for my life. I shall not be upset by how they were gathered, collated and compiled. To me, they contain within themselves those internal proofs which establish their validity. I intend to read, study and shape my life according to them as best I can. I do not intend ever to twist them. If I err in my understanding and application of them it will be a mistake of the head and not the heart. I take my stand firmly and unequivocally upon these scriptures as God’s guideline for my life and destiny.

Next month, if the Father wills, I shall start addressing myself to questions related to the distinction between gospel and doctrine. It will undoubtedly be one of the most valuable studies in our present series.

Gospel and Doctrine

Mission Messenger (February 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“He that takes away reason to make way for revelation puts out the light of both, and does much the same as if he would persuade a man to put out his eyes the better to receive the remote light of an invisible star by a telescope.”— John Locke.

I have resolved that, with the help of God this year, I will attempt an answer to some of the questions posed by various individuals and addressed to me either in public forums or by private mail. Some of the things which I have been saying appear to be new to many in our generation and require repetition in order that they may be more fully grasped. In undertaking this rather awesome task I hope to avoid any semblance of pretense to any degree of superior knowledge in reference to the matters discussed. My knowledge is limited and the scope of my understanding is restricted.

But I do have an eagerness to share from my meager store with all whom I love in the Lord. It was Lord Bacon who helped me to see the true purpose of acquiring knowledge. “Some men think that the gratification of curiosity is the end of knowledge; some the love of fame; some the pleasure of dispute; some the necessity of supporting themselves by their knowledge; but the real use of all knowledge is, that we should dedicate that reason which was given us by God to the use and advantage of man.” Nothing I write will be dogmatic in tenor. It does not become a servant in the house of a master to try and impose his will upon the other servants. Certainly he should not tyrannize over them. I want never to create a personal following or promote a party parade. It sounds cold and even unloving to say it, but I am not at all disturbed by how men receive what I say. I am not seeking for glory from men nor acclaim from my contemporaries. Above all, I do not want to exploit any other person for glory or gain.

Although I do not always agree with Will Durant in The Story of Philosophy my dissent does not include this statement, “Every man is to be respected as an absolute end in himself; and it is a crime against the dignity that belongs to him as a human being, to use him as a means for some external purpose.” I want to see no one become a religious stooge or pawn. It is sad enough to reduce men to the level of mechanical cogs, but even worse to make them cat’s-paws to pull sectarian chestnuts out of factional flames. But perhaps we should get along with the questions.

1. I have heard here at school that you make a distinction between the gospel of Christ, and the apostolic doctrine. On what grounds do you do so?

I wish that everything you heard about me at school was as correctly reported as this. Indeed I do make such a distinction because I am thoroughly convinced that it is scriptural, and failure to recognize this creates one of the greatest problems confronting us in our generation. It is the ignorance of this matter which is basic to much of our strife and division and I am quite convinced, as was Alexander Campbell, that we will never be able to recapture the real dynamic for unity until we recover this concept.

I shall never forget what a mind-changing event it was when I first became aware of the significant difference between the kerygma to be proclaimed to a lost world, and the didache to be addressed to a saved people. So long had I been steeped in our mistaken tradition that it was difficult for me to concede my error. It involved too many of my sermon outlines and too much of my past writing.

But I plunged into research with fervor, half hoping that I could salvage at least a few of the antagonistic messages which I had ignorantly regarded as “gospel sermons.” Fortunately, reason and revelation gained the day and I was rescued even from that last refuge of little minds which always say when trapped against the ledge of truth, “Well, I’m not sure it makes that much difference.”

While it has no real bearing upon the right or wrong of my position, I should like to call attention to the fact that it is not an original insight of mine, nor is it in any sense unique. And just here I want to take the time and space to honor another eminent Presbyterian whose profound thinking influenced our own reformation far beyond our general recognition. I refer to Dr. George Campbell, who became Principal of Marischal College and University, in Aberdeen, in 1759, a position which he held for almost forty years.

When David Hume made his famous and clever attack upon miracles and the supernatural he literally shook the religious world to its foundation. In 1762 Dr. Campbell replied in his treatise A Dissertation on Miracles, and I have read it again and again with appreciation as did Alexander Campbell in his more youthful days. Perhaps Dr. Campbell did not become popular in our land because of his addresses criticizing our American colonies for their revolt. His position was that the colonials should be subject to the powers that be which were ordained of God and should pay their stamp tax. He affirmed that violence and unlawful seizure of goods and pillaging of stores was unbecoming for Christians, even when dressed like untutored savages. That did not go over too well with anyone except the Tories who were frequently tarred and feathered for their dissent, but by the time Alexander Campbell was old enough to study, the revolution was fading into history.

The last work of Dr. Campbell was a translation of the four gospel records with “preliminary dissertations.” It is this translation which Alexander Campbell largely adopted and incorporated in “Living Oracles.” In his Preliminary Dissertation Number VI, Dr. Campbell spends thirteen pages investigating the three Greek words rendered “to preach” and the one rendered “to teach.” He begins by saying, “My intention is, not only to point out exactly the differences of meaning in these words, but to evince that the words whereby the two former are rendered in some, perhaps most modern languages, do not entirely reach the meaning of the original terms, and in some measure, by consequence, mislead most readers.”

I must limit myself to a mere statement in which Dr. Campbell summarizes by saying, “And if teaching and preaching be found sometimes coupled together, the reason appears to be, because their teaching, in the beginning of this new dispensation, must have been frequently introduced by announcing the Messiah, which alone was preaching.”

Alexander Campbell, with his keen power of discrimination, recognized the scriptural difference between the gospel which was a message to be preached to the world, and the doctrine with which the body of Christ was to be instructed. In the April, 1862, edition of Millennial Harbinger he wrote: “There was teaching, there was singing, there was praying, there was exhortation in the Christian church, but preaching in the church, or to the church, is not once mentioned in the Christian scriptures! Paul once, in his first letter to the church in Corinth, said he would declare to the Corinthians that gospel which he had preached to them, which also they had received and wherein they stood. We preach, or report, or proclaim news. But who teaches news? Who exhorts news? We preach the gospel to unbelievers, to aliens, but never to Christians, or those who have received it.”

Dr. Carroll Kendrick, a scholar of both medicine and scripture, wrote in the Gospel Advocate, on page 373, in 1890:

There is absolutely neither precept nor precedent for preaching to the church. Preaching the gospel is for the world. Teaching is for the church, and is to be done by a plurality of bishops in each congregation.

MY PERSONAL POSITION

The distinction between the gospel and apostolic doctrine grows out of the nature of the kingdom of heaven and its relationship to men. As is true with any other kingdom there are two classes of persons with relation to it— aliens and citizens. The purpose of revelation as addressed to aliens is to lead them to naturalization or citizenship, but the purpose of revelation to the citizens is to instruct and train them in how they may better grow and serve. Since there are two different objectives to be obtained there are two different messages, each of which is adapted to the goal in mind.

The message addressed to aliens is intended to call them out of the state of alienation, in which they are separated from God, and call them into a state in which they are in fellowship, that is, in which they share the divine life. It is called the gospel, the good news, and those who accept it and respond to it form the ekklesia, the called out ones.

The gospel is to be announced, proclaimed or heralded to the world. It is to be preached in all the world and to every creature. It is the euaggelion, the evangel, designed for the lost, and its purpose is to announce that divine love became effective and the Word which was with God and was God became incarnate, and through Him we have become reconciled to the Father. This message is not for the saved. You cannot evangelize saved persons. The new covenant scriptures know nothing of “preaching the gospel” to the saints of God. Such an expression would have seemed ridiculous and unintelligible to the apostles.

On the other hand, the message to the saved ones is a course of instruction, a didactic curriculum intended to help them grow, develop and mature in the family relationship. It was those who had gladly received the word and who were baptized, who then continued steadfastly in the apostles' doctrine. Not a single apostolic letter was written to the world. All of them were addressed to congregations of disciples or to individuals who had "set to their seal that God is true." Characteristic is the Philippian letter "to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons."

The gospel was fully proclaimed on Pentecost. It was accepted and fully obeyed by some three thousand persons on that day. Not a word was ever added to it. Those who came into the covenant relationship did not do so on the basis of a partial or incomplete evangel. Yet this was almost twenty years before the first letter was written which now appears in the sacred canon.

The gospel is the seed, the sperm, by which we are begotten. The doctrine is the bread upon which the children feed, and by which they grow. Peter declares that we are begotten "not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God which liveth and abideth forever," and then identifies the message by saying, "And this is the word which by the gospel was proclaimed unto you."

Paul carefully distinguishes between the evangelist who begets, and the teacher who instructs God's children in Christ. "I write not these things to shame you, but as my beloved sons I warn you. For though you have ten thousand instructors in Christ, yet have ye not many fathers: for in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel" (1 Cor. 4:15, 16).

It is easily demonstrated that not one apostolic letter is a part of the gospel of Christ. Every such letter was written to those who heard, believed and accepted the gospel. To the Romans Paul wrote that he had fully preached the gospel from Jerusalem, and round about to Illyricum, yet much of the apostolic writing was done after the letter was written to the Romans. Certainly the Roman letter was not part of the gospel for in it Paul declared of the world of his day, “they have not all obeyed the gospel.” If the Roman letter was part of the gospel none of them had obeyed it for they did not yet have it.

The letter to the Galatians was not part of the gospel because it was written to censure those who had accepted the gospel and then abandoned it for what they thought was another gospel, but which was not good news at all. The Galatians to whom Paul wrote had been baptized into Christ and had put on Christ. Unless we can distinguish between the evangel to be proclaimed to the world, and the doctrine to be taught to the saints we will serve only to confuse and confound the world and disrupt the peace and harmony of the saints.

IS IT IMPORTANT?

2. Do you not make too big a deal out of this? Is it really that important?

I doubt that one can emphasize the point I am making too much when he considers the ignorance on the subject of those who would be recognized as teachers. It should be one of our goals to place every thought in proper perspective, and to recognize proper distinctions. The apostle prayed for the Philippians that they might “distinguish between those things which differ” (1:10), and if we would lessen confusion in the realm of thought we should strive for the same thing.

Let me show you why I deem this subject of such grave concern. Our Lord has made our hope of salvation, that is, our being made whole, contingent upon believing the gospel. His chosen envoys were to go into all the world, and proclaim the gospel unto every person. It is distinctly said, “He that believeth the gospel and is baptized shall be saved.” If the gospel includes the whole of the new covenant scriptures then one cannot be saved until he hears and obeys every requirement of every letter. If not, he will be saved by a partial gospel.

This will remove salvation from the realm of faith in the person and identity of God’s Son and transfer it to the domain of knowledge of didactical and abstract truths. But all human knowledge is relative and no one can ever be sure that his comprehension has embraced all that is essential to his salvation, and there must ever be the haunting fear that he may have overlooked one fact essential to his salvation.

The truth of the gospel is that we are justified by faith and have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. It is Jesus who “is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption” (1 Cor. 1:30). We are not accepted upon the basis of our intellectual attainment or upon the degree of knowledge which we possess about matters of doctrinal concern. The scriptures clearly teach that “if any man think that he knoweth anything, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know. But if any man love God, the same is known of him.”

As long as preachers mistakenly assume that the gospel embraces the entire new covenant scriptures they will brand as unbelievers those who truly believe in Jesus but may be mistaken about some point of interpretation in one of the epistles. Such a usage of the term unbeliever is nowhere sanctioned by the Holy Spirit. Unbelievers are those who do not accept the divine Sonship of Jesus. In Corinth there were certain brethren who were suing or impleading other brethren before pagan tribunals or in heathen courts. But Paul makes a clear distinction between mistaken and guilty brethren and unbelievers. “But brother goeth to law with brother, and that before the unbelievers” (1 Cor. 6:6).

No man is an unbeliever who is in Christ Jesus, regardless of his mistaken views or limited knowledge. Even Paul declared that he only knew in part. He said that he had not attained and was not yet perfect. His recommendation was, that to the extent of their knowledge, imperfect as it was, the brethren should walk by the same rule and mind the same thing (Phil. 3:16). Nothing is more detrimental to the cause of Christ than regarding as unbelievers those who believe in him and earnestly seek to serve Him.

Unbelievers in the Corinthian context are the unjust, the world of the unregenerate, those who walk in darkness. In 2 Corinthians 6:15 Paul asks, “What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?” Never does he ask what part one believer has with another, even one who is mistaken. There were those of the saints who did not possess a clear knowledge that idols were nothing. Because of their past training, environment and culture, they thought there might be something to an idol. Paul said they did not have a clear knowledge that there was but one God and one Lord. They were “conscious of the idol unto this hour.” But they were brethren, although weak, and his concern was that those who had a greater area of knowledge should not cause a weak brother for whom Christ died to perish through their knowledge. There is as much danger of those who have a superior knowledge destroying a weaker brother as there is of a weaker brother destroying himself by his own ignorance.

When we judge our brethren as worthy or unworthy upon the basis of our own doctrinal knowledge level we deny that there can be any such thing as a weaker brother. Every person must know the same things at the same time, and conformity becomes our goal rather than allegiance to the Lord Jesus. And yet we can no more all think alike than we can all look alike. God has created us with as many divergent intellectual capacities as we have varied physical differences. As Montaigne wrote: “There never were in the world, two opinions alike, no more than two hairs, or two grains, the most universal quality is diversity.”

Horace Mann said, “Do not think of knocking out another person’s brains because he differs in opinion from you. It would be as rational to knock yourself on the head because you differ from yourself ten years ago.” And Jonathan Swift said, “If a man should register all his opinions upon love, politics, religion, learning, etc., beginning from his youth, and so go on to old age, what a bundle of inconsistencies and contradictions would appear at last.”

The very spirit of the good news is that it accepts man as it finds him. Men who are enfeebled in intellect are adopted into the divine family upon the same basis as the most erudite and scholarly. The everlasting arms embrace both the pin-headed pigmy in the jungle and the president of Princeton University. Henri Frederic Amel wrote, “Do not despise your situation; in it you must act, suffer and conquer. From every point on earth we are equally near to heaven and to the infinite.”

We do not come to God by degrees— college degrees, that is. One need not possess a master’s degree to realize that he is a sinner, and until he recognizes this he will never truly know the need of a Savior. The glory of the gospel is that it creates no criteria except an unreserved trust in the righteousness which is from God through faith in Christ Jesus.

It is incongruous that Almighty God whose purpose from the creation of the universe was to bring together in one, all things in heaven and on earth, would devise a plan for doing so which would effectively hinder and thwart the obtaining of the divine objective. And our postulate of unity by conformity to a certain degree of intellectual perception of instruction will defeat God’s goal for the universe.

Unity is possible only through faith. It is a product of the gospel. The gospel is designed to enlist soldiers in a single army in which those who were formerly enemies become a unit in Christ. Its purpose is to enroll students in the school of Christ where each student must grow in grace and knowledge of the truth, and develop to the extent of his personal potential. The gospel is the unitive message, and obedience of its demands brings those who respond immediately into a fellowship of the reconciled.

One is no more reconciled or redeemed after he has studied scriptures for twenty years than when he arose from the washing of regeneration. He is no more a citizen of the kingdom of heaven when he has learned to read the apostolic letters in Greek, than when he first tremblingly acknowledged his belief that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the Living God. It is birth that introduces one into a family, not a knowledge of geometry or philosophy. It is as absurd and asinine to predicate fellowship upon a uniform doctrinal conformity as it would be to refuse to recognize your physical offspring as members of your family until they made a passing grade in first-year algebra. Lop-sided opinions no more disqualify one for membership in the spiritual family than a wart on the nose disqualifies one for relationship in a physical family. I am assuming that in the latter case the person with the wart will not begin insisting that everyone have a wart in the same location, and predicate family fellowship on a wart basis!

There is not now, nor was there ever, unity upon the basis of doctrinal conformity. Those who call for it the loudest are not agreed among themselves. They argue with the ones whom they receive and debate with the ones whom they recognize. Such a system does not produce Christians, but Pharisees and hypocrites. It proposes a standard for others which those who propose it cannot attain. It is schismatic, divisive, irrational and unscriptural.

God is not in the business of creating robots. He is not the president of a factory turning out grinning Kewpie-dolls. He has always recognized the uniqueness of individuals, and until we do the same, we are doomed to continue the weary round of strife and cleavage, rending and tearing the one body to bits over our deductions and opinions. On the ridiculous basis of exclusivism there is not a thinking man alive who could have been in fellowship with his own self ten years ago, and who will not have to withdraw from his present self ten years hence.

Unity based upon a certain level of doctrinal attainment is simply the freezing of knowledge at the contemporary level. It does no honor to truth but sacrifices it to tradition. It makes study a crime and learning a disaster. It glorifies the dishonest as loyal and brands the honest heretics. A realization of this has led me to conclude that until man can distinguish between the gospel which unites and the doctrine which educates the united, we will only perpetuate our follies of the past.

C. S. Lewis in his Letters to Malcolm made this trenchant observation: "It takes all sorts to make a world, or a church. This may be even truer of a church. If grace perfects nature it must expand all our natures into the full richness of the diversity which God intended when he made them, and heaven will display far more variety than hell. 'One fold' doesn't mean 'one pool.' Cultivated roses and daffodils are not more alike than wild roses and daffodils."

In his series of sermons on "The Liberty of Prophesying," Jeremy Taylor deals in number thirteen, with the topic of the deportment to be used toward persons disagreeing. Here are his words: "Whoever persecutes a disagreeing person, arms all the world against himself, and all pious people of his own persuasion, when the scales of authority return to his adversary, and attest his contradictory; and then, what can he urge for mercy for himself, or his party that sheweth none to other?"

3. The objection has been made to your thinking that you believe one must be right about the gospel but after that you do not care what he thinks about the rest of the Bible. Isn't that a dangerous position to take?

It certainly would be dangerous to advocate such a thing, but in this case, the real danger lies with those who make such a false accusation. I have observed that those who know the most about what I advocate are those who have never read a word I have ever written. Even preachers operate upon the basis of hearsay and take third-hand testimony without making the slightest personal enquiry or investigation before they join the ancient order of rumor-mongers and the guild of gossip-circulators. I say "even preachers," as if they were a breed apart. I sometimes think they may be the worst of the lot in this respect.

This really does not bother me one bit. Since Jesus entered into my life and took the "Vacancy sign" from the front door of my heart, threw up the shades so the sun could shine in, and moved into the inner apartment, I am no longer disturbed by what insecure, fear-ridden and guilt-haunted brethren report. It took me a long time to get to the place where I could share in the transcendent bliss which belongs to those against whom all manner of evil is spoken falsely for his sake.

I admit and confess that such things used to flatten me out and make me feel as low and sticky as an ant in a puddle of syrup, but not any more. Since he has taken over I can rejoice and be exceeding glad. Nothing makes me happier than to realize that those who attack my position have to lie to do it. If what they said was true I would have no inclination to throw my hat in the air and shout, but as it is I can vibrate with joy that is real!

I do not think one should ignore reports simply because they are baseless and have no foundation. Even one who is on a ladder painting a house, may have to take time from such a beautification project to swat an occasional yellow-jacket.

However, he must not make that his chief aim and forget his original avocation. The unfortunate thing about my explanations is that those who read them do not need them, and those who need them do not read them!

There's another thing that strikes me as being a little peculiar also, and that is that brethren are often more unfair than those who make no profession of faith in Jesus. A lot of brethren are not really concerned with what you say. They already know what you think, and no amount of protestation upon your part will make any difference. As La Fontaine put it: "Nothing is more dangerous than a friend without discretion; even a prudent enemy is preferable." No wonder Martin Luther prayed, "Lord, deliver me from my enemies, but especially from my friends."

In dealing with the proper perspective of the faith which saves, and the doctrine which feeds, it must be remembered that both are from God, and both are important for the purpose for which they were given. It is important for a baby to be born and delivered into the family relationship, but after birth it is also important that the baby continue to eat and be nourished. But birth is a single act, a one-time occurrence, while eating is a life process. One does not on the day of his birth eat all that he will require for the rest of his life. No one is born a mature person, although he possesses all of the organs essential to being.

Obedience to the gospel brings us into the family. There is no other way to enter the world than by birth, and no other way to enter into the new creation than by spiritual birth. The gospel is essential to being. And the gospel consists of facts, validated by testimony, which must be believed, in order to transfer one from a state of alienation into one of reconciliation with God. The gospel is a definitive message of historical fact related to the Word of God who was made flesh and dwelt among us.

The doctrine upon which those feed who have been born into the divine family is essential to continued growth and development. But one need not be right about everything God has revealed in order to have life or to share in the family relationship. The reason for this is because the family relationship is not contingent upon being free from all error but upon being in Christ Jesus. It is Jesus Christ, and him crucified, that constituted the apostolic proclamation, and thus constitutes the basis of our acceptance in the beloved.

There is room in the family of God, as in every other family, for those who may be mistaken about many things. If there were not room for such there would be no family “for in many things we all offend,” as James wrote. It is always better to be right than to be wrong. No one should choose to be in error and I do not know of any brethren who do. We should constantly study and diligently investigate in order to arrive at the truth upon any matter of concern. But life does not depend upon a person being right, but upon being in the right person. It is very simple. “He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life.” Life depends upon having the Son and not upon having perfect knowledge or an unfailing memory. And one who is not free to make mistakes is not free at all!

It is a wee bit silly for preachers to say in one article that I do not care what one thinks about the rest of the Bible, as a certain editor did, only to write in his very next issue, “Brother Ketcherside is one of the most perceptive Biblical scholars among us today.” The problem with that brother is not that I do not care about the rest of the Bible, but rather that I do not give the snap of my finger for our traditions which make void the scriptures, by emptying them of their true meaning and content.

I still insist that if one is right about Jesus he can be wrong about many other things and still be saved, but if he is wrong about Jesus he can be right about everything else and still be lost. Intellectual rightness will not save us apart from Christ, and intellectual error or imbecility will not damn us unless it leads us to deny him and to trust in our own righteousness which we rescue from the garbage dump.

Jesus is greater than anything that has been written about him. The written word does not exhaust the Living Word. He dwells in the light unto which no man can approach. He only has immortality and no mortal can ever encompass him fully with a finite mind. But we can accept him as the way, the truth, and the life, and we can walk in the way a step at a time, we can be led into deeper truths each passing day, and we can share in the life each thrilling minute.

But we are as much in The Way when we take our first step as when we take our last, and we are as much in the truth when we accept him in childlike faith as when our expanding spiritual consciousness leads us into deepening realms of thought. One is as much in a river when he steps into the shallows as he will ever be, but he does not truly swim in the depths until he launches out into the deep.

My answer to my would-be detractors is my own life. It would be vain to profess a love for the doctrine of Christ if I never studied it, or if I ground out only the traditional grist of a party mill, feeding it back into the millstones from simplistic sermon outline books which are as puerile now as when I depended upon them in my ignorance and childhood immaturity. I challenge my beloved brethren who love the Book to read it with unveiled face. I challenge them to discard the lens prescribed and ground for them by our institutional complex, and let the word lead them into a genuine and profound relationship with the blessed and only Potentate, the King of kings and Lord of lords.

I want never to worship the Bible. Bibliolatry is like Mariolatry. Mary was God's vehicle to deliver Jesus to the world, and the Bible is God's vehicle to deliver the world to Jesus. But there is a great difference between the taxi which takes you to the doctor and the physician to whom you are taken. And it is possible to get so hooked on talking about and discussing the taxicab you might not make it to the doctor's office before the door is shut. I do not want to become so involved with the mechanics of the Bible that I never meet the Great Physician. Some of my brethren end up with a head full of scriptural quotations and a heart empty of Jesus. Your ability to dangle keys on a mental chain will not keep you from perishing in the cold if you do not know how to use them to open the door and enter into the warmth of the house of love!

4. I was born and reared in Kentucky, where we were taught to have nothing to do with premillennial congregations. Are you implying that we were wrong in thus drawing a line?

I not only say it is wrong, but I say it is a sin to divide God's glorious family into warring tribes and hostile parties over such things as an opinion about the millennium. Kentucky is a wonderful state. It is the home of Cane Ridge and the locale of the Great Revival. It is the home of Lexington, site of the union of the Christians and Reformers. But the heirs of a noble concept have not measured up to the stature of their fathers, and have served only to split and rive the once fruitful tree of their paternal planting.

Just because one was fortunate enough to enter the world inside the border of the Bluegrass State provides no ground for ignoring the instructions given by the Holy Spirit to govern our relationship to our brethren in the kingdom of heaven. Brethren in Kentucky, like those of us in Missouri, are under orders not to pass judgment upon one another, and not to hold one another in contempt. We are to "pursue the things that make for peace and build up the common life." The scriptures teach us, "In a word, accept one another as Christ accepted us, to the glory of God."

There is no such thing as a premillennial congregation. There are no doubt congregations where a goodly number of the brethren hold the opinion that Jesus will return before the millennium, and there might be an occasional one where all of the constituency hold that position. But even this does not make such a group a “premillennial congregation” unless the brethren demand as a condition of membership that you subscribe to this viewpoint as a condition of being accepted. I do not know of any congregation with that kind of creed!

I have labored with congregations in Kentucky and Tennessee which have been branded as premillennial by partisans around them, and I have been welcomed and received as a brother in the Lord Jesus. My common experience is that those congregations are more open and willing to recognize God’s other children than are some of their bitter critics. This may be because they have learned the meaning of grace and discovered a genuine sense of freedom in Christ. Those who become entangled in their exclusive brier patches which they have planted and cultivated are always inclined to attack and snap at others who are not trapped in their doctrinal thicket.

It is ridiculous to shatter the family of God upon earth over how and when our “elder brother” will return from the far country. If we continue to clobber one another we may all be ashamed when he arrives, and unworthy to greet him. It is not an understanding of the details of his second coming which makes our relationship possible but an acceptance of the fact of his first coming in the flesh. “This is how we may recognize the Spirit of God: every spirit which acknowledges that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is of God.”

I am convinced that if one believes with all of his heart that Jesus is the Christ and lives up to the commitment which this involves, he will not lose his reward even if he is mistaken about all that is involved in it. The fact is that I do not know all that God has prepared for me, but whatever it is, I want to be prepared for it.

Brethren who take the premillennial position accept Jesus as the Son of God and the Messiah. Those who take the opposite position accept the same thing. Probably a majority of the brethren have no particular position and do not know what all the fuss is about. Regardless of what anyone thinks or says, God's will is going to be done. Certainly someone is mistaken. In some respects they may all be. But human mistakes will not deter the fulfillment of God's program and need not hinder our participation in his blessing.

I say "need not" for the simple reason that if I build a party or faction around either position and cause a cleavage in the body I will lose my reward. One might prove to be absolutely correct about the millennium and still come under condemnation if he "set at nought" his brethren. On the other hand, one might be wrong about the millennium and still be saved if he loved all of the brethren and did not try to impose his views upon their conscience.

It is not necessary to "take a stand" on the thousand year reign in order to get to heaven. The Pharisees among us are always trying to con the brethren into "taking a stand on the issues" under threat of excommunication here and hell hereafter. This is the very essence of factionalism. But all you need to do is to take an unwavering stand for Jesus Christ as Lord of life and "be not moved away from the hope of the gospel." The Revelation letter was not written until near the close of the first century, and by that time thousands of disciples had suffered death and gone to their reward. There is no indication that they had even heard of the millennium, much less "taken a stand" on it!

No one can prove that a single one of the apostles except John ever heard that the souls of them that were beheaded for the witness of Jesus, and for the word of God, would "live and reign with Christ a thousand years." Most of the brethren now, with the whole canon before them, take a position on Revelation 20:4 and then read it back into about everything the apostles wrote and Jesus said. They are equally certain that all of the holy prophets, the Son of God, and the chosen apostles were “millennialists” of their various kinds. It is astonishing how, when men get a certain stance or bias, they can find it on every page of the Bible, staring out at them in the most unlikely places. And all of them become quite upset that others cannot recognize their mental phantoms and wispy ghosts of ideas.

I am not arguing that there is not a correct interpretation of Revelation 20. I am quite convinced there is! I am not arguing that, since there is a right interpretation, that others are not wrong! I believe they are. Above all else, I do not contend that one view is as good as another. That would be absurd. But what I am saying is that no view or opinion, right or wrong, about the thousand-year reign, is as important as receiving Jesus and God’s other children.

“This is his command: to give our allegiance to his Son Jesus Christ and love one another as he commanded” (1 John 3:23). I know a number of brethren who give their allegiance to Jesus Christ and differ with me about the millennium. And I am not about to deny their allegiance because of our doctrinal differences. I do not compromise my thinking nor sacrifice my position when I labor with brethren who differ with me. We talk about our divergent views in love but I never seek to bind my understanding of the millennial reign upon them. I can listen to their explanations without rancor and with the utmost love, and since I am no longer a factionalist I do not seek to “convert” them. If they cannot concur with me I do not quit loving them. I give no ultimatums and issue no commands or demands. I am no longer playing God with other saints.

I admit that some of the brethren get a little trigger-happy and want to take me into their particular millennial corral, but I am used to that procedure in every party and it never perturbs me. Since I started writing on fellowship and trying to be nice to all of the brethren, every party has put out the word from time to time that I am weakening and will soon line up with them. But I am not that weak. I will never again line up with any group that demands as a price for their love that I hate other brethren. I am through with all of that silly and childish approach to the majestic kingdom.

It is a sin to fragment into exclusive parties over the question of the millennium, the scripturality of instrumental music, the support of television programs, and all of the rest of the nitty-gritty which we have elevated to such importance that it obscures the divine relationship made possible by the blood of Jesus. The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink. Neither is it a view of the millennium, instrumental music or individual cups. It is righteousness, joy and peace. These other things when elevated to dogmatic status renounce righteousness, jeopardize joy and pervert peace. No opinion or interpretation of a doctrinal issue should ever separate those who have been called into the fellowship of the Son of God, and none ever will until men in their pride seek to force their fellows to conformity with human wisdom!

About the Church

[Abstract]

The questions with which I am dealing in this issue resulted from an interview with a young brother who was doing a paper on the theme of my writings concerning the nature of the church. Space will not permit me to deal with all of the questions but the following will give you a good idea of my position.

1. Do you regard the kingdom of God as identical with the church for which Jesus died?

I think the expression “kingdom of God” is a more extensive one than the word church as used in the new covenant scriptures. Kingdom is uniformly from basileia and this does not refer to place, location or territory, but to rule, reign or sovereignty. The expression “kingdom of God” thus denotes the sovereign Lordship of God over his people or over the universe of his creation. There has never been a time when the kingdom of God did not exist.

David declared that the Lord “is king for ever and ever” (Psalm 10:16) and said he was “the great sovereign over all the earth” (Psalm 47:2). He wrote, “God is king of all the earth . . . God reigns over the nations, God is seated on his holy throne.” God did not abdicate his sovereignty because of sin. He has always occupied the throne and held sway over the universe.

When the Word became flesh and came to dwell among us, bringing grace and truth, a new order was introduced, and men were called upon to reform their lives because the rule of heaven was approaching.

It was the intention of the Father to bestow all authority in heaven and upon earth on the Son, and those who accepted the sovereignty of Jesus over their lives, and acknowledged his lordship, would become citizens of the kingdom of heaven. Since these were called out of a state of alienation into a union with Jesus, they were regarded as the ekklesia, the elect of God, a term which has been unfortunately and mistakenly rendered “church” in the King James and a good many subsequent versions.

The apostle Paul wrote to God’s people at Colossae, “The Father has made you fit to share the heritage of God’s people in the realm of light. He rescued us from the domain of darkness and brought us away into the kingdom of his dear Son, in whom our release is secured and our sins, forgiven” (Col. 1:12, 13). All of those who have been born of the water and of the Spirit constitute the community of the new humanity, and are in the kingdom of heaven. Because the foundation principle is the fact of the Messiahship and divine Sonship of Jesus, our Lord declared he would plant his community upon it, and spoke of it as the kingdom of heaven.

There is no difference between the scope of the expression “kingdom of God” and “kingdom of heaven.” Matthew employed the latter term because his gospel was addressed to the Jews. It was conventional among them to substitute “heaven” for “God” because of their extreme reluctance to speak the word God, lest they unconsciously use it in vain and come under the condemnation of the third commandment in the Decalogue.

In a sense, the kingdom of heaven is more comprehensive now than is the church. Everyone who is in the church is in the kingdom, but not everyone who is in the kingdom is in the church. There are infants and imbeciles in the kingdom but not in the church, since the latter is composed of those who are responsible believers. There are angels in the kingdom and when the Son of man comes on the throne of His glory the holy angels will accompany him. It is those who are responsible for their sins before God who must be born from above in order to gain identity in the kingdom.

While the kingdom as it is now exhibited on earth embraces those who are reconciled unto God by the death of his Son, and who are still in the flesh, there remains another and a glorified phase. God always adapts his revelation and requirements to man as he is and the kingdom of heaven as now administered in the earth is adapted to men in the flesh. It is so ordered as to make possible forgiveness of sins and reconciliation with God and prepare us for sharing the life of God and the redeemed ones in a state free from the limitations and inhibitions of time and space.

There is an exalted and glorified habitude which flesh and blood cannot inherit (1 Cor. 15:50). Accordingly there must be a resurrection for those who are dead and a transformation of those who are alive when the Lord comes. There will be only two classes of persons— those who are on the earth and those who are in it. These will exchange the animal body for a spiritual body consonant with the full enjoyment of eternal life. Thus, Paul solemnly charges Timothy by the coming appearance and reign of the Lord (2 Tim. 4:1), and declares that “the Lord will rescue me from every attempt to do me harm, and keep me safe until his heavenly reign begins” (4:18).

My personal view, reached from my own study, is that there has always been a kingdom or rule of heaven, and that the ekklesia, the called-out ones constitute “the people of God” on earth at present and are the manifestation of the rule which began when Jesus sat down at the right hand of God, having been made both Lord and Christ. But there remains for the people of God a glorification in which they will share when this present life of suffering is over. “Our troubles are slight and short-lived; and their outcome an eternal glory which outweighs them all” (2 Cor. 4:17).

It can be seen from what I have written that I regard the word “kingdom” as applied to the rule of the heavens, as more expansive than “church” which refers to the called-out ones under his headship. The kingdom of God did not begin with the church. So I do not say that kingdom and church are synonymous terms in the new covenant scriptures, although they are sometimes used interchangeably. There is a difference as every astute linguistic student will at once recognize.

If your own reasoning and education has led you to a divergent view I will not fall out with you or argue with you about it. I shall simply rejoice that you have thought enough about it to form your own mental conviction regarding a subject of so much spiritual interest. My only concern is that all of us live up to the responsibility of citizens in such a magnificent realm of faith, hope and love. “The kingdom we are given is unshakable; let us therefore give thanks to God, and so worship him as he would be worshiped, with reverence and awe; for our God is a devouring fire.”

To be quite honest with you, I am not the least bit concerned with sectarian debates over the kingdom because I have learned that men argue and fight about various phases and aspects of the kingdom, each one viewing it from his own level of understanding and attainment. Often they are all partly right and partly wrong. It might do us all good to occasionally review the poem written by John Godfrey Saxe (c. 1850) entitled “The Blind Men and the Elephant.”

You’ll recall that “six men of Indostan to learning much inclined” went to examine an elephant, “though all of them were blind.” The one who stumbled against the side of the beast declared an elephant was like a wall, the one who felt the tusk opted for a spear, while the one who seized the trunk contended it was like a snake. The fourth felt about the knee and thought “the elephant is very like a tree,” while the fifth chanced to touch the ear and concluded it was like a fan. The sixth grabbed hold of the tail and forthwith thought of the elephant as “very like a rope.”

And so these men of Indostan

Disputed loud and long,

Each in his own opinion

Exceeding stiff and strong,

Though each was partly in the right

And all were in the wrong.

So oft, in theologic wars,

The disputants, I ween,

Rail on in utter ignorance

Of what each other mean,

And prate about an Elephant

Not one of them has seen.

I cherish my personal views about the nature and extent of the kingdom of God, although I have only begun to understand some of the former mystery which has been revealed through Jesus Christ and the holy apostles. I share my observations, as I have here, when asked about them, but I will not dogmatize about a matter so stupendous as the transcendent rule of the heavens.

I never forget the words of Thomas Jefferson, written in 1816: “On the dogmas of religion, as distinguished from the moral principles, all mankind from the beginning of the world to this day, have been quarreling, fighting, burning and torturing one another, for abstractions unintelligible to themselves and to all others, and absolutely beyond the comprehension of the human mind.” One can be a loyal citizen of the United States without understanding all of the ramifications of political science, and he can be a faithful subject of the Lord of life and still be quite ignorant of many things the prophets foretold and the apostle revealed. If he cannot, a lot of us are in serious trouble!

2. In your previous writings you have expressed the thought that the word “church” should not be in the Bible. I do not understand what you mean. Can you explain it to me?

I will try. Sometimes when a thing seems so obvious and decisive to me I have difficulty in making it clear to others. I overlook the fact that they have not done the countless hours of reading and research on the topic that preceded my own personal conclusion. I am sure you will forgive me if I tend to spend more time on this subject than you think it deserves. It is far more important than a mere hassling or haggling over a semantic whim. A real principle is involved.

The word rendered by “church” in some English versions is ekklesia, which is a combined form of ek, out, and kaleo, to call. It does not, however, mean simply to call a people out of a condition, but to call them together, or summon them into assembly. The corresponding word in Hebrew is qahal, which occurs 162 times in the old covenant scriptures. It is rendered by assembly 17 times, company 17, and congregation 86. In the Septuagint Version, which was the Greek version in use when Jesus was upon the earth, the word used as the equivalent was ekklesia. We can be certain that Jesus used the word with the same connotation as did the rest of the Jewish community.

It is interesting that the translators appointed by King James, when dealing with the old covenant scriptures never once used the word church. They had the Septuagint before them and knew where it used ekklesia as a translation of qahal, but they unvaryingly used assembly or congregation, and never once used church. Why did they not follow the same formula in the new covenant scriptures?

They certainly had a precedent. In commissioning them, the king ordered that they were to revise and compare previous translations with The Bishops' Bible being followed and as little altered "as the truth of the original" would permit. Tyndale, Matthew, Coverdale, the Great Bible and the Geneva Bible were to be used where they agreed better with the text than the Bishops' Bible. And the word "congregation" had appeared in these as a translation of ekklesia.

Moreover, before the text was printed, twelve delegates from the original fifty-four scholars met to review and revise the entire translation. In addition to the versions the king had mentioned in his directions, they had for comparison Luther's German translation, Zwingli's German translation, the Rheims and Douay versions, Olivetan's French translation, Latin translations by Pagninus, Munster, Castalio, and Erasmus, plus the Plantin Polyglot, and Spanish and Italian translations. But they also used the Aramaic Targum, the Syriac New Testament, and the best Greek and Hebrew manuscripts available at that time.

Why did they ignore scholarship, previous translations, and their own consistent renderings in the old covenant scriptures, by insisting on the word "church" in the new covenant scriptures? "Church" is not a translation of ekklesia. It is not even related to it. It occurs in various languages, such as the German kirche, the Dutch kerk, and the Scottish kirk. But it is derived from kuriakon oikos, the house of a lord. It probably stems from the days of feudalism when the lord lived in a manor atop the hill and his serfs eked out a wretched existence in the valley below. When it was adopted by the religious world it was applied to “a building for Christian worship,” a structure set apart from the homes, dedicated and consecrated to a worship of God.

This whole concept is utterly foreign to the revelation of God in Christ and is responsible for some of the most tragic deviations from the divine purpose. It is still perpetuated by well-meaning, but ignorant people, who have organized and institutionalized the redeemed ones into various types of sectarian polarization. So widespread is this misconception that one who calls attention to it now is regarded as a heretic or a nitwit.

The reason why the translators appointed by James started us on the rough and weary road of institutionalism is quite simple. James the First believed in the divine right of kings. He held that his right was hereditary, and that he was responsible to God alone and not to his subjects. As “Defender of the Faith” he regarded himself as head of the State Church, and in a position to authorize a version to be read publicly in it. The term “congregation” tended to weaken the establishment over which he regarded himself as head.

His Majesty recommended fourteen rules to regulate the translators and sent copies of them to Cambridge, Oxford and Westminster, where the work was to be done. The third rule reads: “The old ecclesiastical words to be kept; as the word church, not to be translated congregation, etc.” Apparently the king knew that the translators would render ekklesia by congregation if they were not forbidden by his legal fiat. One can but wonder what would have happened if the unwarranted word “church” had never been used in the scriptures? What would our signboards say? What would have happened to all of the sermons on the name of the church?

Alexander Campbell recognized the importance of this matter and in the appendix to Living Oracles inserted this note: “Wherever the word church is found in the common version, congregation will be found in this. We shall let Doctors Campbell and Doddridge defend this preference; for although they have not always so rendered it, they give the best of reasons why it should always be so translated.”

He then proceeds to give lengthy quotations from the two eminent scholars, and ends with this observation about the preference for congregation: “There is no good reason given, nor can there be any produced, for departing, in any instance, from the acknowledged meaning of a word of such frequent occurrence; and more especially when it is admitted that this term fitly represents the original one. The term church, or kirk, is an abbreviation of the words kuriou oikos, the house of the Lord, and does not translate the term ekklesia.”

In the book Alexander Campbell and His New Version, Cecil K. Thomas writes: “A translation which was probably as significant as ‘immerse’ was the substitution of ‘congregation’ for ‘church.’ Campbell frequently cited the older English versions, for this usage. His reason for giving the reading was that he felt ‘church’ to be an ecclesiastical word. It had taken on a theological connotation which had not attached itself to ekklesia in its New Testament usage. He felt that the word ‘congregation’ properly represented the Greek word without being cumbered with a variety of meanings such as that of church building or ecclesiastical organization.”

In 1955 there came from the press of Dobson Books, Ltd., in London, the first translation of the new covenant scriptures into English by a Jew, Hugh J. Schonfield. It was called The Authentic New Testament, and the publishers said of the translator: "By placing the New Testament firmly in its own period, and relating the text to the contemporary literature, customs and ideas, he has been able to furnish a vivid and intelligible rendering and throw new light on many passages. It is on these grounds that the title arises, the term 'authentic' relating to the quality of the New Testament itself as it may be read in the Greek, its accurate reflection of the atmosphere of the period in which the documents were written."

In every instance the word "immerse" is used instead of baptize, envoy is used instead of apostle, supervisor instead of bishop, and community instead of church. Of such terms Schonfield says in his Introduction, "The translator has felt it to be important for his purpose not to employ in his rendering familiar ecclesiastical terms where they could be avoided, since the use of them would give the impression that they were peculiarly Christian in origin and association." We read in The Authentic New Testament such passages as these:

John the Immerser appeared in the wilderness, announcing a penitential immersion for forgiveness of sins.

'Travel the world over' he told them, 'and proclaim the News to all creation. Whoever believes and is immersed will be saved, but whoever does not believe will be condemned.'

And so I tell you, since you are Peter, upon that rock I will found my Community, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

All the Christian communities send their regards
(Romans 16:16).

Now, all of this will help explain why I contend that the word "church" should not be in the scriptures. It is an ecclesiastical term injected by translators under orders of a profligate king. It is not a translation of the word it purports to represent, and it serves only to confuse and confound the minds of the masses as to the meaning of the Spirit.

3. What false impressions can result from use of the word “church”? Granted you are right about it, what difference will it make?

It hardly seems to me that your question reflects a wholesome attitude for one who claims to “speak where the Bible speaks.” It is important to remember that this involves speaking as the Bible speaks, that is, reproducing and conveying the ideas which the Spirit put into the original words. If translators employ a term which does not represent the original, or which serves to obscure it, we should discard that word in favor of one which more nearly portrays the divine message.

In listing his “Synopsis of Reform” the first obligation stated by Alexander Campbell was to recapture the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit. Men cannot think without the use of words, but it is likewise true that the words we use will determine what and how we think. If we would think clearly we must employ words which correctly delineate ideas and intents. To settle for a misleading term simply because it is hallowed by tradition is merely to prefer error to truth after it has become sanctified by repeated usage.

The word “church” in our day conveys an idea of a religious establishment or organization wholly foreign to the new covenant scriptures. Nowhere has one read of “members of the church” in God’s word, yet this is a frequent idiom in our speech. By it we mean an adherent of an organization, but the Greeks had no word for such. The word melos referred to a limb or organ of the body, a vital and integral part of an organism. Every time the word member occurs in the new covenant scriptures it is in connection with the word body. This is not the result of mere chance, but the correct usage of the word.

So far have we digressed along the organizational route that we use the word church to designate rival religious establishments. We speak of the Baptist Church, the Methodist Church, or the Presbyterian Church. But the word ekklesia which we have rendered “church” is not an organization, society or federation created by receiving men into “membership.” Instead it is a brotherhood consisting of all the redeemed upon earth, a body created by God and composed of every saved person in the world.

It is the community of the born again ones, joined to one another and to Jesus by the indwelling Spirit. Every reform movement which expects to return men closer to God’s ideal must begin here. If we mistake the nature of the ekklesia, the people of God, we will wander without a goal and breast the waves without a compass. Even Martin Luther, the monk of Ehrfurt, realized this. Kent S. Knutson, associate professor of systematic theology at Luther Theological Seminary, Saint Paul, Minnesota said, “Community was the key word used in original Reformation thought to describe the nature of the church. The church to Luther is the communio sanctorum, the sanctified community.”

He writes further about the thinking of Luther in these words: “Even the word ‘church’ seemed to have lost its usefulness. He discovered that the popular mind thought of either the church building or the institutional and organizational aspects when the German Kirche was mentioned. Kirche in the German Bible is the translation of the Greek ekklesia, which strictly translated means assembly or gathering. Luther maintained that this meaning would be retained better in German if the word ekklesia were translated ‘congregation,’ or best of all, and most clearly, ‘holy Christendom.’ The Latin communio he preferred to be translated Gemeinde, congregation or community. To make it even more simple he would have liked to have the creed read: ‘I believe that there is a holy Christian people,’ and let it go at that.”

The German reformer was more nearly correct on this than a lot of his critics with whom I am well acquainted but will not identify.

If you will pardon me, I would like to pay my respects now to one who is known by the formidable title of “The Right Reverend Lesslie Newbigin, Associate General Secretary, and Director of the Division of World Mission and Evangelism, World Council of Churches.” Lesslie Newbigin, with whom I have personally corresponded, was born in England and it was his intention to go into his father’s coal and shipping business. But his plan was defected because, as he said, he had “an experience of the reality of God” while a student at Queen’s College, Cambridge. He began a study of theology and wound up being elected a bishop of the newly-formed Church of South India in 1947.

I have been reading after his pen for a number of years and I freely acknowledge my debt to him for many insights. One of the most cherished of his books in my library of contemporary material is The Household of God, published in Great Britain in 1953. In it he writes: “There is an actual visible, earthly company which is addressed as ‘the people of God,’ the ‘Body of Christ.’ It is surely a fact of inexhaustible significance that what our Lord left behind Him was not a book, nor a creed, nor a system of thought, nor a rule of life, but a visible community. I think that we Protestants cannot too often reflect on that fact. He committed the entire work of salvation to that community. It was not that a community gathered around an idea, so that the idea was primary and the community secondary. It was that a community called together by the deliberate choice of the Lord Himself, and recreated in Him, gradually sought—and is seeking—to make explicit who He is and what He has done.”

While I am acknowledging obligations, many of my readers who have heard me speak, will recall that I have frequently mentioned the book One Body in Christ, written by Kokichi Kurosaki. I want to give you one idea developed by this sincere Japanese believer:

Fellowship between God and man, interrupted by the sin of the first Adam, was reopened by redemption bought with the blood of the last Adam. Now anyone can have direct koinonia with God and share His very life—anyone can live a life of love and unity with Christ. This is really the center of Christianity and ‘faith’ is nothing other than having this life union with God. To be justified by faith means that God has access to repentant sinners through Christ and is thus able to enjoy this koinonia with them.

If we will practice this living union with Christ, loving each other without any concern about sects and denominations, doctrines or forms, then we shall have the Body of Christ with him as Head. This is the Ekklesia in its truest and purest sense. Therefore, The Ekklesia is not an institution, not a system, not theology, not the words of the Bible, and not any ritual or ceremony. The Ekklesia exists where there is life union with God through Christ.

4. Are you saying, then, that you do not believe that Jesus founded a church?

Well, that’s putting it quite bluntly, and I am a wee bit reluctant to state it just that way. I hardly feel that one should lay his head on the chopping-block for careless thinkers to lop off with a dull axe. A good many of my brethren prefer to wander around inside of traditional fences and if someone is attracted to the wider range of God’s grace they feel obligated to practice their quick-draw and gun him down, as a sign of their fidelity to the party.

But let us face up to reality. I have said that Jesus constituted an ekklesia by the shedding of his blood, and that the word “church” does not represent or translate that word. Boiled down and simmered away, this means that I do not think of Jesus as building a structured organization upon the magnificent and profound truth that he is the Messiah and the Son of the Living God. Startling as it may seem when I enunciate it, a “church” was not in God’s plan at all.

All of the debates about the divine organization, including those in which I once engaged, are so much poppycock. What Jesus did leave us is a community, the people of God, ransomed and redeemed, and drawn unto him who shed his blood to make us one. A community is composed of people drawn together by a common tie, and that common tie in this instance is trust in God’s Son. It is not a trust based upon a subjective experience, but engendered by the compelling weight of testimony and fact. It is a communion, or fellowship, and this is what Jesus really planted, a koinonia of sharers in the common life, the life of God, that is, eternal life.

Think of it in these terms and much of the sectarian rivalry will disappear automatically, wafted away by our freedom from the tyranny of terminology. Phoebe will become a servant of the community at Cenchrea (Rom. 16:1). Luke and Titus will become messengers of the communities (2 Cor. 8:23). In Ephesians 1:21, 22, you will read, “He has indeed put everything under his feet, and over and above has given him headship of the Community, which is his Body, the full dimension of him who fills the entire universe.”

This would eliminate a lot of ridiculous queries. No one would ask another upon meeting him, “Of what church are you a member?” There would be no use for such statements as “This is the first time the Lord’s church has ever met in this area.” All of our journals are continually harping on “planting the Lord’s church in Wisconsin, New Zealand, or Timbuctoo,” but if we purified our language we would learn that we have been trying to plant something in some area which God did not even plant on earth.

A necessary corollary of all this is that the community of believers in one locality may not implement their approach to the world of unbelievers around them as do those in other localities. The Message will be the same because it is the very basis upon which the community is gathered. There could be no community of heaven upon any other basis. The Message preceded the community and the community came into existence out of response to the Message. The Message is unalterable and unchangeable. Its elements are fixed because they are facts, the facts of history.

The community, and all of those who are in it, must be free to adapt to circumstances in order to make the Message effective and achieve the divine purpose of summoning and gathering those of every culture, environment and background. So long as we think of one body as a legal corporation, an organizational entity, with every facet of procedure predetermined and fixed by divine fiat, we will continue to bind the body and lose the world. We need to think long and seriously about the apostolic example.

“I am a free man and own no master; but I have made myself every man’s servant, to win over as many as possible. To Jews, I became like a Jew, to win Jews; as they are subjects of the Law of Moses, I put myself under that law to win them, although I am not myself subject to it. To win Gentiles, who are outside the Law, I made myself like one of them, although I am not in truth outside God’s law, being under the law of Christ. To the weak I became weak, to win the weak. Indeed, I have become everything in turn to men of every sort, so that in one way or another I may save some. All this I do for the sake of the Gospel, to bear my part in proclaiming it” (1 Cor. 9:19-22).

What this means is that the Community in a Jewish area will be different than one in a Gentile area. There will be a flexibility of approach rather than rigidity of structure. No imposition of cultural means will be imposed upon others as essential to sharing in the life of Jesus. The Community of love will, like those who compose it, “become everything in turn to men of every sort,” never once forgetting that this is not the end of its purpose, but the means to the end, to save some. This must be done “for the sake of the Gospel,” and the gospel must never be sacrificed or compromised.

In a lesser degree, and in a more pragmatic sense, this means the cessation of our own struggle to impose upon various communities of saints, the means and methods which seem best adapted to our own work of faith and labor of love. For example, a community of believers which operates its teaching process without use of classes will not seek to bind this approach upon others as the divine will, even though it may regard it as more nearly like the functioning of the primitive saints.

This will be much easier to do if we cease to talk about the church as “God’s only organization!” We are wrong on two counts! God really has no “church” and what he does have is no organization, in the sense in which we mean it. If we will think of the body of Christ as God’s organism in the world, and ourselves as hands, feet, eyes and ears, we can function as the occasion requires. My physical body does not remove a flat tire, or mow the lawn, with the same motions or actions it exhibits in playing softball. I adjust myself to the immediate task at hand and have no guilt of conscience because I become everything in turn.

It is my opinion that so long as we are “hooked” on organization and “high” on institutionalism we will continue to develop sectarian rivalry, promote the party spirit, hate other brethren, and destroy those for whom Christ died. It will be a difficult task for most of us to change because of the fears and insecurity offered by our partisan walls and enclosures. After all, the traffic seems pretty dashing and dazzling to one who has spent most of his life in prison, and I can sympathize with a monk who scampers back inside the monastery door after trying to cross the street to the drug store!

But Jesus left the serenity of heaven and made himself vulnerable in a body plunged headlong into a sinful world. He is still doing that, only now I am a part, an organ, of that body, and I am vulnerable. If I seem a little daring in this answer to your question, that will explain why. I am really trying to travel with Jesus, and it is not made any easier with brethren hurling verbal brickbats at you and trying to “rock you to sleep.”

5. Do you have any real hope of brethren adopting the views you have enunciated, or do you think yours is a hopeless cause?

I am not so arrogant as to assume that I will have any great success in a field in which a giant like Alexander Campbell failed. He wrote copiously on this theme and even brought out a version of the new covenant scriptures in which the word “church” did not once appear. Many of our pioneer brethren hailed this with rejoicing, but their successors, having allowed the restoration movement to become sectarianized, were caught up in the race for pride and prestige, and they wanted the movement to become “a church.” They wanted an organization like the Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians.

Most of the brethren do not really think very deeply in our generation. There are two reasons for this. In the first place, it has been dangerous to think for almost a century. When conformity became the ideal, original thinking was automatically stifled. In our entrenched sectarianism a thinker immediately became a heretic and was subjected to brutal verbal attack and eventual boycott. Since every sect always “skims the brains off the top” and retains the masses of conformity, eventually a group becomes inbred in thinking, sterile and stolid. One does not need to think about his destination while on a treadmill and it is best not to think if you already have a perfect knowledge.

Secondly, tradition always blinds men to truth. Instead of the search to discover truth, it is assumed that what we have is truth, and the only searching that is done is to find additional arguments to be used as justification for it. Most men who have a series of sermon outlines on “The Lord’s Church” are not about to scrap them and tell the audiences from which they extract financial support to defend “the church” that all have been mistaken. Imagine the consternation which would occur in Nashville or Dallas if a prominent “Church of Christ preacher” announced that there was no “church” in God’s program at all, and that the word ought not to appear in the sacred scriptures.

But I do not think mine is a hopeless cause. I am responsible for stating what appears to me to be the truth. The response to it by others is their responsibility. I can only plant and water. It is God who must give the increase. I do not know what discouragement means because my trust is in God and not in men. If I can keep the fire kindled in my brief sojourn on earth, a worthier and better qualified person may light his torch from the flame long after I am gone and lead the saints of his day a little farther out of the sectarian wilderness and closer to the land of promise.

I certainly have no hesitancy in stating my optimism, even now. We are rearing a generation of consecrated and eager young men and women who are “fed up” with our sham and show. They are disgusted with our blatant sectarianism while trying to hide behind a non-sectarian facade. They are repulsed by the emptiness and vacuity manifested in borrowed sermon outlines and they are seriously questioning the whole organizational and structural approach into which we have channeled the glorious family of God.

The task is great because of the frightful amount of “bureaucracy” and the vested interests. Even inside the sectarian framework created by Church of Christism, each party has its exclusive journals, schools and mission programs. Some have homes, loan systems, and other things with millions of dollars invested. These spiritual handmaidens seek to share the table and the purse of the bride of Christ and huddle beneath her umbrella until she can hardly be seen in our day. Fortunately, the primitive saints had no tax shelter investments and no financial projects. Since they had nothing invested but their lives that is all they could lose.

In company with all other sects we have built up self-perpetuating interests through wills, annuities, trusts and endowments, until we cannot now stop the machinery. We equate our tax-sheltered investment programs with “stewardship to God” and the giving of millions to human organizations as “faithfulness to the Lord’s church.” And we, like all others, have our scriptural turns and twists by which we equate this with God’s ultimate design. In many places, the Christian cannot use his wealth to relieve the needs of humanity. He must funnel his “giving” through the institution, surrendering it into the hands of men who make all of the decisions, and, after taking his money, throw him out if he protests the way it is used or abused.

Perhaps there is no other organization in our modern world which practices “taxation without representation” with the same degree of flagrant disregard for the rights of individuals as the Church of Christ. Huge corporations at least mail out proxy ballots to remote investors, but among our brethren, the women, our sisters in Christ, are threatened with hell if they do not contribute of their means, and are debarred from attending business meetings in which others decide on how their money is spent. And all of this on the basis that women are to keep silent in the churches— and in “business meetings”!

So, to a lot of people it seems like sheer folly for an insignificant voice like mine to be raised against the relentless crushing power of the Juggernaut of institutionalism which would prostitute the very bride of Christ and force her to sell herself for the favors and baubles of men. But I am not at all disconcerted. I am quite convinced that if men like myself kept still out of fear that the “stones would cry out”!

God’s will is going to be done on this earth as it is in heaven! If the great institutional complex to which the minds of men have given birth will not do it, then in other ways and other times, God will providentially make it possible for His ultimate purpose to be accomplished. My task is to be true to God as I understand His will and purpose for my life. It is to resist selling out or being frightened off. I must stand, and having done all, continue to stand. What happens to me personally is really of little concern. A few years from now my name will be forgotten, as it ought to be. But if I can resist the further encroachment of the sectarian stance and give strength to someone who otherwise might weaken in the struggle I will lay down my armor at the end with joy!

I am not certain when my brethren will reverse the trend toward institutionalism and return to the ideal of the “family of God.” But, as I visualize it, we must quit trying to be “a church” for this is something that God did not purpose. We must seek to become, instead, the people of God. If we can become a family we will be brothers and sisters, and not merely “members of a church.” There is nothing warmer than the relationship of brothers and sisters, and there is nothing colder than being members of an organization. The “church” is filled with people who are lonely and forlorn. They are sad, distressed and feel forsaken. This is especially true of “churches” with a legalistic approach where the threat of damnation hovers over you every day and every little misstep brings deep inner remorse and a guilt feeling to dog your steps from that time on.

In a family circle the fortunate constituents have the same care for one another. It is real and genuine. It is not an attitude adopted only when you come to the table. Everyone wants to be with everyone else, because love is a magnetic force which draws them closer together. Many of our ills will pass away if we will just be “family” instead of “church.” And this is what I am really pleading for in our generation. I think there is real hope for us! Please allow me to quote for you a little statement by Elton Trueblood as it appears in that outstanding little volume entitled The Common Ventures of Life:

“If we wish to have a really important religion we must make a complete break with the one-hour-a-week concept. We must see our religion, not primarily as what goes on in a peculiar building with pointed arches and stained-glass windows, but as the way in which all ordinary enterprises are conducted. It must be connected with the way we eat, the way we work, the way we make love, the way we think, the way we dream, the way we die. We must become aware of the devotional paradox to the effect that frequently the books which are most conducive to the spirit of devotion were not written for that purpose and are not usually classified as religious books at all. Religion, to be effective, must be envisaged, not as one enterprise among others, but as the frame in which all enterprises are set. That religion will have most meaning which touches common life redemptively at the most points.”

[Abstract]

In this issue I want to share with you some of the queries which arose during an open forum session in which I was fielding questions from the audience one morning during a series of studies in Illinois, on the nature of God's will as exhibited in the community of the reconciled and sanctified. By some turn of events we became involved in a discussion of "the name of the church" and pursued it for almost two hours. I will give you only some of the highlights of the session and investigation.

Let me say, by way of prelude, that for some reason the subject with which we are dealing seems fraught with possibilities of misunderstanding. I know that when I first awakened to the truth of what I am now saying, I was inclined not only to resist it, but even to resent it. Long after I had given up on the matter intellectually, I clung to it emotionally. I had delivered too many discourses entitled "What Name Shall The Church Wear?" I had written too many articles and passed out too many tracts. My pride was at stake. But even more than this, fear entered in, fear that if I gave up on this I would have no way of identifying with the people of God. I suffered through the whole traumatic complex until integrity won the battle and honesty carried the day.

I eagerly trust that my readers will accept this paper each month as a sharing experience. I have neither the desire nor inclination to make it a propaganda sheet or a dogmatic journal. As you read it you will find much with which you cannot concur but this will in no way militate against my love and concern for you. It is in this spirit I replied to the questions orally and in this spirit I print some of my answers now. If you do not see it as I do you are still my brother regardless of how you feel about it.

1. I understand that you take the position that the church has no scriptural name. Is that correct?

Like so many reports of what I am alleged to believe this is partly correct and partly in error. I am going to forget my personal feelings about the word “church” itself during this interview and simply go along with the conventional usage to avoid unnecessary complication or needless confusion. Most of my brethren are mixed up enough now without me adding to the mix-up. What I have said is that the church has no official title or exclusive designation. The word church is a noun, and is therefore the name of something.

My position is that the church is always designated only by common nouns and these only indicate relationship. They describe the church but they do not give it a title. The church properly has many names but it has no proper name. It depends upon what aspect you are discussing as to the term you should employ to signify it.

From the standpoint of divine ownership it is called the church of God (1 Cor. 1:2; 10:32; 11:22; 15:9; Gal. 1:13, etc.). He purchased it. The Authentic Version renders Acts 20:28, “See to it that you tend God’s community, which he acquired with the blood of his own Son.”

As to constituency it is a church of saints (1 Cor. 14:33), being composed of the holy ones, those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus. As to heirship, or inheritance, it is the church of the firstborn ones whose names are enrolled in heaven (Heb.

12:23). As to divine relationship it is the church of God which is in Christ Jesus (1 Thess. 2:14).

From the standpoint of its head or authority, it is the church of Christ (Rom. 16:16; Gal. 1:22). As to government it is the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 16:19), the kingdom of God, the kingdom of the Son of man, or the kingdom of God's dear son. As to organization it is the body of Christ (1 Cor. 12:27), but it is also the temple of God, the garden (or husbandry) of God, and the people of God.

In their eagerness for sectarian exclusiveness, men have lifted first one and then another of these terms of relationship and have elevated it to a sectarian title. Thus we have The Church of God, The Church of the Firstborn, The Church of God in Christ, The Church of the Brethren and The Friends Church. We also have The Church of Christ, and for the very same reason. But if these others are sectarian titles because they are used to designate parties containing only a fragment or part of the saved, or of those who profess salvation, so is the term Church of Christ.

I do not say that the church has no scriptural name. I say that it has a number of them, and that all are valid and bestowed by the Spirit through revelation. But it is not scriptural to fasten upon one of these while ignoring the others and elevating it to titular dignity. To do that is to derogate the other names which were derived from the same source.

2. But did not Jesus say "Upon this rock I will build my church," and is it not his church?

Indeed he did say that and he did exactly what he said he would do, and the church is his. But this statement only shows possession. It does not provide the title or name of the church as a lot of sermon outlines mistakenly imply. If I say, "Upon this lot I will park my car," you know to whom the car belongs, but you do not know the name of the car. You cannot tell from my statement if it is a Ford, Buick, or Chevrolet.

Automobile makers designate or name their creations because they have rivals in the automobile field. But God did not give a title to his new creation because it has no rivals. It does not need to be distinguished from another ekklesia, because there is no other. “There is one body, and one Spirit, even as you are called in one hope of your calling.” The one body does not need to be distinguished from another body, because there is no other. Only sects have to have titles because there are many sects, and all are rivals.

Is it not noteworthy that the expression “the Church of Christ” does not even appear in the scriptures? How could the apostles avoid it if it was “the scriptural name”? And how can it be the scriptural name if it never appears in the scriptures? The term “church of God” appears repeatedly, and once the apostle wrote to tell the Romans “the churches of Christ salute you,” which the Authentic Version renders, “The communities of Christians send greetings.”

The term church of Christ is no more the official title than is the term body of Christ. The first signifies that the saints are called out, the second that they are bonded together. The fact is that God has bestowed no official or approved title upon the redeemed as a group. God is not sectarian and he does not want us to be.

3. How do you propose that we be distinguished from the denominations?

Certainly the most ineffective and inconsistent way is by denominating ourselves. Most people who talk so glibly about “the denominations” do not know what the word means. It is from the Latin de and nominare, and means to name, to give a name or apply a title to. My brethren do not realize that by arguing for a certain name to distinguish themselves from denominations they make themselves into a denomination.

God created no denomination which is the reason he did not denominate His people. It is to be regretted that in our sectarian age we want to develop another narrow and exclusive sect and bestow upon it a denomination. There are too many sects and denominations on earth now, without us attempting to make another one in order to be distinguished from the rest.

Jesus said all men would know we were his disciples if we love one another. Since we have failed to make too good a showing on that basis, and men sometimes think we belong to the devil by the way we treat one another, we want to cover up our shortcomings and make sure the world knows who we are by erecting signboards and draping pulpit hangings with our official motto— The Churches of Christ Salute You (Romans 16:16). That sign has often appeared on structures in which hatred, hostility, and harassment marked every business meeting. But Jesus did not say that all men would know we are Christians by our advertisements!

We have no copyright on either the title or the slogan, any more than we do on “Church of God” or any other designation or denomination. As proof of the fact that you can’t trust what you read on signboards, I know of a number of places where groups meet behind signs reading “Church of Christ” and have nothing to do with each other. They blast each other as sectarian, liberal or some other derogatory term. Having a title over the door does not make you Christ-like and if you were Christ-like perhaps you would not need a title.

Watchman Nee wrote very perceptively when he penned these words: “Throughout the Word of God we find no name attached to a church save the name of a place, e.g., the church in Jerusalem, the church in Lystra, the church in Derbe, the church in Colosse, the church in Troas, the church in Thessalonica, the church in Antioch. This fact cannot be overemphasized that in scripture no other name but the name of a locality is ever connected with a church, and division of the Church into churches is solely on the ground of difference in locality.” As I generally state it, the proper name of the church is not a proper name. It may be correct to use church of Christ as a name of the church, but it is never correct to use it as the name of a church!

4. If the church is the bride of Christ should she not wear the name of her husband?

I always cringe a little when someone asks this because I fear that my own statements of the past have been misleading. One of my favorite topics in my meetings used to be “Whose Name Shall The Bride Wear?” Once many years ago, when William Hensley and I were laboring at Red Cloud, Nebraska, I wrote a tract upon this very question. It became popular enough that 50,000 copies were distributed by brethren all over the United States.

I now realize that the reasoning I employed was childish and irrational. It was also unscriptural. I am sure it must have grown out of the sectarian attitude and exemplified the arrogance of my view that our faction was the kingdom of God on earth to the exclusion of all his other children. As I began to study the word without partisan spectacles I became amazed at the wide gulf between what God revealed and what I was trying to prove from it. I read into the Word of God a whole lot of things the apostles had not written into it. It made me ashamed of my rationalization and I wished that I could have recalled the tract I prepared with such glee.

Your question provides me an opportunity of explaining what changed my mind and opened up my thinking to new vistas and insights. It also serves to remind me how we take our own culture and read it back into the Bible to establish undeniably something the sacred writers never even dreamed of implying. No woman in the Bible ever wore her husband's name. That is true both in the old and new covenant scriptures. Women bore their own names, and the identity was established by a simple statement of the relationship.

Thus we read about Sarah, Abraham's wife (Gen. 16:1); Milcah, the wife of Nahor (Gen. 24:15); Jael, the wife of Heber (Judges 4:17); and Bath-sheba, Uriah's wife (2 Sam. 11:3). Again we read of Ananias, and Sapphira, his wife (Acts 5:1); and Felix and his wife Drusilla (Acts 24:24). No one ever reads of Mrs. Noah, Mrs. Moses, or Mrs. Simon Peter. The reason for this is clear. It is only in our western culture that wives wear the names of their husbands, and even here the custom does not go very far back into history. Thus, the argument that the bride should wear the husband's name is not based upon scripture, and while not scriptural anywhere it would not be culturally relevant anywhere except in our western framework. Our brethren overlook the fact that the body of Christ does not just embrace the saved from Europe and America, but also includes those from Asia and Africa.

Even if the argument was valid, "Church of Christ" would not be the name of the bride. In the first place, Christ is not the name of the groom. That is his office. His name is Jesus. The angel said, "You shall call his name Jesus" (Matt. 1:21). When he was born, Joseph "called his name Jesus" (Matt. 1:25). Signs and wonders were done by the father in the name of his holy child Jesus (Acts 4:30). The apostles were commanded not to speak in the name of Jesus (Acts 5:40). It is at the name of Jesus that every knee shall bow (Phil. 2:10). So, if the church is to wear the groom's name we will have to call her "Mrs. Jesus" since the word "church" is only a common noun. How would you like to go down the highway and see a sign reading "Mrs. Jesus meets here for worship!"

I get a bang out of people who write in and give me fits for using the expression Church of Christ. They say that using a capital “C” on church makes the title a denomination like Baptist Church, Church of God, or Christian Church. They want me to capitalize “Church” in all of these other titles, but use a lower case letter for “church of Christ.” The idea is that if you are a big “C” church you are a denomination, but if you are a little “c” church you are the one the Lord ordained. Of course, it is not the spelling that makes you sectarian. I once knew a Roman Catholic who did not know for a long time that there was a shift key on his typewriter, and he spelled everything in lower case letters.

But what makes me smile is that the same brethren who get on a “high horse” because I write “Church of Christ” will mail me a tract to show that the bride should wear the groom’s name. If that is so, then “Church of Christ” is a proper name and it would be silly to use a little “c.” Nobody writes about my wife and refers to her as nell ketcherside. They do not even write about mrs. carl ketcherside. You do not even refer to your dog as rover, if that is his name. When our brethren start out to conceal their denominational attitude they always end up with their inconsistency hanging out. I am sure that we need to re-think a lot of our cooked up arguments which seemed so invulnerable in debates.

I have said that Christ is not the name of Jesus, but his office. Because the term Lord Jesus Christ is used some people think that his first name is Lord and his last name is Christ. But “Lord” is his title and signifies rule or authority. Peter said, “God hath made that same Jesus, whom ye have crucified, both Lord and Christ” (Acts 2:36). We confess that Jesus Christ is Lord (Phil. 2:11). We say that Jesus is the Lord, through the Holy Spirit (Cor. 12:3).

By the same token, Christ signifies his divine office. He is anointed of God. He is prophet, priest and king. All of these are official functions. Jesus is the Christ. Peter was blessed for confessing “Thou art the Christ” (Matt. 16:16). Paul testified to the Jews that Jesus was Christ (Acts 18:5), and publicly spoke, showing by the scriptures that Jesus was the Christ (Acts 18:28). Christ is no more his name than mediator, shepherd or bishop. He is Jesus the Christ exactly as he is Jesus the mediator, or Jesus the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls.

Jesus is the Christ as John was the Baptist, Simon was the tanner, and Zenas the lawyer. And a bride is not called after the occupation, office or function of the groom. The wife of Dr. Gray is not called “Mrs. Doctor,” nor is the wife of Mr. Brown, the Janitor, called Mrs. Janitor. If my brethren want to be consistent and make their signs match their argument, they will have to paint out the present title and paint in “Church of Jesus.” They will have to leave Romans 16:16 off, but that will be all to the good. They have misapplied it for years.

I predict that the brethren will continue to be inconsistent. They have reasoned themselves into a corner and sectarianized “Church of Christ.” It is the recognized, dyed-in-the-wool title of a party with its own unwritten creed, and if someone put up a sign “Church of Jesus— Matthew 16:16” vacationers from Texas and Tennessee would whiz by it like a freight train passing a hobo. They wouldn’t even halt if the sign read “Church of Jesus Christ.” The name “Jesus” doesn’t have much impact upon “Church of Christ Christians” and it will be hard for some of them to bow the knee to it when the time comes. It is possible that some of them from a state which I will not mention may try to convince the angels that they have this thing all wrong and will prowl up and down the golden streets looking for a sign “The churches of Christ salute you” (Romans 16:16).

You may not believe it, but I have heard my brethren make an argument about Peter’s statement, when he healed the lame man at the Beautiful Gate, and said, “There is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved.” The argument is to the effect that since this is the only name connected with our salvation, that the church should be designated “Church of Christ” and they end up with the implication, and sometimes the statement, that salvation is actually in that title. If you had buttonholed Peter in Jerusalem and asked him where the Church of Christ met, he would not have known what you were talking about. But Romans 16:16 had not yet been written, of course, and folks still thought of themselves as “the Way.”

To be absolutely fair I must admit that most of our preachers always say that either “church of Christ” or “church of God” is scriptural, but you’ll notice that none of them put the latter title on their temples made with hands. Over near Dayton, Ohio, the brethren sold their building to the “Church of God.” On the side of the building facing the highway the sign read “Church of Christ.” To save money the new owners just painted out the word “Christ” and painted in the word “God.” They didn’t bother “Church Of” at all, but there hasn’t been a “loyal brother” in the place since God replaced Christ.

Of course, the argument is that we cannot use “church of God” even though it is scriptural, because it is the denomination of a modern sect. Then all that is needed is for some enterprising sectarian to start up under the denomination “church of Christ” and we will have to surrender it along with Romans 16:16, to avoid confusing the Lord’s church with a denomination. I predict, though, that we will put up a much harder fight before we’ll surrender “Church of Christ” to the sectarians. They beat us to the draw on “Church of God” and took it away from us before we really got a good hold on it.

One thing that makes me feel that our brethren will hang on to the title “Church of Christ” is because there are as many as ten different groups in some cities which have the name over their doors, and yet will not recognize one another to even call on the one God. Some of them cannot even advertise in the same display or box in the Saturday paper. They have their own little advertising corral, so that someone who objects to the way Herald of Truth is supported will not be hoodwinked into stumbling in to a “liberal” congregation and breaking bread with “apostates.” But to all outward appearances they are all “Churches of Christ” and they all salute you with Romans 16:16.

Since we cannot put up “Church of God” because the sectarians pre-empted it, and we have to put up “Church of Christ” because it is “scriptural” there is only one thing left to do and that is to tack an identifying parenthesis on, like “Church of Christ— Vocal Music” or “Church of Christ— One Container.” That way we will really be both denominational and sectarian. The title is a denomination and the attached rider is sectarian. We may get worse before we get better. When a congregation down in the hills got into a hassle over what kind of a cup to use in the Lord’s Supper, a group of them broke away because they contended that a glass is not a cup, and the record did not say that Jesus “took the glass.” That is why there is now a congregation designated as “The One Cup With A Handle On It Church of Christ.”

However, just because we let “the sectarians” appropriate “Church of God” which really is mentioned over and over in the scriptures, we will not give up “Church of Christ” which isn’t mentioned in the scriptures. It is sanctified by the United States Census Bureau and by sermon outlines passed out in “Schools of Preaching.” It is sacred to us and is our badge which will admit us to the heavenly realm when inspected by the celestial gatekeeper.

A few years ago a brother who came up from Arkansas, was driving along a highway in our state. He saw a sign for a Christian Service Camp with the notation, “Maintained by Christian Churches and Churches of Christ.” It hit our brother like a slap across the face with a sock full of wet sand. He turned off at the exit, drove down to the camp and jumped on the astonished manager with such ferocity that the poor fellow thought he was going to strike him. The Arkansan demanded that he take the sign down and quit operating under false pretence to lure faithful and unsuspecting children of God into a den of thieves where they thumped on a piano while people were trying to praise God in spite of the noise. He asserted that those who were operating the camp were trying to steal “our name” and ought to be sued in the heathen courts, since they were not brethren anyhow. He finally drove off, red-faced and muttering to himself about the ignorance of some folks. The caretaker told me, “That was the maddest one Christian I ever saw in all my born days.” It is not likely that this approach will contribute measurably to the unity of the believers, but it served one purpose. It made the caretaker cautious. When he heard a car drive up, he always peeked out through a hole in the window blind to see if it was “a faithful brother” before he went out!

Before I leave this question about the bride wearing the name of the groom, there is another little matter I do not want to overlook. Even if the argument as applied to our present discussion was correct, and it isn’t, I would be reluctant to use it. I am a little skittish about women wearing the name of the groom before they are married. That is a little like wearing a wedding ring in advance of the ceremony. And I am not sure that the wedding between Christ and his bride has taken place yet. I expect to be a guest at the wedding supper when it comes, but I am not all that certain it has come!

John describes for us the great scene which takes place when Babylon the mighty city has fallen, and the great whore is judged, and the blood of the slain servants of God is avenged. Then he says, “Again I heard what sounded like a vast crowd, like the noise of rushing water and deep roars of thunder, and they cried: ‘Alleluia! The Lord our God, sovereign over all, has entered on his reign! Exult and shout for joy and do him homage, for the wedding-day of the Lamb has come! His bride has made herself ready, and for her dress she has been given fine linen, clean and shining.”

Then John identifies the fine linen as the righteous deeds of the people of God. He continues, “Then the angel said to me, ‘Write this: Happy are those who are invited to the wedding-supper of the Lamb!’” And he added “These are the very words of God.” So the marriage has not taken place yet. That is why Paul wrote to the congregation at Corinth, “I am jealous for you, with a divine jealousy; for I betrothed you to Christ, thinking to present you as a chaste virgin to her true and only husband” (2 Cor. 11:2). If we are going to make an argument based upon western cultural habits and practices, we ought to be consistent with the mores which form the basis for our contention, and not have the bride wearing the name of one to whom she is not yet married.

Actually, all of this whole thing stems from our desire to be sectarian while making a non-sectarian claim. We choose a “church name” to distinguish ourselves from other religious bodies and sects, and when we do so we give up our contention that there is only one body. The world will always regard us as another sect even though we contend that because we have designated our segment with a special name that we cannot be sectarian.

There is only one church on earth. The church is a divine organism and not a human organization. It is a creation of the Holy Spirit and not a concoction of the factional spirit. That one church contains all of the saved persons on this earth. The church of Christ in Saint Louis consists of every person in the city in whom the Spirit of God dwells. It is not a group of rival parties fighting over instrumental music and orphan homes. It is the whole body of the ransomed and the redeemed.

5. What do you do about the statement of Paul in Ephesians 3:14, 15?

The first thing I do is to point out the danger of trying to build a doctrinal case based upon the peculiarity of but one version, in this case the King James version. It reads: “For this cause I bow my knees unto the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named.”

Those who are anxious to prove that the scripturally accepted title is “Church of Christ” fasten on to this passage like a drowning sailor grasping at a floating straw. And a careful examination proves what a frail straw it is. In the first place, the phrase “of our Lord Jesus Christ” does not appear in the best manuscripts at all, and is omitted in the Revised Versions. In the second place, the word for “family” is plural in the original. That this cannot refer to the church is obvious because there is only one church, the body of Christ. Here are some of the other versions.

“For this reason I bow my knees before the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth is named” (Revised Standard Version).

“With this in mind, then, I kneel before the Father, from whom every family in heaven and on earth takes its name” (New English Bible).

“To this end I bend my knees to the Father, from whom every being both in heaven and earth takes its existence” (Authentic Version).

B. W. Johnson in Peoples New Testament With Notes, after pointing out that the Revised Version translates “every family” makes this explanation. “The idea is that the Father is the Father of all the families of his children, whether Jews or Gentiles on earth, or in heaven. He is “Our Father in heaven” to the believers of every race, in this world or the world to come. All, as far as creation is concerned, derive their being from him, like children from a parent, and all the good are his spiritual children.”

I think there is a clue to what the apostle had in mind in the context of the epistle. He strikes the keynote when he writes that the will and pleasure of God determined beforehand in Christ was “that the universe, all in heaven and on earth, might be brought into a unity in Christ” (1:9, 10). So far as the earth was concerned its inhabitants were divided into Jews and Gentiles, those afar off and those near, those in covenant relationship and those outside.

Jesus Christ is our peace. He began the great work of universal unification by making Jews and Gentiles one. In his own body of flesh and blood he broke down the wall of enmity between them. He came and proclaimed the good news, peace to those afar off, and peace to those who were near by. Through the Gospel the Gentiles are joint-heirs with the Jews, part of the same body, sharers together in the promise made in Christ Jesus.

But all of this is because of a prior relationship involved in creation. Before God drew us together in a new creation he made us all in the original creation. He did not love us because Christ came, but Christ came because he loved us. Fatherhood stems from our bearing the imprint of the image of God, warped and defiled though it may be by sin. All family relationships begin with God. The reason that God wants to bring all in heaven and on earth into a unity in Christ is because “every family in heaven and on earth” takes its name after him. One of the more outstanding explanations of the terminology, I think, is that given by D. D. Whedon in his Commentary on Ephesians.

The word here rendered “family,” patria, is derived from the Greek and Latin pater, which with our word father, are but two different forms of the same word. A patria is a great kin, clan, or race, descended genetically from one primitive progenitor. So the three great patriae, or races of the earth, traced their lineage to Shem, Ham, and Japheth as their progenitors. Of every patria the father-founder is called patriarch. Paul's thought then is, that God is the universal Patriarch. Translating patria by the English word patriarchy, we may render this clause, "Of whom all (or every) patriarchy in heaven and on earth is named." The words then include angels above and men below. Angels are not, indeed, born; yet, as originated from God they are called "the sons of God." The patriae in heaven are the angelic ranks and orders.

The apostle was not talking about the "name of the church" in this passage. It never entered his mind to give us a handle for the community of saints. His affirmation is simply that God is the source of origin of all fatherhood. The very concept of fraternity derives from him, and that is true whether we consider a family in heaven or on earth, the tribes of men or the orders of angels, the family of Jews or that of Gentiles. All originated with him, and all take their identity or name from him.

Surely brethren are hard put to find an official title for the called-out community if they must take a scripture like this and warp it around. If there is a clear-cut name or title for the body of the redeemed why not just go to it and read it? A case is proven to be weak in proportion to the amount of twisting necessary to make it appear scriptural, and the employment of an argument such as this makes it weak indeed.

6. Are you familiar with the argument used to get the name "Church of Christ" into Acts 20:28?

I am not only familiar with it, but I am ashamed of the fact that, in my ignorance I used to employ it. Of course I was as wrong then as my brethren are now who engage in the same fallacy. In those days I wanted to prove that we alone constituted the church for which Jesus died because we had the right name, and the right name was "Church of Christ." It took a little tampering with the word to work it out but we had all of the answers for objectors.

The passage which you ask about refers to “the church of God, which he hath purchased with his own blood,” as the King James Version renders it. It was fairly easy to get “Church of Christ” in if the people to whom you were speaking did not know any more than yourself. The argument ran like this. There is God the Father, God the Son and God the Holy Spirit. If we can find which one shed his blood we can find which one purchased the church and now owns it. Property is always registered in the name of the owner. Certainly it was the Son who purchased it with his own blood, and the Son was Christ. Therefore, when Paul referred to the church of God he was really talking about the Church of Christ.

When I used this argument I was really talking about the Church of Christ which I represented— the loyal church— and not the two dozen others which were all composed of sectarians, liberals, compromisers, hobbyists or apostates. Jesus did not purchase them. They were counterfeits patterning after us as nearly as possible to hoodwink and deceive the unwary and unsuspecting. They may have thought they were what Jesus planted and wanted, but all of them had the wool pulled over their eyes through reading the wrong religious paper. Their grave mistakes came from not listening to the faithful brethren, that is to us!

Naturally when one gets his eyes open to his own littleness and bigotry he should be ashamed and repent and do better. That describes me. I am ashamed of my lack of knowledge and my insufferable attacks upon others who were as good as myself. So I have repented and I am trying to undo the mistakes. And one thing that helped me crawl out of the traditional thicket and get back on the road once more, was the realization that a correct rendering knocked my argument on Acts 20:28 into the proverbial cocked hat!

The Concordant Literal New Testament reads: “Take heed to yourselves and the entire flocklet, among which the holy spirit appointed you supervisors, to be shepherding the ecclesia of God, which he procures through the blood of his Own.”

The Authentic New Testament has it: “See to it that you tend God’s community which he has acquired through the blood of his own (Son).”

The Modern Speech New Testament (Weymouth); The New Testament in Plain English (Williams); The Revised Standard Version; and The New English Bible all have in a footnote “The blood of His Own.”

J. H. Moulton in A Grammar of New Testament Greek, Volume I (Prolegomena) says about ho idios without a noun expressed, that the singular is used in the papyri as a term of endearment to near relations, and adds, “In The Expositor (VI, 3, 277) I ventured to cite this as a possible encouragement to those (including B. Weiss) who would translate Acts 20:28, ‘the blood of one who was his own.’”

Scholarship was against my sermon outline and I had to make a choice. It would have been easy to have retained the sermon outline since many of those who cheered the loudest when I spoke were not scholars. Come to think of it, I do not remember a single scholar who was overjoyed with my speaking. But integrity won, thank God, and I threw all of my outlines on the name of the church into the trash can. I shall never forget the day when I saw clearly for the first time that church of Christ could be a name for the church, but if it ever became the name of a church, we were as sectarian as we could be. From that day on I ceased to contend for “a name” as the name, and I worked out this simple little formula to express my conviction:

1. It is scriptural to designate the community of saints by any term employed by the Holy Spirit in the sacred writings.

2. It is unscriptural to designate the community of saints by any term not employed by the Holy Spirit in the sacred writings.

3. It is anti-scriptural to seize upon one term and make it the official designation of a community of saints, to the exclusion of all other terms used by the Holy Spirit in the sacred scriptures.

7. Are you saying that our usage of the name Church of Christ in our advertising is sectarian?

Let me commend you for your perceptiveness. That is exactly what I am saying. But do not misunderstand me. I am saying that the way we use it is sectarian. I do not say that all who meet behind a signboard bearing this title are sectarian. I doubt that all who meet behind a signboard bearing the title of Oak Hill Presbyterian Church or Saint Ferdinand Catholic Church are sectarian in the fair sense of the word. To be sectarian is to be possessed of the party spirit, the spirit of exclusiveness. It is to attribute to the group with which you affiliate all of the blessings of divine grace while assuming that no others share in it. One who is not sectarian is content to belong to God; one who is sectarian believes that God belongs to him.

When you find one obsessed with a sect among the brethren you will find a sectarian, but when you find one endeared to brethren among the sects you will find a non-sectarian. To the first the party spirit is above the Holy Spirit; and the party means more than brethren. To the second brethren are first. Sectarianism always results from a confusion of values. It is not necessary to deny Christ to be a sectarian, it is only necessary to disown brethren. One need not advocate a doctrinal error to be sectarian. He may form a party around a truth lifted out of context and elevated to a superior position. The word for sect in the scriptures is hairesis, which has come into our Anglo-Saxon language as “heresy.”

I want to quote what William Barclay has to say about the word, but I must mention to you that Barclay is a Presbyterian. As such, he is much less sectarian than brethren with whom I break bread every Lord’s Day. I get a kick out of the fact that a lot of brethren who would not call upon Barclay to stand up and explain a passage if he were present in our gathering, will reel off whole paragraphs of what he wrote. Sectarians present a lot less problems to us if they are safely ensconced in Scotland. It would be a sin to ask one to tell us orally what he thinks, but we can steal what he has written, sometimes without even giving him credit for it. But here is his statement:

In Corinth, instead of sitting down as one, sharing united fellowship, the members of the group were divided into cliques and sections, haireseis (the plural form of the word), and, instead of sharing all they had in a common stock, each little group within the group kept to itself what it had brought, and the result was that some had far too little and some had far too much. What should have been one harmonious, sharing, loving unity was broken up into little self-contained, selfish, exclusive fragments. This is what Paul calls hairesis. It is the breaking up of the unity of the Church into cliques who shut their circle to all but their own number.

A fragmented Church is not a Church at all; a group whose circle is closed is certainly not a Christian group. If anyone regards his social status as something which shuts him off from others in a different social status, then he has not begun to see even the first meaning of Christianity. There is all the difference in the world between believing that we are right and believing that everyone else is wrong. Unshakable conviction is a Christian virtue; unyielding intolerance is a sin.

It is my intention to acknowledge every person as my brother in Christ who has responded to the good news about Jesus in God's own way. I want to be like Paul with reference to Corinth. I shall refuse to be identified with a Pauline, Cephasite, Apollosite, or Christ party. Instead, I will see my brethren in all of these and I will recognize them as brethren. I will also treat them as such, and that is something else. I think that in most places I know the "Church of Christ" is really a Christ party like the one which was in Corinth. But I am through with all partisan and factional alliances.

I think Watchman Nee said it very well indeed in his book The Normal Christian Church Life, page 59: "Our receiving anyone is merely our recognition that God has already received him. If he is the Lord's he is in the church. If he is not the Lord's he is not in the church. If we demand anything beyond the reception of the Lord before admitting him to fellowship, then we are not a church at all but only a sect."

While we are on this matter, let me pass along to you another observation by the same author in the same book, page 69. "God has placed believers of different races in one locality so that by transcending all external differences they might in one church show forth the one life and the one Spirit of His Son. All that comes to us by nature is overcome by grace. All that was ours in Adam has been ruled out in Christ."

This does not mean that I am going to leave the brethren whom I have always known and loved. Indeed they are all very dear to me. If I wanted to be sectarian I could well be so in the Church of Christ. But if I could not be free from sectarianism there, it is not likely that I could be anywhere else. Sectarianism is a matter of attitude and spirit. It is not necessarily a matter of where you attend or with whom you meet. All of us are human and all of us have our hangups and problems. This is as true of preachers as of anyone else. Really there is not that much difference because all of us are preachers, or should be!

The proper solution is to name the place where we meet and not give a title to those who meet there. The early saints were always designated by where they met and not by a particular title or denomination. I am sometimes asked how members of “The Church of Christ” who are traveling will find us. There are some of them that I do not want to find us. We have problems enough of our own without having more of them imported from Texas or somewhere else. I know congregations that were doing a great work until some of their brethren found them, and splintered them to smithereens.

I am content that the Lord has found me and I want to share him with everyone else I meet. I do not think that all whom he has found are in our corral and if I get to feeling that way he may have to find me over again. I am a little leery of those who think they have arrived and everyone else has departed!

Baptism and Brethren

Mission Messenger (May 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

In this issue I want to share with you a portion of a taped interview held with several young preaching brethren who asked me to meet with them so they could personally explore my position. I will not have space to provide the entire proceedings which lasted several hours, but will try to give you a fairly comprehensive idea of what transpired.

1. Brother Ketcherside, you claim to be working for the unity of all of the brethren, but I would like to know who you regard as your brethren.

Certainly that is an important question, and it is as important to me as it is to you. I do not just claim to be working for such unity as you suggest, but I am working for it. I am traveling, speaking, writing, and otherwise seeking to promote the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. I regard every child of God as my brother or sister, since I am a child of the Father. Wherever God has a son I have a brother.

My recognition and acceptance of a person as a brother is based upon God's acceptance of him as a child. I want to receive and share with all whom God receives, and it is my conviction that God receives men on the basis of their response to the gospel, the good news about the person of His Son. The gospel is the message of God to enlist soldiers, or to enroll students, under the leadership of the Son, to whom all authority has been transferred.

The response to the good news is clearly stated. He who believes the news announced and who is immersed upon the basis of that faith, is freed from the guilt and penalty of his past transgressions. He ceases to be an alien and becomes a citizen of the commonwealth, spoken of in the scriptures as the rule of heaven. I regard every sincere believer in the fact of the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus, who is immersed because of that faith, as God's child and my brother. I shall receive every such person as a brother, but what is even more important in our modern sectarian world, I will treat him as a brother.

FALSE REPORTS

2. You are aware, are you not, that a number of brethren are saying that you claim to be in fellowship with anyone who is a believer in Christ, regardless of whether such a person has been baptized or not?

I am probably more aware of it than you are, but it does not bother me, except as I feel compassion for those who prefer to engage in falsehood rather than reporting the truth. But I am older than yourselves and I have long since learned that a lot of preaching brethren are not too trustworthy in repeating the views of another, and especially if they tend to differ with him and would like to see him wiped out. I am glad that I will be judged by the Lord instead of by preachers, for if they get control of the judgment we are all sunk.

I am also happy that, in order to find anything against my position, my brethren have to lie to do it. I have really learned to rejoice and be exceeding glad when brethren say all manner of evil against me falsely for his sake. It wasn't easy to come to that but it has been a valuable kind of discipline. I take a lot of comfort from Miguel de Cervantes, who wrote in Don Quixote, that, “Truth may be stretched, but cannot be broken, and always gets above falsehood, as oil does above water.”

You will note that not one of those to whom you refer has ever produced one quotation from my pen to validate his accusation. Most of them have never read what I have said about anything. Upon the basis of rumor, innuendo, and sheer gossip, they judge and sentence me in absentia, and I feel sorry for them and for all who have to resort to such unscrupulous tactics to demonstrate their own party loyalty. But God will straighten all of this out, and I am content to await his action.

My position now is, and always has been, that obedience to the gospel, that is, acquiescence in the truth and credibility of the seven great historical facts related to Jesus of Nazareth, and immersion in water as a recognition of his lordship over life, introduces one into that fellowship to which we are called by the wonderful grace of God. My position is identical with that of Alexander Campbell, that the belief of one fact, and the obedience of one act as a confirmation of that belief, is all that is required for entrance into the glorious family of the Father of spirits.

BROTHERS IN PROSPECT

3. What about this “brothers in prospect” view that you are alleged to hold? Can you tell us what you mean by that expression?

Certainly I can tell you and will be delighted to do so. I regard baptism as the culmination and not the beginning of the birth process. One is never born in order to have life in either the physical or spiritual realm, but because he is alive. Life results from begettal or conception, not from delivery. Birth simply changes the state of one who is alive, bringing him into a new relationship where he can enjoy the blessings and fulfill the responsibilities for which life is intended.

Before one is delivered into the new spiritual state he is begotten of the Spirit through the Word, which is the seed or sperm. He must pass through an embryonic stage in the spirit leading him to delivery. One is begotten of the gospel according to the apostle Peter, and his begetting takes place, not at the point of delivery, but at the point of faith. In the physical realm one is begotten when the seed from the body of the father unites with a receptive ovum in the body of the mother. In the spiritual family one is begotten of the incorruptible seed when the good news planted by the Spirit unites with a warm and receptive heart by faith.

John said that “whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Messiah is begotten of God, and everyone who loves the one who begets, loves those who are begotten by him” (1 John 5:1). The very moment that one ceases to trust in his own righteousness, which is by deeds of law, and comes to trust in the righteousness of God through faith in Christ Jesus, he is begotten. Faith does not become alive when one is delivered into the family, else he is born of a dead faith. One does not repent or reform his life in order to be begotten, but because he has been begotten. Repentance is a manifestation of faith, a living and vital faith, not a dead one.

Faith is the initial response of the good and honest heart to the gospel, and represents a change of will. It is an indication of the germination of the seed. The engrafted word begins to grow and to transform at the point of faith. One comes under the grace of God when he acknowledges grace as the only hope of his salvation, and it is grace which leads to a change of mind coupled with a change of life, just as it is grace which leads to a change of state by acknowledgment of the lordship of Jesus in obedience to the command to be immersed.

One is not baptized to share in the grace of God, but because he shares in the grace of God he is baptized. Grace operates on the heart of the alien sinner through the word of the gospel, and when the alien acknowledges the power of that grace and believes in him who was grace personified, he is begotten of the heavenly Father. Baptism does not change the life of any person. There is nothing in the act of baptism to transform a life. Lives are changed by repentance, which is nothing more nor less than reformation, caused by a change of mind. It is repentance which alters the set of the sails and trims them to head for a different harbor. Baptism changes our state, but faith operates before baptism to change life.

So the penitent believer, begotten by the Spirit, is God's child in prospect and he is my brother in prospect. Every sincere conscientious believer in the Sonship of Jesus upon the earth, is in that category. I love all of them because I love the Father who begot them. Baptism does not bring them unto the faith, but it is the faith which brings them unto baptism.

Our relationship to God is covenantal, not legal. Ignorance of this fact has betrayed us into a sectarian spirit which will destroy us if not altered. From the moment one makes an agreement to belong to Jesus Christ, body, soul and spirit, he is prospectively in Christ. No earthly example can compare with this or adequately illustrate it. But in the purchase of insurance one is a prospect when he makes a verbal commitment. One becomes a prospective husband from the time when he is betrothed to his beloved. Joseph was told to take Mary, his wife, when they were only engaged. An alien is a prospective citizen, not from the day he takes the oath, but from the moment he files the original papers of intent.

I am astounded at the wounded "howl" raised by some of the guardians of orthodoxy and the keepers of the gate over the position that I occupy. When Paul was in Corinth, the center of lasciviousness, the Lord spoke to him at night in a vision and told him not to be afraid. He said, "For I am with thee, and no man shall set on thee to hurt thee: for I have much people in this city" (Acts 18:10). McGarvey says, "He called them his merely because he foresaw that under Paul's preaching they would yet believe." Evidently, then, they were children of God in prospect. They were also brothers and sisters of Paul in prospect.

Regardless of the time elapsed from the moment one believes until the time he is immersed, the intervening period is one of spiritual gestation, during which the Spirit operates upon the heart and strives with one through the power of the word of faith, the gospel of our salvation. But begettal is one thing and delivery is another, and begettal does not usually take place in the delivery room.

VALID DISTINCTIONS

4. Does the word of God make the distinction you make, or does it not use the same term for the whole birth process that you use for begetting?

Pardon me for saying so, but to me nothing indicates the paucity and superficiality of scholarship in our day as does this kind of reasoning. If one must resort to this type of rationalization in order to sustain his position on baptism then that position hangs by a thin cobweb strand. The fact is, regardless of the rendering of the King James Version, one cannot be born of God at all. The idea that he can is not even in the original Greek scriptures.

In 1 John 2:29, the King James Version reads, "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that everyone that doeth righteousness is born of him." Dr. James McKnight renders the passage, "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that everyone who worketh righteousness hath been begotten of him." In explanation he says, "This is the literal significance of gegennetai from gennao, I beget. Accordingly our translators have so rendered the word, chapter 5:18. Besides, born of God is nowhere else found in scripture."

Consistent with this statement and proper Greek usage, he translates 1 John 5:1, “Everyone who believeth that Jesus is the Christ, hath been begotten of God; and every one who loveth the begetter, loveth also the begotten of him.” One is begotten by his father but not born of him and the begetting precedes the birth or else he is born dead. Birth does not confer life. It simply changes the state of one who is living.

The whole problem of exegesis stems from the fact that we have separate English words for begetting, conceiving and bearing, or delivering. The Greeks had only one word, gennao. But they did not use it indiscriminately nor did they confound or eliminate the distinctions as do a lot of casual readers and interpreters in our day. I am frequently treated to cavilling upon this term by those who have never taken the time to even study it, and who expose their ignorance in an attempt to set aside what I offer. Even faculty members in our schools reveal their ignorance of the implications of the usage when fighting for party principles.

The Holy Spirit used gennao 97 times and it is translated begat or begotten 49 times, and born 39 times. In the first sixteen verses of Matthew it is found 39 times and is translated begat in every instance. To substitute the word born in either of these would make the rendering absurd and ridiculous.

The first place in the new covenant scriptures where the word is rendered born is Matthew 1:16, and the change is obviously necessary and required to make sense. In this verse gennao appears twice. Once it is rendered begat and once it is rendered born, and neither can be substituted for the other. “And Jacob begat Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ.”

It would be incongruous to read this, “And Jacob born Joseph, the husband of Mary, of whom was begat Jesus who is called Christ.” One is not born of the person who begets him, nor is he begotten of the one who bears him. We should not make ourselves silly nor confuse language in our zeal to oppose someone who introduces a new thought which cuts across a traditional position.

Since you have asked the same question which we hear so often, especially where brethren labor ardently for a foothold from which to refute my position, perhaps I should take time to repeat a few things which I have offered in the past, but which many have not taken the time to examine for one reason or another. Jesus was born in Bethlehem of Judea (Matthew 2:1) but he was begotten in Nazareth a city of Galilee (Luke 1:26). It is possible for one to be begotten of the Spirit in Viet Nam and born into the family of God in Virginia.

The circumstances surrounding the birth of John, the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth, illustrate what I am talking about. Elisabeth conceived (Luke 1:24), six months later the babe leaped in her womb (Luke 1:41), and when Elisabeth's full time came she brought forth a son (1:57). The words "brought forth" are a rendering of gennao and it is evident that "begat" would no more apply than it would in Matthew 19:12, "For there are some eunuchs which were so born from their mother's womb." There is a difference in the time as well as in the act of begetting and birth, and the former always precedes the latter. One who is begotten and not yet delivered is a prospective child of the one who begets him and a prospective brother of all others sired by the same father. Every person on this earth begotten by the Holy Spirit is my brother in prospect!

A careful study of the implications of gennao in every occurrence of the term will enable us to enunciate proper rules of interpretation. These will be three in number.

a. When the word refers to the action of the Father, or to the inception of life, it cannot be rendered born and must be uniformly rendered by begotten.

b. When the word refers to the induction into a state, condition or relationship, or when it has to do with bringing forth into a visible existence, it cannot be rendered begat or begotten, and must be uniformly translated born, delivered, or brought forth.

c. When the entire process, including both the phases of begetting and birth, is described by one word, the final or consummating act may be put for the whole, as in John 3:5.

The means employed in our salvation are defined in Titus 3:5, “He saved us, not because of deeds done by us in righteousness, but in virtue of his own mercy, by the washing of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit.” I take it that the washing referred to here is baptism, but this does not change the nature of the gospel subject. This is effected by the renewal of the Holy Spirit. When the Holy Spirit operates upon and quickens the heart of the alien through the good news and leads him to reformation by testimony of the goodness of God through the Word, he is begotten of God.

There is nothing in being immersed which will quicken the heart, any more than delivery of a child quickens it. The quickening took place in the act of begetting or conception. We are quickened by the Spirit, but for one so quickened to change his state he must be led to the washing of regeneration which completes the birth process and makes him a child of God. I think your question confuses the King James Version with “the word of God” of which it is a translation.

ABOUT ONE WHO DIES

5. Suppose that one who has sincerely believed dies before he is baptized, what will happen to him?

Of course the answer to that is that we do not know. When God has not revealed unto us what his judgment will be we ought not to usurp the divine prerogative and take care of the judgment in advance in order to save him the trouble. There can be abortions or miscarriages in the spiritual as well as the physical realm, and we should be careful that they do not result from our action or attitude.

One thing we need to avoid is categorizing and stereotyping everyone. No two persons on earth are alike and no two have the same responsibility. God deals with all of us as individuals and we are not to be saved or damned in groups. I am under orders from the King whom I serve, to proclaim the Good News that he has been made unto us wisdom, sanctification and redemption. I am also under orders to tell those who enquire what to do to reform their lives and be immersed unto the forgiveness of their sins. When I have done that, I have done all that I can do.

I cannot force men to be baptized or to enter the new relationship to which baptism inducts us. Rome attempted this with the Jews in Madrid and Seville as well as other Spanish cities once, and brought them to the christening font at the point of the sword. But the gory “Mother on the Tiber” succeeded only in bringing their bodies in. Their hearts were far away and their thoughts were of reactionary revenge and hostility.

I have neither the right nor the inclination to promise salvation to any person for I am not in a position to fulfill such a promise. I am personally in need of salvation which I can only attain through his marvelous grace. So I shall simply enunciate the terms of the human response to the divine offer as I understand it and leave the results with God who is love.

But I would be less than fair if I did not comment a bit further. Receiving people into the fellowship of the one body on earth and receiving them into ultimate glory are two different things. Baptism is not a door to heaven. If it was there would be no one in heaven who had not been baptized. This would debar infants, retarded persons, and those who were unfortunate enough to be born into an environment where there was no opportunity to know that Jesus lived among men and died for their sins.

It is one thing for me to say that we will accept into the fellowship of the local congregation only those who have been immersed, but it is a wholly different thing to say that God cannot receive into heaven one who has not been. Grace existed before the church and is greater than the church. The church is the recipient of grace and not the dispenser of it. Grace does not come by the church, but the church came by grace.

If God, in his sovereign power and wisdom, decides to receive unto himself some humble soul who believed implicitly that Jesus was the Messiah and the divine Son I will not attempt to thwart him on the ground that this is unfair to the rest of us who have been immersed, and makes some of our sermon outlines appear silly. I suspect that God loves people more than he loves a lot of our sermon outlines, and if this is true, I am becoming more like God every day that I live. The grace of God can do some wonderful things as it has already demonstrated and it is not subject either to the decrees or interpretations of men. Praise God for that!

God is obligated to save all whom he has promised to save, but he may save more than he has promised, and to do so will neither violate nor vitiate his promise. If I offer my grandson three dollars for mowing the lawn and I give him five dollars when he has finished, I did not contradict or contravene my promise.

We operate under the authority of Jesus but it is specifically said that God is not under that authority (1 Cor. 15:27). We dare not bind God with the rules which he gave to bind us. We cannot subject to authority one who is the source of, and superior to all authority (Romans 13:1). To say that one who, for some reason, has not been able to render perfect obedience, must be damned in order to uphold the integrity of God, is to judge God rather than the person.

I am under specific instruction not to judge those who are without, and am informed that God will judge them. The apostle wrote, “For what have I to do with judging outsiders? . . . God judges those who are on the outside” (1 Cor. 5:12). Since judging has to do with rendering a decision or passing sentence I would usurp the prerogatives of God if I were to pronounce a sentence upon others. It is one thing to instruct men what to do to enter the fellowship of the saints, a wholly different thing to decide the eternal destiny of those who do not enter. It is one thing to be assured of my own salvation but a wholly different matter to be just as sure of the damnation of all others. When I am as eager that others be damned as I am that I be saved there is something wrong with my thinking!

Let me say once more that the source of all authority cannot be captured and bound by any authoritative statement which was issued as a guideline for human behavior. The fountain of authority cannot be measured with our little cups any more than you can measure the waters of the ocean with a gourd dipper. If it be argued by shallow thinkers that this kind of reasoning will weaken our zeal to take the Good news to others then I reply that this demonstrates a lack of personal faith in what God has laid upon me as a responsibility. I should labor as intensely to do His will if I accept the wideness of His mercy and the breadth of His grace as if I thought he was both merciless and graceless.

6. But are you not saying that God may possibly overlook rebellion against his will?

Certainly not! We have not been talking about rebels. Your problem is that you cannot distinguish between rebellion and honestly mistaken views or an uninformed attitude. If you were sent out to quell a rebellion and shoot rebels, you would blast everyone who could not tell you how to get to town, or who was ignorant of the price of shells. I wonder a little about the citizenship qualifications of one who thinks that everyone who disagrees with him about the Bill of Rights or who cannot quote the Constitution is a rebel.

Certainly not every alien in the United States is a rebel. Some of them even act a little better than some citizens. And not every person who has not been baptized is a rebel against Christ. We are talking about sincere believers who have not seen clearly the relationship between baptism and God's forgiveness of their sins. They love Jesus and respect his present rule and Lordship, but because of some mental block or hangup they have not been led to be immersed. It could be that after seeing the lives and dispositions of some who have been immersed, they have concluded it is not very effective. But there is a great deal of difference in saying, "We will not have this man to reign over us," and in saying, "I am sorry, but I do not yet see the necessity of immersion in water as a validation of my faith in Jesus."

I dare not judge such a person. I cannot assume that he does know and understand the significance of baptism and is deliberately lying about it. I propose to love him, and patiently share my views with him, and leave the outcome with God. I can only plant and water. It is God who gives the increase. If a believer dies without being immersed he is in the hands of God exactly as I will be when I die. It is not necessary that I determine the fate of every person on earth or make a pronouncement of their eternal destiny. Regardless of what I say or think God will take care of the situation without consulting me as to the best means of handling it. He will not be influenced by my own pre-judgment in the matter.

We are not justified by baptism but by faith. I believe that justifying faith will lead one to be immersed when his knowledge of baptism is sufficient to show him its essentiality. I cannot conceive of it doing otherwise. But the faith which justifies is the faith which possesses the quality which induces one to automatically accept every truth of God as he apprehends it or becomes aware of it. If one possesses this faith and dies before his obedience is perfected God can justify him because of his faith. All of us will die before our obedience is perfected, and all must be justified by faith and not by perfect obedience if justified at all. Any person who postulates that justification by faith is on the ground of perfect human obedience or compliance with law is knotting a noose for his own neck. It is with the judgment we mete out that we shall be judged. Since we are writing our own ticket we need to be a little merciful.

Abraham was chosen by the inspired apostle as an example of God's basis of justification. He was the first person of whom it was said that he believed God (Genesis 15:6). And God counted his faith for justification. He was the father of the faithful. From the time that Abraham became fully persuaded that what God had promised he was able to perform, and from the time that he trusted in God without question, he was under the grace of God. God knew that this kind of faith would lead Abraham to perform anything that was required of him when it was made known to him, and he counted such faith for justification.

It will come as no surprise to me if God does the same thing in the case of honest men and women who are earnestly disposed to do everything they learn to be God's will. This is my own real hope. It is not based upon my perfect knowledge or perfect obedience, for I am persuaded that I will be imperfect in both of these departments when I die. I must be justified by my faith if I am justified at all. And I have resolved to trust in God with all of my heart and to constantly search his will so that I may grow both in grace and knowledge of the truth.

It will be no violation of God's principle of judgment if he takes the intent for the deed when the performance of the deed is not possible for some reason. He certainly does this in the case of sin. “Whoso looks on a woman to lust after her has committed adultery with her already in his heart.” If a man’s desire and intention are used as a basis of judgment for guilt why will God not use the same criterion for righteousness?

This in no sense argues that God will save any person who has not been immersed. It does not argue that he ought to do so. I am not in a position to determine the sense of “oughtness” for the divine. I do not know whether God will save any person who is accountable and has not been immersed. My only contention is that, if he chooses to do so, it will not be a violation of his declared will and purpose, nor will it be contrary to the tenor of the sacred scriptures for him to do so. Certainly the ideal is for everyone to be immersed upon the basis of faith and thus have the assurance which accrues from compliance with the stated requirements.

I believe that there are rebels with relation to the divine sovereignty. There are those who wilfully and maliciously oppose the purpose of God in their lives. Regardless of the amount of testimony brought to bear upon their hearts they will summarily reject it and go their own way. Their motto is “Not thy will but mine be done”! But it is a grave error to place in such a category every honest and humble person who just does not understand or grasp the will of God while possessed of an eagerness to know and implement it. There is a great deal of difference between the armed robbers who assault a bank and the humble custodian who ignorantly admits them under the mistaken impression that they are customers.

7. If God does as you say, and takes the intent for the deed, why will not the man who is sprinkled be saved on his sprinkling?

I am sure that question simply had to be injected, because all of you, like myself have been reared in a “Church of Christ” background, and it is a typical “Church of Christ” question. I trust that you’ll forgive my terminology. I do not mean to be offensive, but I think that we must recognize that our traditional approach to God's grace is upon the basis of legalistic compliance or conformity, and legalism, unlike grace, can never allow for God's mercy. In our view, grace is mediated unto us through compliance with the law, and mercy is earned and deserved only by perfect obedience. What we can never seem to understand is that this really negates both grace and mercy and rules them out while binding God's hands. The fact is that neither grace nor mercy can even exist within the system which we have constructed. For God to be merciful by our code would make him unjust, and for God to be just he must be unmerciful.

Although we will never admit it, our "theology" means that God in giving us "the new law" has forged a set of handcuffs with which we can bind him in all of his future actions. In attempting to set us free He became entangled. We really believe, if we analyze our own position, that if God shows mercy based upon any contingency, he compromises his own revelation and violates his own law. We cannot think of God being a "liberal" or a "lawbreaker" and in our finite reasoning we cannot realize that he is above all law, and what he does in any given situation is the divine will for that situation, and is therefore consistent with every announced divine principle, and it is not subject to human review or criticism.

Without realizing it we have assumed the same position of the Jews. God specifically established the right of primogeniture, the primacy of the firstborn. "And yet, in order that God's selective purpose might stand, based not upon men's deeds, but upon the call of God, she (Rebekah) was told, even before they were born, when they had as yet done nothing, good or ill, 'The elder shall be servant to the younger'; and that accords with the text of scripture, 'Jacob have I loved and Esau have I hated'" (Romans 9:11-13).

This appeared to be a clear-cut violation of an established principle upon which God had always operated. So Paul asks the pertinent question, "What shall we say to this? Is God to be charged with injustice?" Then he answers, "By no means. For he says to Moses, "Where I show mercy, I will show mercy, and where I pity, I will pity." Thus it does not depend on man's will or effort, but on God's mercy" (Romans 9:14-18).

It is assumed by some of us that when God states a law or principle of action this immediately precludes any manifestation or demonstration of mercy or pity except upon perfect compliance with those terms. But that is not mercy at all. Mercy is not required where there is perfect obedience. All that is required then is acknowledgment of the perfection. Mercy is accorded only to those who fail because of extenuating circumstances. We think that no human failure will ever reach heaven, when the truth is, that no one else will be there.

If man can be saved by perfect compliance with law, the death of Christ was wholly unnecessary. But if the death of Jesus was a demonstration of God's grace the cross is a plain and stark testimony that man cannot be saved by perfect conformity with law. This means that all of us must rely upon God's mercy and pity. It does not mean that this makes void the revelation of God, for that revelation is God's will. It is a sharing of the mind of God so that I can know the way my Father would have me walk in order to be pleasing unto him.

We must never forget that we are under the revealed will of God as announced by his ambassadors in a historical perspective, that is a space-time situation. We dare not ignore it. We dare not teach others to ignore it. We dare not weaken its impact. We must diligently study it and apply it and urge others to do so as well. But God did not exhaust his will by his revelation unto us. His will is still active and he has not grown senile. In his sovereignty he does not need to consult the book nor study precedent to act in the determination of any case. He can have mercy upon anyone. He can take circumstances into consideration. He can weigh all of the exigencies of a case in making a determination of its outcome. He is not frightened by the thought that he might be branded a “situation ethicist” knowing that this is another term bandied about by finite creatures. With this rather lengthy and even somewhat rambling dissertation I am now ready to face up to your question. First, as relates to sprinkling, it must be remembered that most of those who have been sprinkled in the post-apostolic, modern sectarian, theological mix-up, had no idea of being baptized at all. With them, sprinkling was not an arbitrary choice in place of immersion, because they had no choice and their will was not operative. It was not a decision but an imposition. They were sprinkled while helpless infants and under complete subjection to others.

I can testify personally upon this matter. I was but twenty-nine days old when my beloved mother, frightened by the Missouri Synod Lutheran emphasis upon original sin, which she did not understand, turned me over to the Reverend Mr. Peterson for christening. I did not choose sprinkling. It was as harmless in my case as I was helpless. Sprinkling is not baptism. It cannot be equated with baptism philologically, philosophically, or scripturally. It is a different action altogether. One who has been sprinkled has not been baptized in the scriptural usage of that term.

A man is not going to be “saved on his sprinkling” as you put it. If a man with full knowledge of the meaning of the Greek baptizo, chooses something else, or even prefers some other action, it is obvious that he is deliberately thwarting a requirement of the Father. I doubt that very many do this. If one is that knowledgeable it would be easier to be immersed than to oppose it. I rather think most people are sprinkled under the impression that they are fully complying with the divine requirement and being born or brought into a new relationship. They equate their action with the ordinance of baptism.

It is never as good to be mistaken as to be right, and no one ought ever to deliberately choose to make a mistake. But what about the sincere and honest person who, upon the basis of all the teaching he has ever had or heard, is sprinkled under the honest conviction that he is fulfilling the requirement of our precious Lord? Will God accept any such person into his everlasting habitation? I do not know. One thing I do know is that God's will must be done and it will be done!

No man will be saved "on his sprinkling" because God has not made sprinkling a condition of salvation. No man will be saved on his mistake. Mistakes are not a procuring cause of salvation. It would be well for most of us if they were. The question then is not whether a man will be saved by his being sprinkled, but whether any man who sincerely seeks to obey God will be saved in spite of his mistakes. Will the mercy of God be applicable to such a person and will that mercy as an attribute of divine grace receive one who does the best he knows to do in his particular situation?

I probably would not be any happier if I knew the answer and I am content to trust in divine goodness. No problem is too great for God but some of them are a little "sticky" for me. One thing I can be assured of and that is that one who trusts implicitly in Christ and implements that faith by immersion in water has made the proper response to the good news. He has a quality of assurance which can never be the lot of one who has not thus responded. I have done what Jesus required and I speak of it in humility rather than in pride. I expect to teach and urge all others to do the same. But what God will ultimately do with those who do not or cannot understand I must leave in his hands, where I also rest.

Since you have asked the question, however, I must interpose a little more before I leave it. I do not believe that one will be saved "on his sprinkling" but I am not sure that, within the context of your question, he will be saved "on his immersion." Perhaps I misunderstand the implication and if so,

I beg your forgiveness for my density. In any event I think a word of caution and clarification may be in order.

Forgiveness of sins and justification are represented in the sacred scriptures as results and, like all such results, are said to be dependent upon a combination of causes. I recall that Alexander Campbell once wrote: “Call these causes or means of justification, and they may severally indicate an influence or instrumentality in the consummation of this great act of Divine favor. He that assumes any one or two of them, as the exclusive or one only essential cause of a sinner’s justification, acts arbitrarily and hazardingly, rather than discreetly or according to the oracles of God.”

I have found it extremely difficult to “keep the even tenor of my way” in this sectarian age in which my lot has been cast. There is ever the danger of becoming sectarian in attempting to prove that one is not. The danger is enhanced with reference to those items of revelation to which one clings while others do not, and which thus serve as marks of differentiation between themselves and him. The question of immersion unto the forgiveness of sins sets us apart in the present era of religious strife and partisan ferment and emphasis.

In our zeal to promote what we regard as essential and to offset the arguments of those who attack our thinking, there is the possibility that we may lift baptism out of its perspective and lead others to regard it as the meritorious cause of their justification before God. Because I recognize human tendency under pressure and because I am aware of my own inclinations and weakness I entreat the Father about this more than almost anything else. I do so want to grasp the majesty of grace in all of its multi-faceted demonstrations even while I cling to each individual item of revelation.

That is why I think it is important that we not think of being saved on our immersion in contrast with being saved “on sprinkling.” The original and moving cause of our salvation is the grace of God our Father as manifested in his Son; while his sacrifice in our behalf through the shedding of his blood is the meritorious cause.

We are not saved by faith in immersion but by faith in Jesus. If we trust for salvation in any act or performance, whether mental or overt, our faith is misplaced. It is one thing to trust in a prescription and a wholly different thing to trust in the physician. The validity of baptism is not found in the act but in the Author of it. It is not inherent but invested. If we forget this we may turn out to be modern Pharisees, and baptism may become a mere outward rite.

If God wills, we shall continue our discussion in the issue of the paper for next month. The first question with which I will deal is stated in this fashion, “Would you receive a man into your fellowship on his ‘Baptist baptism?’” The second question is phrased, “Can a man be baptized into Christ upon the basis of a wrong doctrine?” We sincerely trust that you will be looking forward to the answers as we shall give them.

The Cherished Freedom

Mission Messenger (May 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

Liberty of opinion! No other right accruing to citizens of the kingdom of light by virtue of their citizenship should be more cherished. No other should be more stoutly defended. Forfeiture of this right means that we cease to be servants of one Lord and become slaves to men. The truth of heaven belongs not to a special caste. It is not the private domain of a hierarchy, to be dispensed at a fee to lesser mortals. It is as universal as the atmosphere, and like the air, it must be breathed by each one for himself.

No man should seek to be free from Christ but all should strive to remain free in Christ. This entails the right of each man to go to the fountain of revelation and drink from it directly, rather than from the mental dipper of another who has filtered it for safety and convenience. There are no keepers of the springs! The right to read and meditate personally entails the corollary privilege of forming conclusions and making deductions for oneself. Abrogation of the right of private interpretation makes a farce of the right of personal investigation. One is not real without the other.

Involved in this fundamental right is another— the right to cherish and hold an opinion as a member of the one body. Fellowship in that body is based upon acceptance of Jesus as Christ and Lord and not upon acquiescence in the opinions of one another. It is founded upon faith in the Son of God and not upon the mental deductions of the other sons of God. Otherwise, we have more than one Lord over conscience. Those who would not have men lord it over them, must not lord it over other men. Free men must remain free.

In practical application to our own messed up situation this means that I dare not enquire of another his opinion about the validity of instrumental music, the support of Herald of Truth, the millennium, the present-day work of the Holy Spirit, or the use of Bible Classes, as a basis for our fellowship. I can discuss with him at length the views at which he has arrived on these matters, and share with him my own views which run counter to his. I can tell him the route by which I arrived at my conviction and listen just as eagerly to the grounds which he advances for arrival at his opinion.

But I must receive him first as a brother, because he is in Christ, and then we must converse together as equals in the Lord. We were raised up together and made to sit together in heavenly places. Neither of us can assume an arrogant stance because both of us arrived at our present place, not by our own goodness or works, but by the wonder of divine grace. And that grace, in order to receive us, had to be extremely longsuffering and tolerant toward our many wrong opinions. It was faith which gained access to the grace wherein we stand and not doctrinal correctness. And it is by faith we continue in that grace while we strive to grow in knowledge of truth and alter our opinions.

But do the elders not have a right to forbid certain opinions to be held by the constituents of a congregation? Certainly they do, if they are the front men for a human sect. Any human party has a right to devise a creed consisting of a bill of particulars to which men must subscribe to be recognized as being in good standing with the party. But no group of men on earth can prescribe the orthodox opinions to which men must pay lipservice to be in Christ Jesus. The divine-human relationship is conditioned upon recognition of the Lordship of Jesus, and elders are specifically forbidden to lord it over the lot or portion which has been assigned to them.

In the kingdom of heaven the shepherds are also sheep, and they are not infallible. Moreover, no one can divest himself of an honest opinion at the command or behest of another, as witness the case of Galileo. The only way you can force men to form opinions slanted toward any propaganda norm, political or religious, is by the cruel and uncharitable art of brainwashing. The organizational mind is only possible when men surrender their mentality to the organizational structure. When this happens liberty flies out of the nearest stained-glass window and leaves only an assembly of automatons and a round-up of robots. The blood of Jesus was not shed to purchase zombies!

We all need to respect the revelation handed down from above to the church, but the same regard cannot always be given to those opinions handed down from above in the church. There is a difference between divine directives and dogmatic dictatorship. No one has a right to intrude upon the sacred precincts of the human heart and throw out opinions any more than he has the right to invade his neighbor's home and throw out his furniture. We must be always on the alert that our faith stands upon the power of God and not upon the wisdom of men. The divine injunction is to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. It is my intention to do that and to also defend your right to do it!

Voltaire, the skeptic, wrote in his Philosophic Dictionary (1764): "The individual who persecutes a man, his brother, because he is not of the same opinion is a monster."

More About Baptism

Mission Messenger (June 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“It seems as if Mr. Rice had found a most delicious theme in my alleged illiberality. He glories in an assumed liberality. I desire no invidious comparisons. Still I hesitate not to say, that, truly and sincerely, on the proper meaning of the word, were our respective views, feelings, and actions thoroughly dissected, I am incomparably more liberal than he: for I suppose there are many conscientious, religious, moral and Christian Presbyterians; and that, although our Savior has no Presbyterian church in heaven, or earth, yet I doubt not but that he has had many, very many, that loved and honored him in that worldly church, whom he will honor in the world to come.”

The foregoing is a statement by Alexander Campbell in his debate with N. L. Rice on the design of baptism. It will serve to show how we have forsaken the ideals of the restoration fathers, and have crystallized into a sectarian establishment which today would exclude even Alexander Campbell from the communion of the saints who compose it. Indeed, our brethren have posthumously withdrawn themselves from every one of the original restoration leaders and cast them into the particular perdition which has been invented to receive all of what are ignorantly referred to as “apostates.” These “prophets” were rejected by the world while they lived and by their heirs after death.

Last month I dealt at length with questions related to baptism and answered a goodly number of queries which I encounter in almost every place where I go in these days to spread the gospel of peace on earth to men of good-will. I did not get through with those questions and in this issue we will resume where we left off. It is almost imperative that you read what was written in the paper last month in order to get a proper clue to the reasoning which will be employed in the copy you now hold in your hand.

Again, it must be made clear that I do not gauge my love for others upon their agreement with me. I want you to sincerely study the revealed word for yourself and to formulate your own convictions. I shall love you if you cannot concur with what I write. I intend to be accountable only to God for what I believe and I allow all of my readers to occupy that same ground. I shall be dealing with some pretty “sticky” questions among the believers who generally read this paper and I want you to be free from any pressure.

BAPTIST BAPTISM

1. Would you receive a man into your fellowship on his “Baptist baptism”?

In the first place, I think it should be clearly understood that the fellowship with God and Christ is not something we can extend or withdraw, but something in which we share through divine grace. It is a state or condition into which we are called (1 Corinthians 1:9). I am in the fellowship with every person on this earth who is in Christ Jesus and in whom the Spirit dwells.

The fellowship is the fellowship of the Spirit, and there is only one Spirit. All in whom he abides are in the fellowship. So it would not affect one’s standing with God whether I accept him or not, but it might affect my standing if I reject one whom God accepts. However, I presume you really mean to ask if I would receive into the congregation of saints with which I am associated, and recognize as a brother in the Lord, one who had been immersed under the influence and teaching of members of the Baptist Church.

This may be rather plain, but I would be as much inclined to receive one on the basis of "Baptist baptism" as I would "Church of Christ baptism" or any other exclusivistic partisan baptism. I am not interested in either one. When baptism is made a sectarian rite it is prostituted from its original and divine purpose, and made to serve a selfish end for which it was not ordained.

It would be rather incongruous for a group to seek to get control of the universal birth process and copyright it, and insist that those who entered the world through the ministrations of one who was not an authorized obstetrician was not a child and should not be accepted as a member of the human race or family. I doubt there is such a thing as "Baptist baptism." One is either baptized or he is not, and whether it is a Baptist who immerses him has little significance. The validity of baptism depends upon the heart of the believer and not upon the theological slant of the administrator.

I must confess that I have never met a person who confessed that he was immersed with "Baptist baptism." I suspect this is a term originated by enemies of the Baptist position, and applied by them to people who would disavow it. Having had some little experience with folk who credit views to me which I do not espouse I am a little reluctant to put words in the mouths of others or to state their views in language which they would not personally indulge.

We are not called upon to receive anyone as a Baptist, Methodist, or Presbyterian, but we are called upon to receive all who are Christians. If a Christian has previously been identified with some religious party and expresses a desire to be just a Christian and a Christian only, we are not obligated to receive him as a partisan, but as a Christian. His obedience to the good news made him a Christian, and he does not have to cancel that obedience and go through the process again to become a Christian.

I recall the remarks of E. G. Sewell, an editor of Gospel Advocate, in association with David Lipscomb. “I have been preaching for sixty-two years, and have never had any one to come forward to unite with the church of Christ that said he had been baptized into the Baptist Church . . . But I have found a number of people that said that when they were baptized they did it in submission to the will of God, and they were encouraged to take their stand at once among those who are simply Christians and to live the Christian life as the word of God directs. So I am in no dilemma in regard to the questions you ask. But those that require all those that have been baptized to do God’s will to be baptized again, ‘having it in view that baptism is for the remission of sins,’ are the ones that are in the ditch, there being no authority in the word of God for any such procedure.”

BECAUSE OF REMISSION

2. But is not remission of sins the design of baptism, and if so, can one be saved who is baptized because he believes his sins have been remitted?

I trust that you will bear with me if I seem to speak at length in answer to your question. I know of nothing else so fraught with the possibility of subtle error as this question. I do not impeach your integrity or impugn your motives for I used to ask the same question in the same way and for the same purpose. I asked it with the sincerity and the same eagerness to be right that you manifest. I am convinced, though, that there was a motivation behind it which is not right or scriptural.

First of all, forgiveness of sins is not man's design for baptism but God's design for those who are baptized. Forgiveness of sins is a judicial act. It is an executive act of pardon. It takes place in heaven in the mind of God. It is not something to be secured by purchase or barter. One does not obtain it by trading off or swapping any act or deed. It is not, therefore, the exclusive design of baptism and may not be the most important motivation.

Secondly, there are at least nine "designs" for baptism set forth in the new covenant scriptures and the selection of one of these as the specific or superlative design which must be understood and recognized to establish the validity of obedience, to the exclusion or ignoring of the others, does not speak well for those who profess to revere all that the Spirit has spoken.

The primary design or motivation for baptism is the desire to unquestioningly "conform in this way with all that God requires" (Matthew 3:15). It is unthinkable that Jesus would be immersed in water purely for a secondary or inferior purpose, and this is the reason he gave when insisting that John immerse him in the waters of the Jordan.

The highest form of obedience of authority does not question or enquire what reward will be received for obedience, or what favor will be granted. It is prompted by reverence and respect for the will of the one whose requirements are met. It is not obedience to receive something but to honor the requirements of the one obeyed. It is upon that basis that our Lord set the example for us. Small wonder that, at the time, a voice from heaven declared, "This is my Son, my beloved, on whom my favor rests."

I am inclined to agree with David Lipscomb in his expressed view that few, if any, who have been immersed have obeyed this divine requirement because their sins have been forgiven. There is not a sufficient motivation about such an idea to prompt anyone to be baptized. No logical or rational explanation can be given for such a procedure. Here is the statement by Lipscomb:

I do not think any one was ever baptized because his sins were remitted. They may have believed their sins were remitted before they were baptized, but the remission of sins was not the moving cause. There is nothing in remission of sins as a motive to prompt one to be baptized. They may have thought, inasmuch as God had forgiven their sins, they ought to obey his command to be baptized; but in that case the desire to obey God is the moving cause. When a man is baptized to obey God, he is led by a proper motive; and I believe when he does this to obey him, God will forgive his sins, whether he knows the act in which God forgives or not. Man cannot be led by a holier or more acceptable motive than the desire to obey God and so 'fulfill all righteousness.' It is a dangerous thing to require more than God requires.

Men may be told that they were justified and forgiven upon the basis of personal faith and at the very moment of trustful surrender. They may accept it as factual and rely upon it, but there is nothing in this to motivate them to be immersed. Intellectually and philosophically, those who are immersed, believing their sins have been forgiven, are led to obedience for another reason. When sifted down it will generally be found that their desire is to obey God, to do his will, or to follow the example of Jesus.

They may be mistaken about the time when the forgiveness of God was accorded and when the pardon was decreed. They may be the victims of theological error in that respect, but such a mistake will not cancel God's gracious promise. It is not conditioned upon being correct about every theological point at the time of obedience. I do not serve the kind of God who bestows his love only upon those who have an intellectual key honed down until it fits every slot in the keyhole of mental correctness. This would deny grace, which, I suspect, is the real problem of all too many of us.

I no longer have a zoo concept with one cage labeled Baptists, another Methodists, and another Presbyterians, and I no longer separate God's precious word into the proper "chow-mix" to fling through the bars to each species. All of these names are as human as the cages. God regards no one as a Baptist, a Mennonite, or a Congregationalist. He regards every person on this universe as one for whom his Son died. So I receive men as individuals without reference to their sectarian categories. I accept what truth any man possesses as truth, and I seek, upon that foundation, to build more truth. It is pretty difficult to sectarianize everybody else on earth without ending up with your own sect of left-overs. When you get all of the other species in their respective cages, you may end up as "the great uncaged species," and may be the most dangerous of the lot!

When a man from the Baptist tradition tells me he was immersed to obey God or follow his will I do not catechize him about how many wrong ideas he had at the time. I have immersed some people in my time who had some pretty scrambled notions but who sincerely sought to obey the Father in humble submission. I did not try to straighten out all of their hang-ups before I assisted them in their obedience to my Lord.

It will help you to remember that "unto the remission of sins" is not a part of the command Peter gave to conscience-stricken enquirers on the day of Pentecost. When they cried aloud asking what to do they were told to do two things, "Reform your lives and be immersed in the name of Jesus Christ." "For the remission of sins" does not express what we do for God but what he does for us. This is just as true of the Holy Spirit which is bestowed as a gift.

When any person reforms his conduct and is immersed upon the basis that he believes in Jesus Christ, he has done all that is required to receive the forgiveness of his sins. He may be incorrect in his information as to when God accords amnesty or bestows pardon, but this no more invalidates the promise than a mistake as to when the bank credits your interest wipes out your deposit.

Let me anticipate your next question. Certainly I have brothers in the Baptist party. In that respect I am just like Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Barton W. Stone, Walter Scott, Tolbert Fanning, Benjamin Franklin, David Lipscomb, and the great majority of restoration leaders. Not one of these would have dreamed of insisting upon “re-baptism” as essential to entering the fellowship of the Lord, unless the one seeking to be re-baptized positively stated that he did not believe in Jesus at the time of his immersion. I want to share with you a lengthy quote from the pen of Alexander Campbell which needs to be studied and considered by every person in our list of readers today.

Let me once more say, that the only thing which can justify re-immersion into the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, is a confession on the part of the candidate that he did not believe that Jesus was the Messiah, the Son of God— that he died for our sins, was buried, and rose again the third day, at the time of his first immersion— that he now believes the testimony of the Apostles concerning him, and desires to be buried and rise with Christ in faith of a resurrection to eternal life. The instant that re-baptism is preached and practiced on any other ground than that now stated— such as deficient knowledge, weak faith, a change of views— then have we contradicted in some way and made void the word of the Lord, “he who will believe and be immersed shall be saved”— then have we abandoned the principles of the present reformation, instituted experience meetings, committees for examining candidates, changed the bond of union, and made something else than the belief of the gospel facts the faith of the gospel.

As if this assessment of our condition were not enough, Campbell goes on to predict exactly what has transpired as a result of our legalistic approach and sectarian emphasis. Read his next paragraph and you will see what I mean!

A scene of confusion, such as was never excelled in any community, will obtain in our churches: persons with whom we communed at the Lord's table for seven or ten years, will occasionally take it into their heads that they did not understand baptism at the time of their immersion, that they were hypocrites all the while, and must now get up from the Lord's table and go to the water, confess the Lord, and be immersed. Thus all confidence will be destroyed; and these twice and thrice immersed persons, fond of making converts to their practice, will be agitating the minds of other brethren, urging the weak and credulous to be baptized as a substitute (in fact) for walking more closely with God: for every member of a church who thinks of improving his experience, or increasing his enjoyments by going to the water of baptism, has been living in disobedience or wilful neglect of his duty, not coming daily and constantly to the throne of grace, not walking with God, not keeping his commandments. Reformation, and not immersion, is wanting in all such cases.

If someone reared in the Baptist tradition tells me that he was immersed primarily and solely to become a member of the Baptist sect (and no one ever has) I will urge upon him that he has not really been immersed at all in the scriptural context, or for a scriptural reason. Baptism is not a partisan door. It is not a sectarian passport. When led by the Spirit, we are all baptized into one body and every person who has been baptized at the prompting of the Spirit through the good news is in that body.

A man does not become my brother by coming out of the Baptist party but by coming into Christ. I do not receive men because they are Baptists, Mennonites, or any other kinds of "ists" or "ites," but because they are children of God. If I received one because he was a Baptist I would have to reject all who were not Baptists. But if I receive men because they are children of God I am free to receive all of God's children.

Certainly, I would prefer that we were not partitioned off and divided into separate corrals. It would be great if all of the walls were knocked down and we could roam the great pasture and eat the provisions of love with no cross-fences, but it is not that way, and until it is I am going to love my brothers where they are. I do not think you can argue or debate the fences down. I do believe they can be melted down by the warmth of love. God's love is a blowtorch when directed against steely barriers.

I can summarize by repeating that I do not recall meeting anyone who was baptized because his sins had been forgiven. I have met a lot of people who thought their sins were forgiven before they were baptized, and my thought is, of course, that they were mistaken about it. But they did not give that as the reason for their baptism. I do not consider that their immersion was invalidated by their mistaken view as to something else, and neither do I think they have to have a clear view of the matter before they can obey the Father.

A lot of our preaching brethren who live in mortal fear and tremble at the thought that somebody may not be clear about when God's grace becomes efficacious, intone over a candidate, "I baptize you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins." But they do not know if they are baptizing one for the forgiveness of sins or not, because they cannot read his heart. They do not know his thoughts or intents, and cannot guarantee that what they are doing is at all acceptable with God. We borrow a leaf from our Catholic neighbors when we assume that we can, by pronouncing a certain formula, place God in a position where he cannot deny our action.

The one whom you are baptizing may not even believe that Jesus is the Christ. He may be submitting to baptism merely to marry one of the girls in the congregation, or because his father has threatened to leave him out of his will if he is not a member of the church. All we can do is to take the word of one who confesses that he believes. He may be lying at the time. We do not know if he has sincerely repented. Only God can forgive sins because sin is an offense against the majesty of God. Pronouncing certain words over the head of a person will not change his state.

WRONG DOCTRINE

3. Can a person be baptized into Christ upon the basis of a wrong doctrine?

No, and he cannot be baptized into Christ upon the basis of a right doctrine, either. It is belief in the Lord Jesus Christ on the basis of the gospel, the good news about deliverance from our sins, through his death, burial and resurrection, which saves us and brings us into him.

The gospel was fully proclaimed upon Pentecost. Not one word was ever added to it. Not one apostolic letter is a part of the gospel. The gospel is a message to the whole world, the apostolic letters were written to the saints. No letter contained in the new covenant scriptures was addressed to aliens to persuade them to be baptized. All were written to disciples to remind them they had obeyed the gospel and were in Christ. The apostolic letters were not to be proclaimed to the whole world. The world was not to be saved from sin through doctrine but by the gospel.

One may be wrong about a lot of facets of apostolic doctrine and still obey the gospel. He need not be right about the millennium, the perseverance of the saints, circumcision, eating of meats, or observation of days. In fact, which ever position he takes upon these issues will not affect his relationship to Jesus. “In Christ Jesus neither circumcision avails anything, nor uncircumcision) but a new creation” (Galatians 6:15). Of course, what you are really getting at is whether a man can be wrong about some facet of “Baptist theology” as the world (and the Baptists) express it, and still be saved. The answer is that he may be if he obeys the gospel. It is faith in Jesus, implicit trust in and surrender to him, which is the determinant factor. If one has to be right about partisan doctrinal emphasis before he can be received into the fold of the Good Shepherd he is in real trouble. There are at least two dozen different “Churches of Christ” with different points of stress, and every single one of them regards its doctrinal peculiarities as of sufficient importance to cleave and split the body of God’s Son over them. I know what I am talking about, because I used to hold the cloaks of brethren who “stoned” our fellows because they could not agree with us over some point.

Which one of these myriad views must one have before he can be born again? Upon which one does the efficacy of his baptism depend? If one can become a child of God and be wrong about any of them, can he continue as a child of God in the same condition as he became one? If not, how long can he remain before being blacklisted and drummed out of the regiment of the loyal? Who is to set the date and limit the time?

The truth is that forgiveness of the sin which has alienated us from God depends upon none of these things. God does not forgive us because we have learned a lot of good things. Forgiveness is not on a canteen basis where you drop in enough correct views until you trip the mechanism and get the prize. You can quote scriptures to sustain your position on a lot of things and never be forgiven at all. Forgiveness is not conditioned upon knowing the Bible by heart but in knowing Jesus from the heart.

We are justified freely by God’s grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. God designed him to be the means of expiating sin by his sacrificial death, effective through faith. The question is not, "What think ye of the millennium?" but "What think ye of Christ, whose son is he?" If a person believes that Jesus is the Christ and God's Son, he is baptized into Christ when he surrenders his heart and self, even though he may have mistaken views about many things. He does not enter Christ on the basis of mistaken ideas, of course, but in spite of them.

In the congregation at Corinth there were actually some brethren who did not have a clear conviction that heathen deities were not real. The apostle acknowledges that "A false god has no existence in the real world. There is no god but one." He also writes, "But not everyone knows this. There are some who have been so accustomed to idolatry that even now they eat this food with a sense of its heathen consecration, and their conscience being weak, is polluted by the eating."

He argues that the superior knowledge of some who have such a clear concept of deity may be "utter disaster to the weak, the brother for whom Christ died." And to sin against such a brother is to sin against Christ. In the same congregation there were some who said there was no resurrection of the dead. Paul even wrote; "There are some who know nothing of God; to your own shame I say it." If people could be in the church of God as a result of apostolic proclamation and have such hangups certainly they will not be debarred because of some of the little sectarian ideas they have inherited and have not shaken.

I challenge my brethren to restore a concept of the community of the saints where brethren with a superior knowledge do not destroy those who are uninformed. If we want to capture again the primitive order of things, let us bring back a community where even those who are misinformed about the existence of other deities are still received and nurtured and trained in love until they realize the majestic truth that there is but one God.

If I hound my brother out or destroy him because of his doctrinal opinions I sin against Christ. Christ died for the brethren regardless of what views they may hold about the millennium, the activity of the Holy Spirit, speaking in tongues, missionary programs, or all the rest of the divisive bit. Our brethren ought to be ashamed to live and afraid to die, who think so little of the cleansing blood of the Lamb of God that they will negate its effect and wipe out the relationship it created over such trivia as have divided us.

What a sense of values one must have who will undo the plan of the ages and render the very purpose of God ineffective over such a question as to whether the saints can separate into classes to study the precious word. I absolutely refuse to be the cause of the downfall of my brothers in Christ. I love my brothers more than I do my scriptural knowledge. Knowledge breeds conceit; it is love that builds. So says the apostle, and so I believe! Deliver me from the kind of supercilious arrogance which would cast out even the apostles if they were here and showed the love and concern they did while on earth. We are afflicted today with an outbreak of Diotrephesian rash. “And not content with that (putting himself first), he refuses himself to welcome the brethren, and also stops those who want to welcome them and puts them out of the church.”

DESIGNS OF BAPTISM

4. You said there were nine designs of baptism mentioned in the scriptures. Will you list them for us?

I said there were at least nine. There may be more. My list is not necessarily complete or exclusive. But I will provide them for your notice with scriptural documentation. However, I think I should speak a word of caution. Actually, there is but one primary motivation. The others are secondary and subsidiary. They accrue from it. They tend to express blessings which result from obedience and thus offer an incentive, but the highest and noblest design is simply to obey the will of God.

I have already documented this as the design for the baptism of Jesus as recorded in Matthew 3:15. The desire and eagerness to fulfill all righteousness should prompt our every action and any other reason should be subsidiary to it. For this reason I do not want to make this foundational purpose seem to be in the background because of anything else I may say or think. Nothing else is really a design of a legitimate nature if unrelated to or exclusive of this.

The second design I shall mention is the securing of or returning the answer of a clear conscience. In 1 Peter 3:21, the apostle, who has just been writing about the flood, asserts, “The like figure whereunto baptism doth also now save us (not putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.”

But what does this mean? It occurs in a context of which William Barclay says, “This is not only one of the most difficult passages in Peter’s letter; it is one of the most difficult passages in the whole New Testament.” While Barclay is referring primarily to the preaching to the spirits in prison, it is also true that the expression “the answer of a good conscience” is not without its problems. This will be recognized when one compares the various renderings. Here are a few samples.

“And, corresponding to that figure, the water of baptism now saves you, not the washing off of material defilement, but the craving of a good conscience after God, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (Weymouth).

“A counterpart of that water, the rite of immersion, not the removal of physical dirt but the request to God for a clear conscience, now preserves you also by the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (Schonfield).

“The representation of which, baptism, is now saving you also (not the putting off of the filth of the flesh, but the enquiry of a good conscience to God.” (Concordant Literal New Testament).

“Baptism is not the washing away of bodily pollution, but the appeal made to God by a good conscience; and it brings salvation through the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (The New English Bible New Testament).

“And water, of which this is a figure, now saves you, that is, baptism; not as the washing away of dirt from the body, but as the prayer of a good conscience before God, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (Charles Kingsley Williams).

“Baptism, which corresponds to this, now saves you, not as a removal of dirt from the body but as an appeal to God for a clear conscience, through the resurrection of Jesus Christ” (Revised Standard Version).

The reason that the translators differ in their rendering of the word which the King James Version designates as “answer” is because the term originally meant a question or enquiry, and later, the reply to such an enquiry. Thus, it came to mean the queries proposed during an examination, and the answers given to them, and finally, the whole process of scrutiny or examination. Does baptism secure a clear conscience from God because of divine cleansing action, or does the person who is being immersed have a clear conscience as the result of his action?

To put it another way, is baptism an appeal for a clear conscience, or is it the response of a conscience that is clear? It will help to remember that the Greek word is eperotema, and this was a legal term. It was used in making business contracts or drawing up legal agreements. If a firm decided to accept a junior partner or executive, he was asked if he properly understood and agreed to the conditions proposed, and if he would faithfully carry out the responsibility of the new relationship. His answer in the affirmative made it legal and binding from that time forward.

If a man desired to enlist in the army he was asked if he would pledge allegiance. Publicly he was confronted with the question as to whether he would forsake all other interests and devote himself without quibble to the duties devolving upon a soldier. When he made a solemn response in the form of an oath to give himself unstintingly to the new calling he was accepted and sworn in.

Those who come to Jesus are regarded as being invited to a partnership in which they must devote their energies to the advancement of the cause. They are looked upon as enlisting in the royal forces of the King of kings. Baptism is the public answer or attestation of one who, in good conscience, renounces all other concerns and gives himself wholeheartedly to the new enterprise. It is a pledge or appeal to God for a reception upon the basis of the proper response to the divine will.

Baptism is not a physical rite intended to produce external cleansing. It is a bath of regeneration and not for the purpose of cleansing bodily defilement. It rather cleanses from the guilt of sin and thus purges the conscience from the stain of transgression making possible access to God.

The third design of baptism is to bring us into relationship with the Godhood. The term "Godhead" in the King James Version is not a good rendering. It is intended to embrace all that is recognized as deity and for this, the word I have chosen is better adapted. Just as priesthood signifies all that pertains to the relationship of the priests, and brotherhood indicates all that is embraced by the relationship of brethren, so Godhood indicates all that is known as God.

Deity is revealed or manifested in the form of Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, and we are baptized into the state or relationship embraced by the name of these three, as shown by Matthew 28:19. Again, the King James Version is incorrect in rendering eis to onoma by “in the name.” The Greek eis signifies action from without to within. It is not that we are baptized “in the name,” but into the name of Father, Son and Holy Spirit.

The word name means more than a mere designation or title. It relates to the character and attributes of those under consideration, and it here implies that we are immersed into a state where we share the divine nature, that is, eternal life, the life of God. Certainly Jesus is not giving a formula to announce in immersing a candidate for citizenship. There is no such formula. He is not telling us what to say, but into what we induct men and women by baptism.

If I may be allowed a little freedom in paraphrasing, what he meant was, “Go and enroll students from all of the nations, and bring them into the new relationship by immersing them into that state involved in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.” One who sincerely believes that Jesus is the Messiah and God’s Son is as scripturally baptized if the administrator says nothing as if he pronounces in clerical tones a ritualistic statement. It is not the ritual of a doctor which makes birth possible or valid, nor is it the words spoken by the mortician which constitutes burial.

We have been trapped into traditional modes which become official methods and I always feel sorry for those poor souls who question the baptism of a sincere person because a cleric did not utter the approved or recognized epigram while burying him in water. It is Romanism which teaches that a prescribed sequence of words must be pronounced in exactitude or else the ordinance is of no avail, and some of us are a lot closer to Rome than we are to Jerusalem. In any event, it is a design of baptism to introduce us into that glorious state in which we enjoy fellowship with the divine.

The fourth point which I will mention is that baptism is to enable us to receive the Holy Spirit, to indwell us as God's wonderful gift (Acts 2:38). This passage promises the Spirit to those believers who reform their lives and are immersed, and Acts 5:32 shows that the Spirit was given to all who obey. It is tragic that men today often confuse the Spirit with the word, which is his instrument, but on Pentecost they received the word and were then baptized, and they were baptized and then received the Spirit as a gift. Receiving the word precedes baptism and receiving the Spirit as a seal succeeds baptism.

This does not argue that the Spirit does not operate upon the heart of an alien through the gospel, for it is the gospel which is God's dynamic to salvation. Certainly the Holy Spirit is in the Word to make it living and vital, just as he is in me to provide the more abundant life and in the body of Christ to make it a living entity in this world. But this no more argues that the Spirit and the word are identical than it argues that I am identical with the Holy Spirit, seeing that both are indwelt as the scriptures clearly teach.

The argument that Cornelius and his household received the baptism of the Holy Spirit prior to being commanded to be immersed in water, cannot be urged as an objection to what I have said for the simple reason that this household was chosen to initiate the non-Jews into a state of fellowship with Jews and thus clarify the divine mystery which had been concealed from previous ages. The secret was "that through the gospel the Gentiles were made joint heirs with the Jews, part of the same body, sharers together in the promise made in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 3:6). The purpose of the prior baptism of the Spirit was to convince the Jews that this was God's will. "And God who can read men's hearts showed his approval of them by giving the Holy Spirit to them as to us" (Acts 15:8).

When Jew and Greek became one body there was no further need of this unique phenomenon of the Spirit, and there is no indication in the scriptures that there was ever a repetition of it. Indeed, a constant occurrence of the experience would have lessened the effect rather than enhancing it. Today, one does not become an heir because he has received the Spirit, but he receives the Spirit because he has become an heir. The Spirit bears witness with our spirit that we are the children of God.

The fifth design of baptism is to bring us into an organic relationship in the one body of Christ. Paul argues, "For Christ is like a single body, which has many parts; it is still one body, even though it is made up of many parts." He affirms, "In the same way, all of us, Jews and Gentiles, slaves and free men, have been baptized into the one body by the same Spirit, and we have all been given the one Spirit to drink" (1 Cor. 12:13).

In this instance the Spirit is not the element in which we are baptized, but the divine agent who prompts or motivates us through the good news to be baptized, and who guarantees that all who are obedient to the heavenly proclamation enter the one body and become an organ or functioning part in it. There are two opinions as to the meaning of this passage with which I cannot concur. One is that the baptism under consideration is a baptism in the Spirit, in which case the Spirit cannot be the agent or administrator, since only Jesus can baptize in the Spirit as an element or a medium.

The other position, created by our unfortunate sectarian stance today is, that many who are baptized under the influence of the Spirit through the good news are not brought into the one body at all. This always occurs when partisan adherents arrogantly assume that they constitute the one body, to the exclusion of all others, and that one must belong with them to belong to Christ. I hold that when a humble penitent believer is baptized on the basis of his faith in Jesus that he is brought into the one body in spite of either the ignorance or arrogance of those who immerse him. The purpose and action of the Spirit will not become a failure because of the presumption of a faction of finite folk.

The Holy Spirit sustains two relations to the body. The first is preliminary and leads to baptism by motivation effected through the gospel; the second is subsequent and intended to sustain those in the new relationship. The same Spirit who prompts us to initial obedience is given us to drink, that is, to satisfy our thirst and preserve us. One provision makes us members and the other supports us as such. But I think that the baptism which brings us into the relationship is immersion in water of the humble penitent who turns to Jesus.

The sixth design is to enable us to share in a likeness of the death of Christ (Rom. 6:3). It is obvious that there must be two crosses and two deaths involved in my salvation. Christ died for the sins of all men, but all men must die to sin for the sacrifice to become effective unto them. I must be crucified unto the world and the world must be crucified unto me, for only then can I be dead and Christ live in me. Actually, of course, there are not really two crosses and two deaths, for the death I die is on his cross. It is his death with which I become identified.

Just as Christ died, was buried and rose again according to the old covenant scriptures, so I must die, be buried, and rise again according to the new covenant scriptures. Thus, the apostle writes, "For surely you know this: when we were baptized into union with Christ Jesus, we were baptized into union with his death. By our baptism then, we were buried with him and shared his death, in order that, just as Christ was raised from death by the glorious power of the Father, so also we might live a new life. For if we became one with him in dying as he did, in the same way we shall be one with him by being raised to life as he was" (Romans 6:3-5).

To get the full impact of this statement one needs to underline the words “with” and “into.” With Christ Jesus and with his death! It is thus we become one with him. Note that in baptism we “shared his death” and “in the same way.” Paul knows that every person in the community of saints has been immersed. His argument would be ridiculous and absurd otherwise. In view of this, it is a little bit silly for someone to quote what Paul has to say about faith in order to offset what he here says about baptism.

Even the casual and careless reader of this passage must conclude that every person in the community of the reconciled at Rome had been immersed. And the very design of baptism as here enunciated was to make it possible to become identified with Jesus in his death, and in his life. What Jesus did for all men that they might be saved, each man must do for Jesus that he may be saved.

The seventh design of baptism is to enable us to put on Christ as a garment (Gal. 3:27). It is one thing to identify with Jesus in his resurrection, but it is a wholly different thing to wear him so that the shame of our nakedness do not appear. The New English Bible translates the passage, “For through faith you are all sons of God in union with Christ Jesus. Baptized into union with him you have all put on Christ as a garment.”

When we come to Christ we “put off the old man of sin,” that is, we remove, lay aside, or hang up the tattered garment furnished by unregenerate human nature. We divest ourselves of the fabric woven of the evil ways of this present age and manufactured at the loom of the commander of the spiritual powers of the air. But it is not God’s purpose that we be naked or exposed. We put on Christ as our covering or protection from the weak and beggarly elements. The word for put on is enduo. It literally means to clothe with a garment. A good example of its several occurrences is found in the treatment of Jesus by the soldiers, “Finally, when the mockery was over, they took off the mantle and dressed him in his own clothes” (Matt. 27:31).

The baptistery is God's dressing-room. Before an actor comes out upon the stage to take his part in the drama, he divests himself of his old clothing and dons the costume adapted to his part. And before we can step into our role upon the stage of life we must lay off the old garments and put on the vesture furnished by the One who wrote the drama and whose invitation to participate in it we accepted.

Ragnar Bring, whose Commentary on Galatians, is so thorough, as is characteristic of the Scandinavian school of thought, writes: "When Paul says that those who have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ, he uses the verb enduo, 'to put on.' This verb means also 'to cover oneself with,' 'to penetrate,' 'to submerge oneself in,' 'to dive into.' The baptized person had become completely united with Christ and one with him. We may also think of putting on the heavenly robes of baptism for which the baptized person was destined."

If you want to read something really interesting on the passage in Galatians, you should read what William Barclay has to say in his Daily Study Bible Series. Here is a taste of it to whet your appetite. "Baptism was no mere outward form and ceremony; it was a real union with Christ. Paul goes on to say that they had put on Christ. There may be here a reference to a custom which certainly existed later. The candidate for baptism was clothed in pure white robes, symbolic of the new life into which he had entered. Just as the initiate put on his new white robe he put on Christ; his life was clothed in Christ."

The eighth design of baptism is to bring us into a state of wholeness, that is of salvation. We must never forget that wholeness and holiness were not too far apart in Jewish thought. In Mark 16:16, we read, "He that believes and is baptized shall be saved, he that does not believe will be condemned." The word sozo, save, is also rendered heal 3 times, make whole 9, and preserve 1. Jesus used this very word when he told the woman who had suffered from hemorrhages for twelve years, "Your faith has made you whole.” One who is in sin is deformed. He is crippled and abnormal. He must be restored to the state of normalcy, by being rescued or saved from his condition.

Nothing is sillier than for someone to excuse sin by saying of the transgressor, “He is just acting naturally, he is perfectly normal.” The devil has conned us into warping the abnormal into normal, and vice versa. In the case of the long-suffering woman her faith prompted her to touch Jesus, and it was a faith so great as to overcome her timidity and make the contact which enabled her to be restored, made whole, or be healed. Baptism is the touching of Jesus prompted by faith. It is contacting his person in a demonstration of utter trust, and it is the ordained response to the grace that heals.

To change the figure and bring the metaphor up to modern standards, faith is the electric eye which opens the door for one who approaches the storehouse of grace, while baptism is the door that makes possible the access. It is a sad thing indeed when one becomes so enamored of the unseen power which operates the door that he simply stands there admiring it and bragging about his having discovered it, without ever going through the door. But it is a tragedy when someone who ought to know better brainwashes and befuddles him until he thinks that one is as well off standing out under the portico as he would be if he entered.

It was J. W. McGarvey, in dealing with this passage, who said, “When the apostles went out to preach under this commission, they knew only from its terms to whom they should promise pardon, and consequently they never encouraged anyone to hope for it previous to baptism, nor gave any unbaptized person reason to think that his sins were already forgiven. If any of the unbaptized therefore, are pardoned, it is because God has granted to them more than he has promised. This he may unquestionably do, if the circumstances of individuals shall make it right in his eyes to do so, but of these circumstances he alone can judge, who knows all things and whose judgments are guided by infinite wisdom.”

The ninth design, and the final one which I shall discuss here, is the remission, or forgiveness of sins. It is not my intention, by suggesting these other designs, to make it appear that this one is inferior to the others, or in any way insignificant. I have not listed the designs in the order of their importance, for no intentional design of God can ever be unimportant.

The conscience-stricken hearers on Pentecost, asked what they must do, having been guilty of slaying the one who had since risen from the dead to be made both Messiah and Lord. It is interesting to note that they did not ask what to think, believe or acknowledge. They knew that lordship created a master-servant relationship and entailed doing the will of the Lord. Accordingly, they asked what they must do to implement their faith in his lordship.

The reply was simple and direct. “Reform your lives and be immersed, every one of you in the name of Jesus the Messiah.” Their obedience to these instructions would result in forgiveness of sins and reception of the Holy Spirit as God’s gift. Repentance is a change of mind, preceded by a remorse for guilt, and succeeded by a reformation of conduct or life. A mere change of mind which does not cause one to turn away from and renounce his sin is not repentance. Such a change is produced by a wrong, or inferior, motive.

Forgiveness of sins is a divine act. It is a judicial procedure of offended majesty, proceeding from inestimable mercy. It is made possible by the sacrifice of Jesus, his blood atoning for our guilt. God put him forward “as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith” (Romans 3:25). That is why the record says that “God for Christ’s sake hath forgiven you” (Eph. 4:32). Forgiveness cannot be earned, deserved, purchased or bargained for.

And it is here that I think many brethren need to examine anew their thinking. They have concluded that remission of sins is an integral part of the command and that the command cannot be obeyed by one who has reformed his life consistent with the life of Jesus until he understands and is baptized for this one specific purpose. But forgiveness is not a human design at all. It is the divine design. God designs to forgive those who reform their lives and are baptized to demonstrate obedient discipleship.

With many it is almost as if forgiveness was dispensed by a divine slot machine and was automatically bestowed when two items were dropped in to trigger it off automatically. In our day security is obtained behind doors and gates which can only be opened by one who has a card punched with proper apertures. And some have been betrayed into thinking that a computerized card with two properly synchronized holes will gain the prize of forgiveness. In such an arrangement there is little personal understanding or compassion, and God may be as detached in attitude as a girl selling tickets behind a bullet-proof window.

But forgiveness is not bestowed in such a routine, offhand, impersonal and systematic fashion. The one who comes to God in complete surrender, weeping over his transgressions, and humiliated by his weaknesses, may understand little about how or when he will be forgiven. He does not bring his baptism in to trade for forgiveness. His theme may be, "Nothing in my hand I bring, simply to thy cross I cling." Like the prodigal, he may disclaim worthiness to be called a son, and in his abject state may be willing to be like a hired servant. When such a one submits to baptism, believing it to be the Father's will, God designs to forgive his past and to welcome him to a new start and a new life.

Baptism is unto forgiveness, not because it purchases, procures or produces it, but because it transfers the obedient believer from a state of alienation to one of citizenship where amnesty can be freely granted by the King to all who have received Jesus. It is the very antithesis of baptismal regeneration, although a great many of our brethren affirm that unfortunate doctrine while vociferously denying that they do so. The charge that they teach “regeneration by water” is fairly and justly made against a lot of folk, for that is exactly what they believe and advocate although they are not astute enough to know it!

It is not belief in baptism for the remission of sins, but belief in Jesus as the atonement for our sins, which really counts. We do not trust in a body of water for salvation but in Jesus who is head of the one body. And we do not trust in Jesus because we have been baptized for the remission of sins, but because we believe in Jesus we are baptized to enroll as his disciples, and God forgives our sins. It is Jesus who is made unto us wisdom, righteousness and redemption. It is not faith in the design, but faith in the designer, that makes our obedience effective. We have neither the right nor the authority to formulate a new and amended creed, and ask of those who seek refuge under the spreading wings of divine love, “Do you believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that baptism is for the remission of sins?”

CONCLUSION

When “The Church of Christ” began to exhibit symptoms of its growing sectarianism its members started to emphasize the new doctrine of “knowledge of the design” instead of faith in the Lord Jesus as the ground of acceptability. This enabled the brethren to draw a more definitive line between themselves and the Baptists with whom the restoration movement was originally aligned after it was launched by good Presbyterians.

But it also caused the preachers to hold a “coroner’s inquest” over every case of baptism not performed by one of their number. Men were actually rejected who would not submit to re-immersion in order to please the party. This was by no means the attitude of the early reformers. Tolbert Fanning wrote: "If a Baptist were to present himself to me slating that he was satisfied with his baptism, but still would be baptized again to please the church, if required, I should be certain that man was a hypocrite, or lacked the gospel knowledge and faith." Despite this, I have met numerous brethren who were baptized once to please the Lord, and baptized again to please the congregation!

The restoration fathers saw the proper relationship of baptism to Christ Jesus, and thus to salvation. A. T. Anderson, an eminent student, wrote in Christian Review: "I can never believe that God will withhold the act of pardon because I may not have understood that my sins were forgiven in the act of baptism; knowing that my whole confidence was placed in his Son, and his death for my sins, at the time of my immersion. Christ is greater than immersion. Though I believe with all my heart in Christ, and have the disposition to do whatever he bids me; yet I cannot be saved from my sins, because I have not been taught that he will forgive me just at that time. If this doctrine be carried out, it would make baptism a savior, or I know nothing of reason. This makes immersion the greater and Christ the less. This makes our salvation to depend not on our faith and obedience, nor on the faithfulness of him who promised."

When a man is motivated by any of the "designs" of baptism to obey God, then Jesus is the author of salvation to all them that obey him. There would be no more efficacy in "Church of Christ baptism" than in "Baptist baptism." Both would be for the purpose of pleasing a party. When a man is baptized to please God, or to obey a command of God, that is not party baptism at all. He has done what God requires and "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." A misunderstanding about God's part in the procedure will not negate the promise to one who has done his part as God commanded.

[Abstract]

“We’re all so clogged with dead ideas passed from generation, to generation that even the best of us don’t know the way out.”— Peter Weiss, Marat/Sade.

One who challenges the traditions of a people must always be prepared to face their hostility. When opinions have become crystallized by constant repetition men are frightened at the thought of divesting themselves of them. Without them they feel helpless and insecure. They regard the surrender of them as being an unfair reflection upon their fathers, and fear that a denial of them will weaken the truth which they have sought to buttress with them.

It was Thomas Carlyle, the Scottish essayist and historian, who wrote, “What an enormous magnifier is tradition! How a thing grows in the human memory and in the human imagination, when love, worship, and all that is in the human heart, is there to encourage it.”

I am not by nature an iconoclast, an idol-smasher. I think a lot of traditions are harmless and insignificant and I have no ambition to go around slashing at them for the mere satisfaction of revealing them for what they are. But others are detrimental to the revealed truth of heaven, because they parade as truth, and may contribute to the destruction of the one body, and the ultimate destruction of souls. I am an avowed enemy of anything which obstructs the eternal purpose.

In the Hall of Fame for Great Americans at New York University is a bust of Mark Twain. Beneath it are the words, "Loyalty to petrified opinion never yet broke a chain or freed a human soul." I am resolved, with the help of God, to stand by, with, and for the truth of heaven, but I feel no compulsion to defend with equal fervor those traditions which are "ours." I say this despite the fact that Thomas Babington Macaulay wrote, "To almost all men the state of things under which they have been used to live seems to be the necessary state of things."

Perhaps I can help you understand my personal reaction to some areas of thought by reproducing for you a little of the dialogue which took place one morning in a question period in which I fielded queries from a good-natured group whose members were not all in agreement with my views.

1. Is it true that you hold that there is no plan of salvation?

I think it would be a little silly to say there is no plan of salvation. It is obvious that God had a design by which the chasm eroded by sin was to be bridged. There certainly is a response to the good news which must be made by the lost. The heart must reach out in love to grasp the infinite and to tune in to eternal life.

What I have said is that the so-called "five steps of salvation" advocated by my brethren as the plan conveys a wrong impression. One does not come into the vital, life-giving interpersonal relationship by a hop, skip and jump method. The kingdom of heaven is not attained by scampering up five steps at the urging of a preacher, as if the house of God was a split-level domicile. The tragic thing about reducing the divine response to grace to such a simplistic sequence is that it leaves many people as empty, lonely, and forlorn afterwards as they were before.

When I was a very young preacher conducting meetings in a rural area, I would go to the plain meetinghouse every afternoon and put a chart on the blackboard. Some of these drawings were quite elaborate and designed to elicit complimentary remarks from those who remained awake long enough to see them. An invariable ingredient of every one of them was a circle bearing the label, “kingdom of heaven,” with a little kitchen stepladder leading into it. The five rungs were designated h, f, r, c, b. It was not necessary to spell out the words. Any “Church of Christ” audience on earth knew the initials stood for hearing, faith, repentance, confession and baptism.

But there are several things wrong with this clever little arrangement. For one thing, God overlooked it in his revelation, and nowhere delivered it in the neat package in which our brethren tie it up and pass it across the counter to aliens. They must search around and dig about in the scriptures to find the verses that fit, and the pile of passages they reject in the process is a lot larger than the little one which validates the steps. It might be all right to pick out the kernels and discard the shells, except for one thing. No part of God’s revelation is husk or shell and the word of God is not nuts! Why not read that last sentence again?

The “plan of salvation” has been contrived by human ingenuity and nailed together by men. They have lifted a passage from Matthew, another from Luke, a few from Acts, and a goodly assortment from the epistles, and out of these have constructed the stairs to the stars which men must climb, leaving each in turn, until the last one leads smack into the new creation. But the new creation is the work of God and not of men. We can no more create ourselves the second time than we could the first. And we are not created by someone lowering a little ladder for us to climb.

That is why some of the most frustrated, unhappy, grumbling individuals on earth are “in the church.” They are frightened and insecure. They have done all they were told to do, by a preacher who is as perplexed about how to order his life as they are theirs, and yet they are uncertain and bewildered. Instead of coming into a glorious life of light and love they took the last step and were left dangling and kicking with their suspenders caught on the leg of the ladder. They are afraid to let go and let God, so they remain close to the water, trusting in their baptism rather than in the grace of our God. And when they find the same desires and lusts welling up in them as before they begin to wonder about their baptism. They can’t understand why it did not “take.” Perhaps the preacher was awkward and did not get them all the way under and left something sticking out of the water! It is a traumatic experience when you are twenty years old and are still wondering if you were ever born.

There is a tremendous difference between knowing that baptism is required and in experiencing eternal life. You could train a parrot to repeat the five steps, and if he was a particularly smart bird, he might even learn where the scriptures are found for each, but he would still be caged. And many of my brethren, instead of finding release, think they have stumbled into prison where they must work arduously or toil endlessly under the watchful eyes of the wardens, or the angels will heave them into Gehenna. Life is one continuous round of fire-fighting and it is hard for a fire-fighter on the job around the clock to take time out to be very loving!

There is another thing wrong with the staircase to salvation. It creates the impression that you hear the word of God awhile and then leave that step and move on up to faith, and then leave faith and move on up another notch to repentance. The fact is that we can never get high enough that we can quit hearing the word, and we can never leave faith for anything else.

We need to change the illustration from a ladder to an escalator. On an escalator you take one step and that places you in a position where an unseen power can lift you up to your destination. The step you take is faith, and wherever else you go, or whatever else you do, it must be done while standing on faith. It is in faith that we repent, and in faith that we are baptized. Indeed these are the responses of faith. They are faith expressing itself, faith demonstrating that it is alive and active. By grace are you saved through faith. Grace is the escalator which draws us unto God and faith is the step we take to enter grace.

ORIGIN OF THE PLAN

2. Did Walter Scott originate the idea that there were five steps?

Walter Scott, known as “the voice of the golden oracle,” truly felt that he discovered and restored the plan of salvation. Legend has it that, in an attempt to make the message clear, he appeared at a schoolhouse to announce that he would preach that night and to urge the children to carry his invitation to attend to their parents. Upon impulse he asked them to hold up the fingers of one hand, and beginning with the thumb he designated each finger by a word or phrase, and had the children memorize these.

Unfortunately for our current crop of traditionalists, Scott’s “five-finger exercise” was different than the more modern variety. He labeled the fingers faith, repentance, baptism, remission and the gift of the Holy Spirit. He contended that faith destroyed the love of sin, repentance the practice of sin, baptism the power of sin, remission the guilt of sin, and the gift of the Spirit the punishment of sin.

A corollary to this was that death, the sting of sin, would also be destroyed and the believer made free. The simplicity of it all caught fire among the humble frontier dwellers and they sometimes reduced it to a jingle which they recited or hummed to themselves at work in field or forest. This aggravated the sectarian clergy. A Methodist preacher who lost a number of members passed out word that Scott had strangled a number of them and actually drowned several of them while immersing them. Rowdy Methodists and Presbyterians gathered at the river to jeer at and ridicule those who were baptized. Frequently Scotts' horse was loosed and driven off while he was in the water, and once when he had tracked it for several miles he found it with its tail cut off.

The change in "the plan to salvation" as it is now proclaimed is very significant. We dropped a couple of items in the plan as announced by Scott and inserted a couple of others of our own choosing. In doing so we merely signalled the fact that we had lost a sense of the nature, power and consequences of sin, and the purpose and design of God in the conquest of this usurper of man's heart. In devising our "steps" we encouraged men to take them as a kind of ritualistic dance without any thought as to their relationship to the divine intention.

More and more we concentrated upon baptism as the culmination of the whole purpose of God, and while emphasizing it as the key to forgiveness, we played down that forgiveness as a free act of grace, motivated by divine love and extended in mercy as deep and boundless as the ocean. The result is that, in spite of all we said, the guilt-consciousness lingered on, and some have been baptized three or four times, not to fulfill all righteousness but to try and remove the gnawing doubt in their insecure hearts.

And the gift of the Spirit as the divine seal of promise and the guarantee of the inheritance was forgotten, and was no longer part of "the plan of salvation."

There wasn't even a rung of the remodeled ladder reserved for the Spirit, and as our developing sectarianism flowered into full-blown partisan provincialism we heard less and less of the Spirit, and men began to equate Him with the word which they read, believed and sought to understand.

To directly face up to your question it is true that Walter Scott deduced the “plan of salvation” from the scriptures, but it is not “the plan of salvation” you hear proclaimed in our revivals, which we call “gospel meetings” and which some of our more immediate progenitors called “protracted efforts.” It is hard to think of three or four night sessions as “protracted.” It is equally difficult for me to think of five nights of haranguing on the evils of orphan homes, Bible classes, individual cups, instrumental music, or the danger of world communism as a gospel meeting. Apparently we have not only changed the “plan of salvation” from the time of Walter Scott, but we have changed the content of the gospel since the days of Paul.

AN ADDED ITEM

3. Will you dare to name specifically one of the items in “the plan” which has been added without warrant?

I do not think of myself as a spiritual daredevil, and I doubt that one needs to be a “Fearless Fosdick” to point out an error. Perhaps you imply that our brethren are so entrenched in their opinions that one who questions them puts his neck in the noose. But I never forget what happened to Haman who contrived a gallows to get rid of one of God’s servants only to end up with his feet dangling and his body slowly gyrating at the end of the hemp. So I will risk naming “one of the items.” In doing so I must first issue a word of caution. A lot of brethren who are always poised to jump at any statement made by one whom they would like to see removed from the scene allow their ambition to outdistance their judgment. They assume that when one says a thing is not essential he implies that it is wrong or sinful. This does not follow at all. A thing may be innocent in itself, and devoid of evil, but when it is bound as part of a dogmatic system or divine requirement to salvation, it is clearly out of place.

This certainly applies to “the good confession” which has been hammered into place as one of the steps on the same basis as faith and repentance. I do not think God ever demanded this of an alien sinner as a condition for remission of sins in the form that it is now taught and required. I am constantly receiving tracts purporting to answer the question of what one must do to be saved. Almost invariably the answer is given, “Five things are required of the sinner,” and then they are ticked off with oral confession as the fourth in line.

Of course what our brethren have done is to construct the ladder and then look at the “blueprint” to see how they can justify it. And they have come up with some quotations which satisfy them a lot better than they do reason or scripture. One of the most familiar is Matthew 10:32. “Whosoever therefore shall confess me before men, him will I confess also before my Father which is in heaven.” To apply this to people as a prelude to coming to Christ is a wee bit ridiculous in the light of the context.

The passage occurs in conjunction with the calling and commissioning of the apostles. They were to be sent as sheep among wolves and must beware of men. They would be delivered up to councils, scourged in synagogues and brought before governors and kings for public trial.

They would be persecuted from city to city, but were not to fear those who could only kill the body. In such periods of trial those who stood firm against pressure and openly confessed their allegiance to Christ would be confessed by him before his Father. Those who weakened and recanted the faith would be denied.

It was not even necessary for one to speak in order to confess Christ under such circumstances. He might do it by his attitude or action. I have never known of a congregation asking one to “come forward” in order to “deny Christ before men.” But if it is not necessary to come forward to deny him before men it is not necessary to do so to confess him before men. If you can deny him before men by conduct and deed, you certainly can confess him thus. Our brethren are hard put when they must take a scripture like this out of context and warp it in order to get one of “the five steps of salvation.” I say this in full recognition that, in my ignorance I used to do the same thing. This passage has no reference to one who is coming to Christ. It refers to those who are in Christ and under pressure of the authorities for that very reason.

But I suspect that all of you know that the textual “trump card” for such maneuvering is Romans 10:9, 10. “If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved. For with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.”

I think a careful study will show that the apostle is not talking of a one-time pre-baptismal confession, but of the entire course of Christian conduct or life. He begins the chapter with a statement of his concern for the Jews who had a zeal for God but lacked knowledge. In their ignorance of God’s basis of justification or righteousness, which is by faith, they presumed to contrive their own method, which was by law.

The apostle then declares that Christ is the end of the law for justification unto all who believe. By his death on the cross Jesus forever banished any attempt at justification by law. Righteousness does not come by law, but by faith. Those who trust in law as the basis of righteousness are like the Jews. They are ignorant of God’s system of justification. There are but two foundations for justification— law and faith. The first is impossible, not because of the nature of law, but because of the nature of man.

Moses describes righteousness based upon law-keeping by saying, “He that doeth these things shall live by them.” This simply means that life based upon law demands perfect conformity and absolute obedience. The least infraction brings death. Any failure to comply ends life at that point. Law revives sin and man dies. It is silly to talk about being justified by faith and law at the same time, or by believing in law as the basis of justification. If you are justified by faith it cannot be by law, and vice versa.

Contrary to the justification which Moses described, the righteousness of faith is not based upon human effort or accomplishment. One does not need to go anywhere or see anything in order to believe. He does not need to ascend into heaven and bring Christ down from above. He does not need to go down into the abyss to raise up Christ from the dead. He has the testimony at hand. It is near to him and available unto him. It requires no further miracle to confirm it but is already in his mouth and in his heart, internal and external, a subject of conviction and communication.

The word of faith which has been proclaimed is sufficient to cause one to believe in his heart that God raised Jesus from the dead. It is sufficient also to prompt him to confess that Jesus is Lord. No further ascension or descension of Jesus is required. It is not essential to faith that we produce Jesus, either by going up after him, or by going down after him. It is only necessary that we proclaim him, impelled by our inner faith.

The word for confess is homologeō. It means to assent to, or verbally endorse what another has said. Literally, it is to speak that which agrees with what another affirms or maintains. In this instance it is the expression of agreement with what God declares is true. Thus, it does not contemplate here a formal repetition of a statement or sentence, but of a constant testimony of acquiescence with God's wonderful revelation concerning Jesus.

It is helpful to remember that the word for confession is the same as the word for profession. A man's profession is not his oath of office but his vocation. It is used of Timothy who "professed a good profession before many witnesses," and of Jesus, "who before Pontius Pilate witnessed a good confession" (1 Timothy 6:12, 13). Certainly, neither of these were alien sinners as our brethren designate those who have not made "the good confession." The word is found in Hebrews 3:1, where Christ is designated "the Apostle and High Priest of our profession." Whatever is involved in our profession as Christians is included in our confession. It is not what we say or do to become Christians but what we say and do as Christians.

Albert Barnes, in commenting upon Romans 10:9, says, "A profession of religion then denotes a public declaration of our agreement with what God has declared, and extends to all his declarations about our lost estate, our sin, and need of a Savior; to his doctrines about his own nature, holiness and law; about the Savior and Holy Spirit; about the necessity of a change of heart and holiness of life; and about the grave and the judgment; about heaven and hell."

There is nothing in the scriptures about a ritualistic or formal "confession" as a step into the fellowship of God's Son. I have known preachers who would privately convince a man that Jesus was the Son of God and when the man testified to his desire to be immersed because of his acceptance of that fact, they would still have him "come down the aisle" and taking him by the hand, would ask him a question which he had already answered in their presence, "Do you believe with all your heart that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God?" And they thought this was essential as a preliminary to baptism.

Once, a man who by virtue of his study and meditation, reached the conclusion that he should be immersed, wrote to a preacher and asked if he would meet him at the church building at 9:00 a.m. on Monday and baptize him. The man wrote, "I am so thoroughly convinced that Jesus is the Son of God that I simply must obey him as Lord of my life." The two of them met at the appointed time and the preacher suggested prayer. After they had prayed he said to the lone individual, "Will you please stand?" Taking him by the hand, he fastened his eyes upon him and said, "Do you believe with all of your heart that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God"? Puzzled, the man replied, "Why, didn't you get my letter?"

It will be hard for you to believe that I have actually heard people argue that before you can "take the confession" you must have more than one witness present because the book says, "Whosoever shall confess me before men" and men is a plural word. In the light of the context which shows that Jesus is talking about the testimony of his apostles this is ridiculous and absurd.

THE ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH

4. Did not Philip require the eunuch to make the confession before he would baptize him according to Acts 8:37?

Certainly not! You are reading back into the account a procedure which we have devised. Do not let that throw you. It is a common practice among the brethren who must validate what they do by "the pattern" even if they have to invent the pattern.

In the first place the verse to which you refer is not found in the majority of the Greek manuscripts. It is omitted in the oldest extant copies. It is wanting in the Ethiopian and Syrian versions and is rejected by the ablest critical scholars. This does not mean that what it states is not valid but it certainly means that one cannot honestly base a requirement or practice upon it and make it “a condition of salvation.”

But even if the passage was written by Luke it still does not bear out the use to which we have often put it. Philip did not require, request or demand “a confession” of the treasurer. When the man pointed to the water which they were approaching and asked what hindrance there might be to his immersion, Philip simply stated that the only requisite condition was a firm conviction of heart in the Jesus whom he had proclaimed.

If the verse, the insertion of which is questionable, was recorded by Luke, the man merely replied with a statement that he believed that Jesus was the Son of God. If the verse was not written by Luke, the man just stopped the horses and went down into the water with Philip. In either event, the idea of a formal confession as a step in a “plan of salvation” is not in the account and nothing would have surprised Luke or Philip more than to learn that we thought it was. One of our tracts would have really confused them when they learned that we were crediting our traditional position to what they said and did.

We are only instructed to immerse believers, and if one presents himself to us for baptism and we are not sure if he believes we ought to enquire of him about the matter. His statement of faith is not for the benefit of God who can read his heart, nor for the benefit of the candidate who knows his own feeling in the matter. It is only for the information of the immerser. Certainly if, through long association and counselling, I am aware of the deep conviction of a person, it is not necessary for me to solemnly intone a question and elicit a stereotyped reply, designated “the good confession.”

This is not saying there is anything wrong or sinful about asking one to affirm his faith in the presence of others. All of us ought to do that every time an appropriate season is presented for so doing. But we need to keep this in proper perspective and not make of it a stilted and precisian performance for candidates for baptism. Surely we need to quit twisting the scriptures to conform to our practice and then labeling the procedure “the divine plan of salvation.”

INVITATION HYMNS

5. Would you make a comment about our practice of singing invitation hymns at the close of a service?

I will because you have asked me to do it, but I am not overly anxious to do so. It is so much a part of our hallowed tradition that to say anything derogatory about the practice is about the same as talking against motherhood and apple pie. I will never forget a good brother and sister in Arkansas who walked out on the congregation and refused to have anything further to do with the brethren. He explained their action to me. “They brought in one of these young preachers from college who was too big for his breeches and had no respect for God’s word. We didn’t like him from the first, but the last straw was when he omitted the invitation song one Sunday morning because there was no outsiders present. We just couldn’t stand such disrespect for the teaching of the Book, so we up and quit.”

Of course, the practice of singing an invitation song addressed to any sinners who may be “within the sound of our voice” is wholly without scriptural foundation. As our brethren fondly recite about other things, “It has neither command, apostolic precedent, nor logical inference to justify it.” Fortunately no one has jumped on it as a ground for division and we are not troubled by radio attacks on the matter.

The practice is cultural, or was! I suspect the culture has outgrown it, but it frequently happens that the culture changes while the brethren do not. We still had a hitching-rail around the meetinghouse where I attended as a lad for years after everyone had quit driving horses. Fortunately for us, but unfortunately for her, a nervous sister backed their new Buick into it one Sunday and knocked down a couple of rods of it, and no one ever put it back again, so we didn't have to crawl under it to get to "the place of worship." It just occurred to me now that a lot of older brethren pronounced it "warship" which was a more appropriate designation when we had an occasional business meeting.

The invitation hymn is an outgrowth of the great revival on the American frontier, and was popularized by Moody and Sankey. "Coming down the aisle" is the restoration movement substitute for heading for the mourner's bench, or "penitent form" as our British brethren refer to it. In tabernacle meetings held by others it was called "hitting the sawdust trail." We are trying to do what Billy Graham does when he has the audience stand and sing, "Just As I Am" and pleads with people to "Get up, come down and stand here in front as a testimony of your faith." We are not getting as many to leave their seats as he does, but then he preaches about Jesus, while we proclaim the Good News that it is wrong to have Bible Classes or to support Herald of Truth.

I've often wondered how Paul and Silas would react if they dropped in on us some Sunday morning. They would not recognize what takes place as having any relationship on earth to anything they had ever seen before. For one thing they would not be called upon to participate. The elders who "guard the flock" and "watch for our souls as they that must give account," could not afford to allow a man to speak who circumcised a young man so he could have influence with Jews, much less one who said he spoke in tongues more than anyone else who claimed the gift. Someone would be sure to ask them if they "fellowshipped" Pat Boone.

I suspect one thing that would really surprise them would be to see the whole audience interrupt their praise rendered to God to jump up and start singing to sinners in broad daylight, “Why Not Tonight?” What a sight it would be for the apostles to attend one of those meetings where the preacher wiped sweat and paced back and forth pleading, cajoling and exhorting, running down the aisle, putting on the emotional pressure, pausing after every verse to beg those who were present to come now.

It hardly seems necessary for an obstetrician to beg and exhort a baby to be born and to come on into the world, when he is in the delivery room. It would appear that when one has come to the birth that he will arrive even if the doctor himself is not ready! Apparently those that are begotten of the Spirit are only delivered after hard labor, but the labor is not on the part of the baby or Jerusalem from above, the mother of us all, but upon the part of the doctor called in as a specialist to induce birth.

I do not entertain any great hope that our practice will be changed. We have made “conversion” an institutional project and an assembly-line production with plans drawn up in a lovely office complex. We have reversed the Savior’s directive for us to “go into all the world,” until we now invite the world to “come to church.” What we designate “personal work” is more an attempt to get men and women to attend meetings than to know the Lord. We spend our time telling those who look out of a crack in the door about the qualifications of the preacher rather than about the Lord of glory. I doubt we will change! Tradition is not easily overcome.

A Growing Army

Mission Messenger (July 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

I have been corresponding recently with a number of young preaching brethren whose names I cannot divulge. To do that would be like bestowing the kiss of death in some circles. They are having a difficult time remaining in the places where their lot has been cast because they have outgrown spiritually and intellectually the factional garments issued to them by the party commissary when they graduated from college. They are chafing at the sectarian restraints placed upon them by brethren who claim to be non-sectarian. They want to get on with the job of promoting the bonds of peace in which the unity of the Spirit is to be kept, and, like Jeremiah, they are “weary from holding in.”

I suspect that I am of small comfort to some of these “precocious neophytes” as one good brother has named those within a certain segment, because I counsel them to remain where they are and to continue to share with the brethren with whom they have labored. We must not “come out from among them” and start another faction. We have too many factions now and it is hardly the way to prove our faithfulness to Christ by creating an additional “loyal sect.” There is not a disloyal sect in the whole lot if we may trust the testimony of each in favor of itself. It is as Solomon wrote, “Many a man proclaims his own loyalty, but a faithful man who can find?” (Proverbs 20:6).

It is tragic that brethren get their opinions mixed up with God's revelation, but it has always been so, and those who can tell the difference are always in a predicament when they must work among those who value tradition above truth. Barton W. Stone once wrote, "The doctrines of the Bible, we believe, have never divided Christians, but human opinions of those doctrines without charity have always done the mischief." And Frederick D. Kershner said, "I have lived long enough to know the fallibility of knowledge and the infallibility of love." I like that statement!

The best thing about the current dissatisfaction with the status quo is that it is not limited to one party. If it were this would betoken discontent with some particular point of factional emphasis. As it is, the brethren are identified with every faction. The revolt against the sectarian stagnation is not directed against a partisan issue, but against the whole divided and divisive philosophy which fragments God's children into hostile tribes and sets them in array against one another.

The spirit of brotherhood is proving to be more powerful than the worldly and sensual power of schism. Brethren are no longer being hoodwinked by front men and promoters who peddle division as the prescription for divine approval. In spite of blatant assaults by the guardians of orthodoxy there are those who dare to do their own thinking, refusing either to be bought off or scared off. It is not that they have it in for "the old guard" but that they no longer buy what they are guarding. They realize that the sectarian bill of goods which has been palmed off on men as "the Lord's will" never was the will of God, and is not now.

I predict that more and more men will choose to be free in Christ Jesus and to exhibit their liberty by crossing back and forth over the silly barriers erected by debates over trivia. The day is fast passing when men will be deterred by dogmata directed at them from some partisan headquarters. Many of the “big guns” which have been accustomed to having men lie down and play dead when they have directed a barrage at them will find that fear of their reprisals no longer exists.

Brethren are thinking and acting for themselves and for Christ Jesus without first clearing things with the party “powers that be.” We are on our way out of the sectarian swamps in which we have been wading and wallowing and tomorrow will be better than today. Wounds will be healed, schisms overcome, and reconciliation established. When it comes a great deal of credit should go to young men and women who love Jesus more than party popularity!

I owe a debt to many of them. They have strengthened my faith and renewed my courage. Above everything else, they have helped me to form better value judgments, and to put first things first. God bless them!

Questions About Baptism

Mission Messenger (August 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

*“There is no reason why those who advocate justification by faith alone should hesitate to admit that baptism is an antecedent to the granting of that blessing to faith. It would not be adding another condition to faith, but simply determining whether the candidate’s faith fills out the required measure. That the faith of a man should be measured before it is reckoned for righteousness, is a perfectly natural and necessary procedure, growing out of the fact that justification is not by faith simply, but by an adequate faith.”— N. J. Aylsworth in Moral and Spiritual Aspects of Baptism.*

I am going to tender an apology to our regular readers for interrupting our routine to insert another article dealing with my concept of baptism and its relation to citizenship in the kingdom of heaven upon earth. My previous articles on the theme appearing in the May and June issues, produced a mixed reaction and stimulated a number of questions. I have neither the time nor space, and hardly the inclination, to deal with all of these. I am going to make one exception because I think it is important that I do so and place myself on record before this journal breathes its last and expires in 1975.

One particular blessing accruing from editing MISSION MESSENGER has been the forming of friendships with eminent Biblical students outside of our specific background. These associations I cherish because of their impact upon my own thinking. For example, there is a professor of theology in a Biblical Seminary, known throughout the world, who has been a reader of the paper for a number of years. A writer of renown, his literary compositions have often forced me to examine afresh my own convictions.

After my first article on baptism he was prompted to write me a letter which I shall reproduce herewith. At first I thought of making a personal reply, but after meditation upon the matter I reached the decision that I owed it to all of my readers to share my views. This brief preliminary statement will serve to explain the reason for this issue and the inclusion of the letter which follows.

Dear Brother Ketcherside:

Frequently on reading the MISSION MESSENGER, I feel like sending a note either of appreciation or of enquiry: as I gain increasing awareness of some of the specific dimensions of the radical Campbellite movement, I also have new questions of information to ask.

Your major text in the May 1973 issue prompts me to ask simply one question of clarification. The extended discussion of those who are “begotten but not born” or who sincerely believe but are not immersed, is not tested by asking which categories of persons it would apply to. The image of conception as contrasted with birth, and phrases like “not yet baptized” would of course point to a person just recently responding to the Gospel.

What I am not clear on is several other categories of unbaptized believers. Since your position in general is more open than that of those with whom you have to argue most of the time, I hesitate to guess what you would believe.

One category would be persons within specific denominational traditions who, on the ground of the best scriptural understandings available in their own experience, and often in connection with a concern to correct some abuse of past dominant sacramental practice, would not use the outward symbols at all. The Salvation Army and the Friends would be the best examples. The other category would be those who, also on the basis of the best scriptural understandings available to them do not in the practice of the baptism of believers in water use a form which corresponds to your convictions.

One question which it would be helpful to see you respond to is simply whether these two classes are the same: i.e., whether the use of water in an outward ceremony to testify to the faith obedience of the believer is any good at all in your eyes if it is not done in the correct form. But the larger question is whether there is some active sense in which you can refer to such persons as brethren in a reality that you can relate to, or whether they can only be left through the loophole of being “brothers in prospect” who might by the grace of God be saved by virtue of the intent rather than the deed. . . .

REPLY TO ABOVE

It is in order, I think, to point out that the primary movement of “the radical Campbellite movement” (my friend uses the word “radical” in a good sense, I am sure) is away from the views and expositions of Thomas and Alexander Campbell. In no other field is this more observable than in the way we should regard sincere believers who have not seen the need for immersion as a validating or appropriating act of faith.

There is a very real question, I suspect, whether our brethren should be longer regarded as a part of the restoration movement launched primarily by pious Presbyterians, some 175 years ago. They have renounced many of the principles and repudiated virtually all of the attitudes characteristic of the pioneers. Even worse, they have excluded posthumously all of the fathers of the movement by driving out their present-day successors for advocacy of the very things enunciated by the fathers. Can a people maintain tenuous historical links with a movement while berating as heresy the very principles which gave birth to it? Can a state of fellowship be maintained with brethren of yesteryear while making tests of fellowship out of the very ideas they promulgated?

My friend and brother proposes some good questions which my position obligates me to try and answer. What shall be my attitude toward sincere men and women who have been reared in a denominational tradition which rejects all outward symbols and formal ordinances as having no vital relationship to a spiritual walk with God? Is there some active sense in which I can refer to such persons as brethren in a reality to which I can relate?

The Society of Friends has been suggested as an example. Let me first of all express my deep appreciation for those who are a part of the Quaker heritage. I give grateful thanks to the Father for every ministration of good which they accomplish, and certainly their influence has been a leaven for peace in many parts of the world. I freely confess that I have never been the same since reading the journal of John Woolman.

But, having said this, I must add that, as I view God's purpose for our lives, the Friends are seriously in error, and their error is precisely the kind which will keep them from obeying a plain requirement of the Lord Jesus Christ. It is admitted by them that most professors of the Christian name regard water baptism as "the essential means of initiation into the church of Christ." Why do they reject it? First, they have become convinced that only the redeeming power inwardly revealed, can set the soul free from the thralldom of sin.

Secondly, they hold that as there is one Lord and one faith, the one baptism in nature and operation is a divinely-administered unction within and that only this internal action can make a living member of the mystical body. Accordingly, baptism in water belonged to an inferior dispensation as its original administrator, John, indicated in John 3:30.

I have striven to be absolutely fair in presenting the position occupied by the Friends. I would gain nothing by misrepresentation. Although they accord the title “word of God” only to Christ and not to the Scriptures, they regard the latter as having been given forth by the Spirit and as binding upon every Christian. It is from the scriptures they have learned that John baptized in water, but the same scriptures teach that baptism in water did not cease with John.

After his resurrection, Jesus commissioned his apostles to enroll students or disciples from all nations, baptizing them into the name of the Godhood, and one of these apostles, several years after Jesus had ascended to the Father, asked who could forbid water that certain ones should not be baptized who had received the Holy Spirit as indicative of the reception of the Gentiles by God.

When Jesus commissioned the apostles to baptize he did so upon the basis that all authority had been conferred upon him in heaven and upon earth, and when the apostle baptized those to whom we have alluded, he did so on the basis of the word “which was published throughout all Judea, and began from Galilee, after the baptism which John preached” (Acts 10:37). The view that baptism in water was limited to an inferior dispensation is not taught in God’s word.

In John 3:30 the matter under consideration is not the inferiority of water baptism to baptism in the Spirit, but the relative inferiority of one who was of the earth fulfilling a preparatory work of introduction and one who came down from heaven and who was above all. Baptism in water was perfectly adapted to the purpose it was ordained to accomplish and in this respect could not be inferior to anything not ordained for that purpose.

The Quakers are sadly misled by their assumption that baptism and the Lord's Supper are mere ceremonials and therefore have no efficacy in conveying the blessings of God. On the contrary, a careful study of the scriptures will show that the Creator has universally bestowed his blessings through ordinances, and one could safely affirm that this has been his invariable procedure as well, in both the natural and spiritual realms.

Our brother intimates that the deep aversion to the ordinances may result from "a concern to correct some abuse of past dominant sacramental practice." I doubt not that the undue emphasis on ritual and liturgy which often results in empty formalism devoid of the Spirit, has had a great deal to do with formulation of the position I am examining, but the answer to abuse of what God has ordained is not abandonment, but correction of it. The will of God is not revered by forsaking the ordinances because others make a fetish of them. It is as wrong to flout them as it is to flaunt them.

Jesus is my Lord, and he conveys his will for my life, not through visions, dreams or subjective inner light, but through the word of his chosen envoys. From them I learn that penitent believers are to be baptized unto the forgiveness of sins and into the wonderful relationship signified by the glorious triune name of the Godhood. The record is clear. "For you are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ" (Galatians 3:26, 27).

If a member of the Society of Friends had been with Peter at the home of Cornelius when Peter asked if any man could forbid water that these should not be baptized, to be consistent the Friend would have had to forbid it. If I went today to a meeting of Friends and asked them to baptize me upon a profession of my faith in Christ Jesus they could not and would not do it. If I said, "See, here is water, what doth hinder me to be baptized?" they would propose any number of doctrinal hindrances and barriers.

Much as I deplore what may seem to many the manifestation of an uncharitable attitude toward a people renowned for their gentle goodness, I freely acknowledge that, upon the basis of my understanding of the teaching of God's precious word, the Quakers are not in the fellowship of the called-out ones. They may have heard the invitation to become citizens of the kingdom, but they have not responded to it in the manner prescribed by the King.

I have thus far dealt with the "denominational tradition" which has created the specific party known as the Society of Friends. But I am asked about persons within that tradition "who on the ground of the best scriptural understandings available in their own experience . . . would not use the outward symbols at all."

I make a distinction here between a sect, and individual members who are caught up within it, perhaps from birth, or because of circumstances arising from the vicissitudes of life. One can be a sectarian and not be identified with a sect, and one can be in a sect and not be sectarian. In the final judgment God will not be judging sects but individuals. Thus, all of us, whether in sects or not, are individually responsible before God and accountable unto him.

Responsibility is conditioned upon three bases according to the scriptures. One is accountable for what he knows and will not do; for what he could know and refuses to learn; and for what he professes to know and will not practice. All of these have to do with the exercise of will, for will is the determinant factor in life. One will not be damned because of ignorance unless it is wilful and voluntary, else heaven would be useless and without an inhabitant, since all of us are ignorant about many things.

Those who are in the Quaker tradition will not be judged as Quakers, but as individuals for whom Christ died. God judges no one as a Pharisee, Republican, Democrat, Socialist, Methodist or Presbyterian. Religious parties, like political parties, are created by men and not by God. They are all artificial and without power to save. God has promised salvation from past sins upon the basis of belief in the good news about Jesus and baptism as a validation of such faith. Certainly one cannot be expected to believe in one of whom he has never heard, nor can he be expected to obey a command which he has never learned.

Whether he could have heard and learned, only God can know. There are degrees of responsibility and only an infinite mind can determine the extent of responsibility at any given time. It does not at all disturb me to think that many pious individuals who love God and their fellowmen within a “denominational tradition” will walk the golden streets. I do not limit the grace of God, nor seek to frustrate it. But I intend to continue to disclose what I believe Jesus has taught without compromise, and I intend to implement it by my obedience to the full extent of my feeble knowledge and ability. I also intend to oppose all sectarianism, including our own.

I am not asked to determine the final destiny of man, nor called upon to decide with whom I shall associate in heaven. I am under divine compulsion to recognize the terms of citizenship for the kingdom of heaven upon earth as I understand them. I am not authorized to enlarge the borders of Zion nor to restrict them. That is the prerogative of the king and I am but a subject, a very weak and unprofitable servant. It is my understanding that the King has decreed that the terms of citizenship involve a pledge of allegiance unto his sovereignty and immersion into his death.

I reject no one because he is a Quaker, for that would be sectarian. I regard one as not being in the fellowship of the saints simply because he has not complied with the terms. If the rights and privileges of citizenship are accorded to those who have not complied with the terms, both the terms and the citizenship become meaningless. The quickest way to destroy that which the right of franchise is expected to protect is by extending it to those who are not citizens. Of what value is a false charity which destroys the rights of those who have obeyed the King by extending them to those who have not? Pardon and amnesty beyond the limits prescribed by the King belong not to the subjects but to the King, and if his is a universal sway he may have mercy upon whom he will have mercy.

Any exception to a general rule given by authority must, by its very nature, be specific, and must be made by the same authority which gave the rule. The rule governing salvation from past transgressions is that men hear the good news concerning what God has done for us through Jesus, trust in that, and be immersed upon the basis of that faith. We must operate under that rule. We can make no exceptions, for to do so, would be to appropriate the authority of Jesus. But he can make exceptions, for His will is sovereign. All authority is given unto him on heaven and on earth. He can suspend the requirements in any specific situation, but we cannot.

To say this does not weaken the authority of the King. It does not abrogate the authority of his revelation. It enhances and increases his authority. His authority is so great and majestic that it cannot be bound or inhibited by any rules, regulations or terms, not even those which he has given for the general good of mankind. No man denies the authority of the scriptures who respects that authority for his own life and urges it upon others, while leaving the final disposition in the hands of him who is the source and fountain of the authority. We need to be careful that in defending the authority of the scriptures we do not deny the authority of him who is above all and over all!

ANOTHER CATEGORY

In the plainest of terms, I am now asked about my relationship to those who have had water sprinkled or poured upon them. My brother speaks kindly of them as using a form which does not correspond to my convictions “on the basis of the best scriptural understanding available to them.”

I could bluntly and callously say that such practice is not scriptural understanding at all, but unscriptural misunderstanding, and dismiss them. However, being caught up in the human predicament as I am, I want to avoid such arrogance and bluster. I have a very real compassion for all who seek to do the will of my Father, and their lack of understanding of that will, as I understand it, will not deaden that concern. I admit that I am placed in a quandary by the expression “the best scriptural understandings available to them.”

In this fortunate land where a copy of the new covenant scriptures may be purchased for a few cents and where the Bible is a perennial best-seller, it would appear that everyone has access to God’s revelation and there really is no excuse. But then I remember that there is a great deal of difference between having a Bible in reach of your hand and having scriptural understanding. Printing Bibles is a purely mechanical process. They can be produced by the millions and everyone look and read just alike. But human understanding is not the product of a machine.

No one studies in a vacuum. No one reasons in isolation from his past or present. We approach the scriptures from where we are intellectually, because there is no other place from which to approach them. And no two of us start from the same place. I wonder how I would regard baptism if I had been reared in a Quaker community, and never heard another explanation given except the orthodox position of the Friends. I do not have so much difficulty about sprinkling because one side of my family heritage was Missouri Synod Lutheran, and I was sprinkled before I had attained the ripe age of one month.

Regardless of what else may be said about it, sprinkling or pouring do not constitute baptism in the scriptural context. When I speak of baptism I must mean the same thing Jesus and the apostles meant when they spoke of it, else my words have no relationship to the scriptural content. If I use a word they used but mean something else than they meant, I am either deceived or a deceiver. In spite of debates and controversies which may arise as men attempt to justify their respective practices. I must transcend the semantical disputes and seek to understand the mind of God as it was revealed through the Spirit.

If baptism, as Jesus employed the term, meant a burial or immersion, it follows that one who has not been immersed has not been baptized. Whatever “form” may be used, it is not baptism. My own study has convinced me that baptism is a burial, and this view appears to me to be undeniably sustained by etymology, philology, example, symbolism and scripture. I was not baptized at all when I was twenty-nine days old. The “form” which was used was not baptism, but something else.

Therefore, as cruel as it may appear to a modern and vacillating world, I do not consider those who have used a form unauthorized by Jesus, unsanctioned by the Spirit, and unknown to the apostles, as being in the fellowship of the congregation of saints. When torn between the longing to receive all people who profess a love for my Lord, and of remaining true to him according to my understanding, the matter was settled not when the question arose, but when I pledged my full and complete allegiance unto him!

I do not regard baptism as simply an outward ceremony. I do not think of it as a mere sign. That it is a sign and a ceremony no thoughtful person can deny. But it is not something portraying a reality from which it is divorced, perhaps by time and place. Rather it is itself the actual participation with Christ Jesus in the fact of his death and in the fact of his resurrection. As I view it, baptism is not simply an engagement ring, or a wedding ring, a visible token of heartfelt affection, but it is the consummation of a relationship to which one has looked forward with supreme desire. It is obvious that two people can become one without a ring, but can they become one flesh without the act of union, without the initial act of consummation?

The apostle who once persecuted and even killed believers until he met Jesus on the Damascus Road, points out that we are all the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus. But he does not stop with that. He immediately adds a “for” statement, an explanation of how and when it happens or transpires. “For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ.” It is in baptism, then, that my faith becomes operational with reference to divine sonship. Shall I add to the statement another of my own, “and as many of you as have not been baptized into Christ have also put him on”? Will not the human addition negate and nullify the point made by the Spirit?

The gospel consists of testimony to the seven great facts related to the life of the One in whom there dwelt all the fulness of the Godhood bodily. Three of these are saving facts— the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus. But they cannot save by the simple fact of their historicity, else all men will be saved by the mere transaction of two-thousand years ago, and all discussion of forms of acceptance is useless. They must be believed, accepted, and appropriated. One must identify with Jesus personally. Just as Jesus came in a body to identify with man, so man must come into the body of Jesus to identify with him.

What Jesus did for all men that they might be saved each man must do for Jesus that he may be saved. This means that to appropriate the sacrifice of Jesus unto himself, a man must die, be buried and rise again to walk in newness of life. That he does this in baptism is evident from the testimony of the new covenant scriptures in Romans 6:3-6. Jesus died, was buried, and rose again according to the old covenant scriptures, and I must die, be buried and rise again, according to the new covenant scriptures.

Any refusal upon the part of Jesus to die for my sins, to be buried in the tomb, or to rise from the dead, would have left me in sin. He had power to lay down his life, and he had power to take it again (John 10:18). Any refusal upon my part to die to my sins, to be buried in baptism, and to rise with Christ, will leave me in my sins. I also have power to lay down my life and I have power to take it again through the Lord Jesus Christ.

To me, therefore, baptism is more than a sign that something has happened, or is happening in me, or in my behalf. It is the very act appointed by God in which and by which, I appropriate the forgiveness through grace by personal identification with Christ. The cross of Christ is a symbol of sacrifice and divine mercy, but it is much more than that. It was the actual instrument by which death came to the Son of God. And so my death by crucifixion and my burial in the watery grave becomes a sign after the act. At the time of my surrender it is the instrument of identification.

THE LARGER QUESTION

I am aware of the larger question. It results from the attempts of men to creedalize and institutionalize the faith once delivered. It is post-apostolic, for while the germ infected the body even in the day of the special envoys, it had not yet developed in all of its inflammatory aspects. I do not know, therefore, how they would have treated it, or regarded all those who have been made victims of its contagion or septicity.

Certainly the apostles warned against allowing it to become endemic, but the prescription for prevention is one thing while the treatment of a developed disorder is another thing. We now face sectism in all of its divisiveness and fragmentation. If we love those afflicted we cannot ignore them, nor form an isolated enclave to which we can retire in monastic seclusion while we simply mark off those who are outside our whitewashed compounds.

“The larger question is whether there is some active sense in which you can refer to such persons as brethren in a reality that you can relate to.” My friend is not an outstanding professor of theology for nothing. He has placed his finger pointedly upon the sore spot which must be honestly faced by every person like myself who believes that baptism is a part of the God-ordained response to the good news about Jesus, and is the ordinance by which one enters into the relationship of the life in Christ.

I wish that I did not have to face it. I wish that I could escape or evade it. But because I must face it, I find myself more deeply opposed to the fleshly virus of sectarianism which makes it imperative that I do so. I am an inveterate foe of sectarianism for the very reason that it clouds the issue of brotherhood and fellowship. I am not so much an enemy of sects as I am of sectarianism. It is because of this that I am dedicated to a war against our own sectarianism, for recognition of brotherhood within the framework of the immersed ones is as confused by partisanship as it is beyond that pale.

Indeed, it is this confusion which militates against the power of the testimony concerning the need for an efficacy of immersion. What strength there would be in the witness for immersion if all who were immersed stood as a unit. If it is not true that we are all baptized into one body through or in the one Spirit, then why make so much of baptism? Thousands there must be who ask this question.

The “larger question” is how I must regard and how I can relate to sincere and conscientious believers in the Messiahship and Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth. I would to God that I could lead all of these whom I love into the waters of some quiet “Jordan” and baptize them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, after the example of him who said, “thus it becomes us” so to do. And yet, I would not have a one of them submit to this out of human compulsion, partisan pressure, or sublimation of personal conscience.

Here then are my conclusions. I will regard them as begotten of my Father and quickened by faith in the womb of grace. I will treat them as believers and not as pagans or heathen. I will go among them at their invitation to share any insights I may have in God’s great revelation, and I will rejoice in and encourage any deeds of kindness and mercy in which they engage for the betterment of the world and the improvement of the moral and spiritual atmosphere breathed by fallen man!

I will not conclude that all of them are bound for perdition but will allow God to judge their final destiny. His disposition of all who believe in Jesus must be according to his sovereign will and I will but attest that “his judgments are true and righteous altogether.” But to regard those who are unimmersed as having been brought into the family relationship upon the same basis as those who have been immersed would make an empty farce of immersion and the testimony of the scriptures on the matter both useless and meaningless. This I cannot do and answer to my God with a clear conscience.

Every kingdom in the universe has one uniform way by which those who are aliens can be enrolled as citizens. Such a way must be specific and it must be recognizable, else those who are citizens will not know whom to regard as sharing with them the rights and privileges accruing through citizenship. A kingdom without citizens is an anomaly. A kingdom whose citizenship is as broad as the unregenerate world is not a kingdom of the called out, but a kingdom of this world. It is a kingdom in which righteousness is not a qualification and sin is not a disqualification.

It is a denial of the universal authority of Jesus to assume that he is Lord of the house but not of the portal, of the temple but not of its gate. I eagerly beseech all who may read this humble entreaty to make your faith valid and operative this day. “And now, why tarriest thou? Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins, calling upon the name of the Lord.” May His Spirit motivate you to obey him in love and without delay. May your motto be: “Speak Lord, thy servant heareth!”

Thinking Out Loud

Mission Messenger (September 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“It has become fashionable to mock at or treat with suspicion, anything that looks like faith in the future. If we are not careful this skepticism will prove fatal, for its direct result is to destroy both the love of living and the momentum of mankind.” — Teilhard de Chardin.

Most of my readers know what it is to have a meal of “left-overs.” In our own home we have difficulty in preparing just the right amount for two persons. Our work makes it rather necessary that we be a part of the “can-opener culture,” but a lot of cans contain more than you can consume at one sitting. The result is that Nell ends up with a saucer full of this and another container full of that, until some day we get all of them out of the refrigerator and have a luncheon made up of “this and that.”

The items in such meals have little relationship to one another and would make a nutritionist or home economist wring her hands in dismay and predict an early demise for us both. But I like to “bat in the clean-up position” and I confess that sometimes the variety makes up for the lack of balance. Eating with someone you love always helps the occasion, regardless of the food.

Taking a cue from that kind of kitchen preparation I am going to serve up a potpourri of questions which have accumulated from various forums and seminars. I hope that you will not be too disappointed and that your spiritual digestion will not become upset. I can predict that a lot of readers will not be happy with the answers that I give, because I am never interested in purely traditional replies, the kind that are expected. I am concerned only that I be honest and open and tell what I personally think about things.

You will notice that I have repeated over and over that I am not seeking to bind my views or opinions upon any of you. I simply share my views, but if they cut across your thinking, I do not expect you to concur. It is not necessary that you agree with me for me to love you. And don't forget that I did not always see things as I now do. There is an old Yiddish proverb that says: "If God lived on earth, people would break his windows." It is very difficult for brethren to even tolerate someone whose thoughts differ with their own, but I am grateful to His wonderful grace and mercy that this is no longer a problem of mine.

SITUATION ETHICS

1. What do you think about "situation ethics" as advocated by Joseph Fletcher?

Boiled down and simmered away, the basis of situation ethics is that there can be no hard-and-fast rule laid down which can cover every contingency which can arise in human relationships. For this reason the ethical approach must be determined by the circumstances, and "circumstances alter cases."

In my personal encounter with Dr. Fletcher, he insisted, as he did in his book, that there are but three approaches which can be made to ethics—antinomian, legalistic, or situational. The first denies all law and each man becomes a law unto himself, with anarchy as the natural result. The second insists that the law is supreme by virtue of being law, and must take precedence over persons and their needs. In any conflict between law and human need, the dignity and sanctity of the law must be upheld regardless of the results to the person. Keeping of law thus becomes the ultimate goal of man.

I am quite convinced, although it always “knocks my brethren for a loop” to hear me say it, that God endorsed situational ethics and Jesus practiced it. For example, God gave the law that “if a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die . . . so shalt thou put away evil from Israel.” Yet he spared both David and Bathsheba and they lived together afterwards. It is true that David paid for his guilt, but the penalty of death prescribed by the written code was not enforced.

Another case in point has to do with Aaron and his sons, Eleazar and Ithamar, on the day that Nadab and Abihu were killed because of their transgression. It was necessary that the goat of sin-offering be eaten in the sacred place. Moses made a searching enquiry for it and found it had been burnt. He became very angry and assailed his brother and nephews for their misconduct. But Aaron pointed out to him what had happened to his family in the grief they had sustained, and said, “This is what has befallen me; if I eat a sin offering today, will it be right in the eyes of the Lord?” The record says, “And when Moses heard that, he was content.” Human anguish may take precedence over law.

Jesus pointed out that the divine intention was that there be one man and one woman united as one flesh, but circumstances created by the hardness of the hearts of men, forced Moses to alter the original intent and allow men to give their wives a divorce document and separate them from “bed and board.”

When Jesus was going through the fields on the sabbath, his disciples plucked heads of grain, and rubbed them between their hands to eliminate the chaff, and then ate the grain. This brought immediate criticism and condemnation from the Pharisees. But Jesus argued that human welfare was the first priority. He gave two examples of men who did that which was unlawful. David ate the presence-bread with his men, and the priests performed tasks on the sabbath within the very precincts of the temple. The conclusion was that “Man was not made for the sabbath, but the sabbath was made for man.”

All law is given for the protection and perpetuity of persons, and when the law does not cover the situation (and no law can cover every situation), the welfare of man has priority over the law. All of us are situation ethicists, even those who deny it. We practice such ethics in our homes as we rear our children. We would not scruple to drive sixty miles per hour in a thirty mile per hour zone if transporting a badly injured person to an emergency room of the hospital. We may disagree with Dr. Fletcher over some applications he makes of the principle, and I certainly do disagree with him, but this does not disprove the validity of the principle. I am in favor of it for Christians simply because I believe it is the tenor and teaching of the word of God, and in harmony with the nature of God as revealed. Notice I used the term Christians. I believe that situation ethics can only be the guiding principle for God’s children and not for the children of the darkness of this passing age. What I mean by this will become more apparent as the questioning continues.

THE RULE OF LOVE

2. Don’t you think it is dangerous to teach that the only law under which we operate and serve is love?

No, I don’t consider it dangerous, because I think that is what the Holy Spirit taught. During his earthly sojourn Jesus said that the two greatest commandments were to love God and our fellow-men. That is the difference between Jesus and a lot of preachers. They would have replied that all of the commandments were equal, since they all came from the same authority. A lot of them still argue that, even after Jesus made his statement.

Jesus said that all of the law and prophets were suspended from these two. All of them! This is another way of saying that love is basic and elemental and that all other divine rules and revelations are dependent upon and subservient to it. God decrees law and gives prophecies, but He is love! God is a lawgiver, but it is not His nature to give laws. His essence is love and whatever proceeds from God proceeds from love. And love is first and above all else, even law!

We are no longer under a law code but under grace. This means that citizens of the kingdom of heaven are not confined by law but constrained by love. Law is always external and imposed. Love is internal and impelled. It is also eternal. We love because He first loved us. Our love is a response to love. Law is a police power which keeps men together by defining limits and enforcing them; love is a magnetic power which keeps them together by holding them to a common center. Law was a custodian until faith came. Faith has come and we are no longer under a custodian. We have been set free by the grace of God! Before Jesus came as the living expression of God's love incarnate, God's love was expressed in law, but now God's law, or rule of faith and action, is expressed in love.

This is what I think the Spirit meant when he encouraged Paul to write, "Owe no man anything, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbor:

therefore love is the fulfilling of the law” (Romans 13:8-10).

A careful analysis of this is very revealing. It indicates that the extent of my obligation, responsibility and debt to all others upon earth is to be stated not in terms of law, but in terms of love. I owe this and must not owe more nor less. If I am forced to borrow money I must do it in the context of love (and love may keep me from borrowing it). When I repay it I must also do that in love. In the preceding statements I am instructed about what is due others, and I must pay taxes and custom assessments, and render reverence and honor, all with that agape which cushions life’s hardness with velvet, and oils the grinding wheels of commerce and business, as well as civic intercourse, with a lubricant which offsets heat and corrosion.

All of the commandments are summed up in love. The apostle names some of the familiar ones, but knowing the human tendency of the legalistic mind to search for exceptions, he adds, “and if there be any other commandment.” Paul says that they are all “comprehended” in the saying about loving your neighbor. The original word for “comprehended” literally means “to gather under one head.” It was used in Ephesians 1:10 where we are told that it is God’s purpose, plan and pleasure to gather all things in heaven and on earth in Christ.

But it was also used by the Greeks to indicate a summary of a speech, where all of the thoughts enunciated are collected and classified under one brief statement. The philosophers summed up their thoughts in such fashion. So Paul sums up the whole relationship we sustain to God with love. It should be remembered that we get the word “sum” from the same word from which we derive “summit.” It literally means “highest.” Thus love is not the lowest common denominator but the highest attainment possible. It is for this reason that it soars above law, as a lordly peak reaches above the plain. Paul specifically writes about the fruits of the Spirit that “there is no law dealing with such things as these.” The Spirit does not produce fruit by law but by love!

The reason why love is the ultimate is because it works no ill to another. There is no law ever given that, in some instances, does not have built-in inequities. This is the nature of law because of the varying circumstances of men in the world. It is not the weakness of law but the weakness of man that makes law imperfect. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., said, “The standards of the law are standards of general application. The law takes no account of the infinite varieties of temperament, intellect, and education, which make the internal characters of a given act so different in different men.”

There is no mercy in law, which must require and demand strict adherence or provide a penalty. Law is inexorable and unmerciful. This is true whether the law originates with God or man. “He that despised Moses’ law died without mercy under two or three witnesses.” The “law of Christ” which is a “law of liberty” is love. The commandment of Christ is that we love one another as he has loved us. And this provides for mercy.

“Speak to others and do to others as becomes those who are amenable to the law of freedom. Under this rule of action one who does not extend mercy will not receive mercy, and remember that mercy takes precedent in God’s attitude toward judgment” (James 2:12, 13). Under the previous regime, which was one based on a legalistic code, one who kept the whole law and yet stumbled in one point was guilty of all. He had violated the code and, regardless of circumstances, death was the penalty. “Thine eye shall not pity him” was the injunction.

It is amazing how many people misunderstand the implication of James, who is contrasting the royal or kingly law of love with the codified system of the Mosaic economy, and thus overlook the fact that under a law of liberty we are free to minister mercy and must do so if we are to receive mercy. Mercy is never required when man keeps law to a perfect degree. It is only shown when men are failures as judged by the law. On this basis we all need it.

William Barclay points out that the Christian is self-governed and self-directed by the love which dwells in his heart. He writes, “He follows the right way, the way of love to God and love to men, not because any external law compels him to do so, and not because any threat of punishment frightens him into doing so, but because the love of Christ which is in his heart makes him desire to do so.” I concur with that, although I find it one of the most difficult routes one can take in the flesh. I do not believe that one can ever do it merely upon his own strength or under his own power.

REPEAL OF LAWS

3. Do you suggest that we repeal all laws in the world and allow love to be the only consideration?

Of course not! I am not saying we should repeal any laws in the world. I am simply saying that in the body of Christ, love is the only law in the absolute. The love of which I speak is agape, and it is a gift of God, poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit. Those who are out of Christ must be subject to laws, or there can be no social structure. Such laws are not needed and are not made for those who have put on Christ as a garment and who have come to trust in his righteousness. Until we receive Christ as God’s gift of love we cannot receive love as God’s gift through Christ!

Paul asserts that it should be a matter of common knowledge that “the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for manslayers, for whoremongers, for homosexuals, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be anything else that is contrary to sound teaching.” My brethren who claim they are under law have placed themselves in the company of a motley group, but maybe they know more about themselves than I do.

It is here that Joseph Fletcher is in error with regard to “situation ethics.” This is probably caused by his humanistic philosophy. Love can never become the dynamic for those out of Christ, because they walk in the flesh and not in the Spirit. And those who live after the flesh will die. They are the unrighteous, those who have chosen not to accept Christ as their hope, but are motivated by all that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life. Love is not the universal rule of action for the unregenerate world but for the kingdom of God’s dear Son. It is effective only in a theocracy and can never be in a democracy.

Those who are dead and whose life is hid with Christ in God, who are no longer children of disobedience but have put off the old man with his deeds, are the ones who are told above everything else to put on love, which is the very seal of perfection. They have donned the new man and are renewed in knowledge after the image of God who created them. They are no longer under the dominion of sin and for that reason are not under the reign of law. They have begun in the Spirit and are free from fleshly domination, because those who are Christ’s have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts.

Nothing is clearer than the fact that those who walk in the Spirit have been delivered from the whole domain of law. Indeed, the apostle says, after he has listed the entire catalogue of the fruits of the Spirit, “In this area there is no law.” He bolsters his declaration that “If you are led by the Spirit you are not under law” (Gal. 5:18). Again, “For sin shall not have dominion over you, for you are not under law but under grace” (Romans 6:14). Sin rules over those who are under law, and they are under law precisely because sin rules over them. Sin takes occasion by the legal commandment to deceive and slay them.

UNDER LAW TO CHRIST

4. What you say about this really troubles me because we are plainly told that we are not without law to God, but are under law to Christ. How do you reconcile this with your views?

First, you must remember that when I talk about being delivered from law, I mean that we are not under a written code. We are not amenable to a statute-book as were God's people before the coming of the Messiah. I do not mean that we are not subject to Christ for he is the very Lord of life. I do not mean that we are at liberty to sin for such liberty would be license. We are free in Christ, not free from Christ.

But the new covenant of God is not what men call "The New Testament." The new testament, or covenant, of God was not written with pen and ink at all. The epistle of Christ, ministered by the apostles was written on the hearts of believers with the Spirit. "You are plainly affirmed to be the letter of Christ by our service, and this letter was not written with ink but with the Spirit of the living God, not on tablets of stone, but on the tablets of human hearts" (2 Cor. 3:3).

In view of this Paul writes, "We are granted ability by God, who has also made us capable of ministering the new covenant, which is not a written code but a spiritual bond, for a written code produces death, while the Spirit produces life" (2 Cor. 3:6).

"Now we are freed from the bondage of the law, since the law which once bound us has died, and this freedom makes us able to serve under a spiritual bond and not under the old domination of a written code" (Romans 7:6). Regardless of what Paul may have meant by the expression "under law to Christ," he certainly did not refer to a written code or compilation of statutes set down with pen and ink.

The new covenant scriptures do not constitute such a compilation of laws, statutes and judgments. They represent the thoughts of God exposed and not the will of God imposed. In order to observe them we must have “the mind of Christ” and this means allowing the word of Christ to dwell in us richly in all things.

The new covenant in Christ and the relationship to the covenant is a personal matter. Jesus is our covenant. The promise of God in the prophetic message was, “I the Lord have called thee in righteousness, and will hold thine hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant to the people, for a light to the Gentiles” (Isa. 42:6). Again, “Thus saith the Lord, In an acceptable time I have heard thee, and in a day of salvation have I helped thee: and I will preserve thee, and give thee for a covenant to the people” (Isa. 49:8).

To be under the law to Christ is to be in Christ and under his lordship. This means an abdication of the human will to the will of God. It requires a hauling down of the flag of self and the surrender of the fortress of the heart to a new captain. He occupies the throne room of the inner man. He becomes the master to whom one stands or falls. God’s law is in the mind. It is written on the heart. It is not the engraving of the finger of God on tablets of stone, or the inditing of precepts with pen and ink, but the writing of the name of Christ on the walls of the heart, so that “whatever you do in word or deed is done in his name.” Praise God for that name which is above every name. Thank God it is written in the chambers of my poor and unworthy heart.

This makes it possible to say, “I delight in the law of God after the inward man.” And again, “With the mind I myself serve the law of God.” This is distinctly called “the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus” (Romans 8:2). That means just what it says. Our law is the Spirit of life! Those who are hooked on the written code concept of law, assume that even such mention of the word “law” refers to the letters constituting the new covenant scriptures. But these are not a law. They are a compilation of love letters written to congregations and individuals who were in the covenant. These brethren were not in the covenant because they had these letters but they received the letters because they were in the covenant. Everyone of the letters was written with pen and ink on parchment or papyrus, but the man who wrote most of them, said in one of them that the new covenant was not written with ink, but with the Spirit on the tablets of human hearts.

Let me say again that the law of the Spirit of life is “the Spirit of life.” It is contrasted with the law of sin and death. The Spirit of life is now the governing principle, the rule of action, for the covenant people. In Romans 8:3, the law which was “weak through the flesh” is not superseded by another law, but by God sending his own Son in the flesh. Many of our brethren think Jesus nailed one law to the cross and handed another one down. But Jesus did not offer us another law. He offered up himself. He did not condemn sin by statute but by sacrifice of himself. When the custodian brought us to faith it did not turn us over to another custodian but to Jesus.

The result is that the righteousness at which the law aimed and which it could not achieve because of weakness is now attained by having the Spirit.

Righteousness cannot be obtained by law, even though the law is divinely-given. If God had given us another law it would have been as ineffective as the first because of our weakness. Moreover, if righteousness could be obtained by law the death of Christ was unnecessary and in vain. Now the righteousness of the law is “fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit.”

The law of God, that is, the principle of divine control over human personality, is not a written code, for such a code is always weak because of the flesh. The covenant is Christ. The inscription is in the heart. The law is the life of Christ, eternal life, and the empowering agent is the Holy Spirit. Anyone who seeks to bind man to an attempt to be righteous by conformity to a written code, regardless of origin, dooms man to eternal condemnation, for “by the works of law shall no flesh be justified.”

COMMANDMENTS OF CHRIST

5. What about the commandments of Christ which we are obligated to keep? Are these not a law, and if they are not, why not?

I think I should make a few preliminary observations because of the insistence of most of my brethren that we are under a written code and will be saved by law-keeping. This feeling is probably engendered because we are immature and spiritually adolescent. All adolescents crave for law and imposed restraint even while rebelling against it and struggling for freedom. Psychologically this stems from fear, a fear that the experiences of life thus far do not equip us to handle life on our own. A lot of God’s children get to the spiritual teenager state and halt their growth, which means that they must always suffer from the tensions and strife peculiar to this stage of development. They want to remain under “tutors and governors” and we have a lot of applicants for the job.

That is why, when God plainly states that we are not under law but under grace, a lot of brethren actually busy themselves trying to turn grace into law. We regard grace as merely another lawgiver, imposing a new written code under threat of damnation for every misunderstanding. We are frightened by freedom because freedom creates awesome responsibilities in which we must make judgmental choices and be responsible for their outcome and results. It is much easier to be responsible to the law than to be responsible under grace.

Let me now make a clear distinction between the law of Moses and the life of Christ, that is, between Deuteronomy and the Sermon on the Mount. Both contain commandments, but under the law men lived only because they kept the commandments, while in Christ we keep the commandments only because we have life, eternal life. In the Mosaic economy, men earned the right to live by strict obedience to the law; in Christ we receive the right to serve by the gift of life. We have not been called unto law, but unto liberty, and the two are antithetical to each other. Our ruling principle, our governing guide, is a “law of liberty,” that is, a principle of freedom. Our law is liberty! “For brethren you have been called unto liberty, but do not take advantage of liberty to gratify your flesh, rather by love serve one another” (Gal. 5:13).

The commandments of our Lord are guidelines for life. Because we love him we remain within the guidelines which he marked out for us by his life on earth. “If you love me, you will keep my commandments.” This is the natural, spontaneous reaction of love, for love always seeks to please its object. It does not require a list of “dos” and “don’ts” drawn up in legal form. Through the indwelling Spirit God works in us to do his will. We are not on our own to do or to die, to sink or swim! It is important to know how we should work in God, but it is no less important to know that God works in us.

This is the nature of the eternal covenant, ratified by the blood of Jesus, and validated by his resurrection from the dead. Under the terms of this agreement God covenants to empower us and furnish everything necessary to do his will. “Now the God of peace who brought back from the dead that great shepherd of the sheep, our Lord Jesus, by the blood of the everlasting covenant, equip you thoroughly for the doing of his will! May he effect in you everything that pleases him through Jesus Christ.” Wonderful!

We follow the Shepherd because we hear his voice, not because he cracks the whip. A shepherd does not lay down the law. He throws down the feed! But what the Shepherd calls feed some of my brethren call law, and because they think of it thus, some of it is hard to swallow and they choke on it. The shepherd did not come to kill or destroy. That is the work of the thief who invades the fold. Jesus said, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." Law brings dread, despair and doom; life brings light, love and long suffering.

It is important, I think, that we note the interchangeable use of the singular and plural as regards the word "commandment" when employed with reference to Christ. Failure to do so can create a sad misunderstanding. A good illustration is found in John 15. Jesus distinguishes between the Father's commandment in which he walked, and his commandment given to the disciples. "If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments and abide in his love" (verse 10). Then he says at once, "This is my commandment, that ye love one another, as I have loved you" (verse 12). Again, "These things I command you, that ye love one another" (verse 17).

If this seems strange, it is no more peculiar than Paul's insistence that the commandments he quotes, plus any other commandment, are briefly stated in one sentence, "You shall love your neighbor as yourself." This is identical with the point made by Jesus. Love is our principle of action, the guideline for life.

Another illustration is found in 1 John 3. The apostle urges us not to love in mere verbal expression or oral declaration, but in performance and reality. He asserts that it is only by demonstration of our love in deeds that we know we are for real and our hearts are free of hypocrisy and doubt. He reasons that if our own heart condemns us because of our emptiness, God is greater than our hearts, He is a greater judge than our own conscience, and he knows everything there is to know about us.

On the other hand, if our heart is not conscious of a lack of living love this makes us confident in the presence of God who is love. The loving heart does not shrink from the God of love.

The apostle then says that whatever we ask from such a confident and assured heart we will receive, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight. In this context his commandments are that we love in deed and in truth, that is, in demonstration and in reality. The very next verse is explanatory. “And this is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ, and love one another, as he gave us commandment.”

But the next verse says. “And he that keepeth his commandments dwelleth in him, and he in him. And hereby we know that he abideth in us by the Spirit which he hath given us.” Put it all together and it informs us that “we keep his commandments . . . and this is his commandment . . . as he gave us commandment . . . and he that keepeth his commandments.” It is neither confusing nor contradictory.

The commandments of God simply create and sustain a relationship, a unified relationship of faith and love. We believe “into the name of His Son” and love one another. This is it. Everything else is an expression of love and faith, proceeding from the heart, the inward spiritual nature. All of the commandments are summed up in the commandment. The commandment embraces and exhausts the commandments, not as an external law, but as the dynamic of the indwelling Spirit which is proof of the divine inner abiding.

IS THERE A DANGER?

6. Isn't it dangerous to teach people in the church that they are not under law?

That depends upon the people and upon that to which you have “converted” them. If they have been taught to trust in their membership in an institution and in their own righteousness for salvation, you should build a high wall around them and patrol it regularly. You should also gather them together weekly and rehearse all the words of the law in their ears. It will help if you will also develop an intricate spy system since the “somewhats” in the congregation cannot be everywhere at once and will need to know whom they must threaten with expulsion from the camp.

Never forget that all external law requires both an interpreter and an enforcement squad. If these two functions can be combined in one agency, so that those who determine what must be believed to remain in the party corral can also throw or drive out the non-conformists, it will simplify matters. Such a system will lessen the danger of people thinking and this is always the real threat to the status quo in any company. It is always safest in a closed-end corporation to teach the people how to swallow everything but not to speak about anything.

However, I am not a part of such a religious order. I suppose I was at one time, but that was before the Deliverer entered in and set me free. I was “high” on rules and regulations, but I was a lot better at laying them down for others than I was in living up to them myself. I do not recall ever laying down a law God had not given. Anything we thought was the will of God. That was before I learned that no one is transformed by the mere fact of having membership in an organization, regardless of its origin. Calling such an organization a church does not change things. It only compounds the crime and may make for more widespread hypocrisy.

If the church, as you conceive of it, is a round-up of individuals still retaining their criminal tendencies, and who must be confined to keep them from temptation, I suspect it would be dangerous to tell them they are not under law. As I view the community of saints it would not only be incongruous to tell them they are under law, but it would be an insult. Moreover, it would imply that law is superior to grace as an instrument of righteousness. I do not believe that. It would be a tacit admission that even after faith came we are still under a custodian, a child-conductor, and are no better off than slaves, even though we are the promised heirs of all things.

I think of the believers who are under the Lordship of Jesus as righteous, while law is aimed at the lawless and unrighteous. I do not think of myself as clothed in my own righteousness, but in His. I have nothing of my own in which to glory or even trust. "Nothing in my hand I bring; simply to the cross I cling!" When I sing that I mean it. The things in which I once trusted, including legal rectitude, I count as so much garbage, for the sake of gaining Christ and finding myself incorporate in him, with no righteousness of my own, no legal rectitude, but the righteousness which comes from faith in Christ, given by God in response to faith? Does that sound like Paul? It is!

When I responded to the righteousness which is in Christ by my faith, God responded to my faith in Christ with that righteousness. The righteousness I now have did not come from keeping laws or obeying statutes. It is a gift from my Father, an heirloom of heaven. I am not righteous because I keep the commandments, but I keep the commandments because I am righteous! In the case of law, the law comes first and righteousness follows through obedience; in the case of grace, the righteousness for those in Christ Jesus comes first and obedience follows! "We do always those things which please him."

It doesn't bother me when brethren who dwell in fear attack what I am saying, because they really do not know what I am talking about. It is difficult for one who is in prison and under the watchful eye of an armed guard to write a meaningful critique of the life of one who is free. I know, because I was a prisoner in the custody of law, shut up to that faith which was revealed to me through personal meditation long after it was revealed to the world of mankind through divine revelation given to the holy apostles and prophets.

I am not boastful about this, for I did not escape at all. I was rescued. And I have no animosity or hostility toward those who are still behind the walls which they equate with maximum security. I am not inclined to lob missiles or Molotov cocktails over the barriers even when they fire at me and take journalistic potshots while patrolling the precincts to see that no “heretic” passes a freedom paper to the inmates through the barbed-wire. It would be childish for one who escaped from a cage to stand outside and make faces and stick out his tongue at those who are still inside. I do not have time for such “monkey business.” I am too busy celebrating my freedom, and I am also too wise to start another party built around myself or my concepts. We’ve got enough walled-in sects on this earth now. If you are waiting for another faction to frame up, forget it and face up to reality!

I just do not believe that any person on this earth will ever attain unto righteousness by law. He will always fall short of his potential and wash out on his dream. He will never come into fulness of being by walking that kind of a tight-rope while doing his balancing act. There is no strength or power in law to perfect a human personality. On the contrary, the very strength of sin is the law itself. “The sting of death is sin, and sin gains its power from the law; but, God be praised, he gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ” (1 Cor. 15:56, 57). Victory over sin, victory over death, and victory over law. “This is the victory which overcomes the world, even our faith.” That is where the victory is and that is where I intend to stay! Praise the Lord!

Then where do we get our strength if not from our obedience unto law? And how do we attain unto fulness if not through perfect law-keeping? The answer is plain. We get our strength and power from the indwelling Spirit. We get our fulness from experiencing the four-dimensional love which the Spirit pours out or sheds abroad in our hearts. Have you not read?

“He may grant you strength and power through his Spirit in your inner being, that through faith Christ may dwell in your hearts in love. With deep roots and firm foundations, may you be strong to grasp, with all God’s people, what is the breadth and length and height and depth of the love of Christ and to know it though it is beyond knowledge. So may you attain to fulness of being, the fulness of God himself” (Ephesians 3:16-19).

Did you notice that little word “so”? It provides the “how-to” key. So may you attain to fulness of being! How? By grasping and experiencing the love of Christ. Look up to its height, look down at its depth, look out at its breadth, look into its length, and realize that as high as that love is, as deep as it reaches, as broad as it extends, as long as it lasts, it is yours. You can know it, that is share in it, although it passes the kind of knowledge that you get through study, deduction or meditation. It is mind-exploding, volcanic, terrific, and it is yours. Through it you can attain unto the very fulness of God himself! Do you believe that? I do, and I am thrilled with the dynamic of love which can overcome everything and outlast anything.

7. Will this view ever come to be accepted and dominate the thinking of our brethren generally?

I certainly think so. It is simply a matter of spiritual maturity and while we have a long way to go, we are on the road and obviously a lot farther along it than we once were. I think the future holds great promise. Our greatest enemy and drawback is fear and this is enhanced because of the fright tactics employed by sincere men who are intensely partisan and reactionary. They are like the circumcision party in the primitive ekklesia.

What I have been saying is branded as “liberal” and this scares off good men and women who would like to demonstrate love for all of God’s children, but who shrink from doing so because they know they will be attacked from the safety of the pulpit which is off-limits even to those who contribute the cash to pay the salary of the one who assails them from the “sacred desk.”

However, dogmatism and the authoritarian spirit will gradually lose their power to manipulate thinking people and as they search the scriptures for themselves they will see that much of what has passed for God’s will has been human tradition and is a rope of sand which cannot bind them. The day is coming when men will no longer regard preachers and elders as being the infallible interpreters of the word of God and our little papal kingdoms will disintegrate.

There will be a period of reaction against the will of God as expressed in his wonderful love for the world. Grace will be attacked under cover and will be equated with law. Lectureships will be held in which it will be made to appear that brethren who stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made them free are heretical. Preachers who are jealous of their standing with the party will be loud in their boasting and violent in their attacks. It will be made to appear that the most important things in the world are the issues over which our fathers fought and divided. But the love dynamic is so great and so powerful that it will eventually triumph.

Already scores, and even hundreds, of young brethren are coming to see that the dogmatism of yesterday has no place in the world of the present. They are under attack as leaving the faith when really what they are doing is finding it. Pressures will be brought to bear against those who verbalize their relationship with Christ as transcendent over everything else, including the partisan stance, but many of them will not succumb to pressure tactics. They will seek secular employment for support before they will give up their liberty.

Men always fight harder for their traditions than for revealed truth although they often equate the two as identical in their own thinking. But we are in a day of intellectual breakthrough and many of the rationalizations of the partisan status quo are being challenged. This is good and will make of us a more honest and straightforward people although the pioneers who lead the reformation will be hated and maligned as all pioneers are. But cheer up, for the privilege of being strangers, pilgrims and pioneers is worth the cost!

Strained Arguments

Mission Messenger (September 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

It is in no fit of pique or sense of uncharitableness, that I have frequently suggested that some of our brethren seem to devise their “laws” first and then search the scriptures for quotations with which to validate and force them upon others. And some of the strained and strange arguments which they make demonstrate both the fallacy of their laws and the folly of human legislation in the area of the spiritual.

A good example, I think, is found in a leaflet which I received sometime ago and which purported to be mailed by a Church of Christ in Texas. The first page article is an attempt to combat instrumental music and other things as rendering our religion impure. In the interest of absolute fairness I reproduce the article in full.

LAW OF EXCLUSION

The above is merely the title to this article; it is not a biblical expression. However, we feel that it helps to illustrate a biblical principle: i.e., that when God specifies a certain thing, that specification excludes all other things of that class. Let us illustrate. In Psalms 2:7 God says of Christ, “Thou art my son; this day have I begotten thee.” Also, in the New Testament we read this question, “For unto which of the angels said he at any time, ‘Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee?’” (Heb. 1:5). Now, the Hebrew writer is here making an argument based on the law of exclusion. He is saying in effect that God specified that Christ was His son, and that that specification excluded all other things, e.g., angels. Could an angel make a valid argument that he was the Son of God saying, “God didn’t say I wasn’t”? No, because in saying who was His Son He also said who wasn’t His Son. To specify Jesus as His only unique Son is to exclude all else as His only unique Son.

Now all of this is to point out that in considering the worship, organization, and work of the Lord’s church we are confined to God’s specification. Whether instrumental music, counting of beads, or holy water, let us purify our religion of all that is presumptuous.

THOUGHTS ON THE ABOVE

It is an interesting admission by our brother who composed this little treatise that his designation is not a “biblical expression.” No one who speaks as the Bible speaks can bind the term “law of exclusion” upon anyone, because it is not found in the Bible. He feels that such usage of an unscriptural term helps to illustrate a biblical principle. I think it is an abandonment of the motto to call “Bible things by Bible names.”

I am just not too certain that God ordained a “law of exclusion” which is as specific as our good brother indicates. If it is that specific it would appear that all of the brethren who respect the Lordship of Jesus could interpret it alike and exclude the same things. As it is, it appears to be too flexible to be much of a law, because the brethren can bend and stretch it to include what they want and to exclude what they don’t want, until “the law of exclusion” has not “purified our religion” but fragmented our brethren into about two dozen “exclusivistic parties.” Perhaps we should call it the “law of exclusivism” as that seems to be the “ism” on which a lot of saints are high!

The “law of exclusion” is employed by some as an excuse to exclude instrumental music, and by others equally concerned with purity, to exclude support of Herald of Truth, certain kinds of orphan homes, colleges, individual cups, Sunday Schools, and a hundred other things too numerous to mention. This would not bother me too much, except for the fact that a lot of “lawyers” insist on excluding brethren who disagree with them on the motley horde of issues which have been made to appear of more worth and value than the glorious relationship created by the blood of God’s dear Son and my wonderful Savior.

I suspect that some of us estimate the spiritual validity of a thing on the basis of the scriptures used to justify it. If the citations have to be wrested and perverted from their proper context and purpose, we must assume that the case for the law is about as weak as the reasoning employed. Upon that basis our brother has jerked the rug out from under “the law of exclusion.” He went way out to find something to make his case but it would have been better if he had stayed closer to home plate and not tried chasing “fungoes.”

The Hebrew writer was not “making an argument based on the law of exclusion” at all. He may not have known there was such a law, since it is not a Biblical expression. It was not his purpose to prove that angels could not claim to be sons of God because the designation of the Logos as His Son was exclusive. A careful study of the Hebrew letter will show that it was addressed to Palestinian Jews who had accepted Jesus as the Messiah and were in grave danger of defecting to Judaism. To offset this, it was pointed out that what we have in Christ is eminently superior to what was provided by Moses. The word “better” occurs thirteen times in the thirteen chapters as men have divided the letter.

The Jews believed that their law had been given by the disposition of angels (Acts 7:53) and had been ordained by angels in the hands of a mediator (Galatians 3:19). As a prelude to proving that we ought to give the more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, as contrasted with the words delivered by angels (Hebrews 2:1, 2), the writer affirms that the Son of God is superior to angels because a superior designation was bestowed upon him.

“Being made so much better than the angels, as he hath by inheritance obtained a more excellent name than they. For unto which of the angels said he at any time, ‘Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee,’ and again ‘I will be to him a Father and he shall be to me a Son?’”

By inheritance Jesus was entitled to the name “Son” as a patrimony, and this proved his superiority to angels. Our brother is in error when, in his eagerness to prove a case against the use of instrumental music in conjunction with praise to God, he asserts that the Hebrew writer was “here making an argument based on the law of exclusion.” I am glad that the argument made by the Hebrew writer was not as forced as the one our contemporary brother has made, else the Jewish believer’s might all have returned to the ritual and pageantry of the temple.

Reading back into the word of God the arguments and terms we have devised in debate is not a very good way to “purify our religion” and will probably seem a little bit presumptuous to those who love God’s revelation more than they do their own opinions and interpretations. As William Ellery Channing has pointed up a danger, “False and absurd doctrines, when exposed, have a natural tendency to beget skepticism in those who received them without reflection. None are so likely to believe too little as those who have begun by believing too much.”

About Opinions

Mission Messenger (October 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“We have no nostrum, no peculiar discovery of our own to propose to fellow-Christians, for the fancied importance of which they should become followers of us. We propose to patronize nothing but the inculcation of the express word of God, either as to matter of faith or practice; but every one that has a Bible, and can read it, can read this for himself. Therefore, we have nothing new. Neither do we pretend to acknowledge persons to be ministers of Christ, and, at the same time, consider it our duty to forbid or discourage people to go to hear them, merely because they hold some things disagreeable to us; much less to encourage their people to leave them on that account.”— Thomas Campbell in Declaration and Address.

The longer I sojourn among men and the more ardently I study the message of divine revelation, the more enamored do I become of the ideal of those princes of the faith who caught a glimpse of the pristine unity of all believers in Christ and proposed to restore it by renouncing all creeds and confessions as a basis of oneness, except the great and abiding foundation truth that Jesus is the Messiah, the Son of the living God.

The efforts which they exerted to effect such union, and which gained the momentum to graduate into a swelling movement, are laudable and praiseworthy. It is fascinating to realize that they captured the concept of oneness predicated upon belief in and reliance upon historical facts directly related to the person of Jesus, and at the same time had the foresight to distinguish between those facts and any opinion or speculation formed concerning them. The hope of a united body of saints was thus lifted out of the morass of debates and tumults and placed upon the solid ground of verifiable fact.

Properly understood, this strikes at the very heart of all sectarianism. If the gospel is Jesus Christ himself, and if obedience to it is simply identification with him in the saving facts of his death, burial and resurrection, we have a basis upon which to unite everyone on this earth who believes into him through the apostolic testimony or proclamation. By its very nature the gospel, the evangel, is unitive. It calls men out and calls them together. God calls us into congregation with one another and not to separation from one another.

Our separation is from an alien world which does not acclaim Jesus as Lord. It is not from the new humanity. It is the gospel which we hear while in the world and to which we respond. That response brings us into a state where we share a common life, the life of Christ, the more abundant life. It is obvious to all thinking believers that the gospel unites by bringing all who receive and obey it into one body through the Spirit.

Those who are inaugurated into the one body are not one in opinion nor will they ever be. They may even hold varied views related to the very facts of the good news. For example, they may differ upon the day of the week that Jesus died, they may differ about the number of hours he spent in the tomb, and may speculate about the nature of his resurrection body which could appear in rooms where the doors were locked.

But no opinion upon such matters will legislate against one's acceptance by God, or negate the promise of forgiveness. One is not saved from sin by the formation of correct opinions, or deductions from and explanations of the facts, but by belief or trust in them. There is a difference between reposing trust in one and being able to explain all the things which happened to that person. Most of us can only speculate as to why certain things happened to ourselves. One need not be able to explain the Federal Reserve System to trust the bank with his deposit of money or other valuables.

To me it appears quite tragic that most of the heirs of the restoration movement have lost all consciousness of their great patrimony. As a result they are milling about defending their unwritten creeds as fervently as their fathers once rejected them. Remember that whatever one must mentally or verbally subscribe to in order to be received by or welcomed in a party is the creed of that party. This is as certain as if that thing were emblazoned above the speaker's platform. And whatever grounds are urged as a basis for excluding one from communion constitutes the creed of those who exclude him. And their exclusion of him upon any other grounds than a rejection of the Lordship of Jesus over his life, proves that they are a sect in the fairest terms of the word.

Those who exclude their brethren because their views, explanations and opinions are at variance with the orthodox views of the group should cease parading under the guise of being Christians only! To be fair they should itemize and print the things one must believe, and those which he must not hold, in order to remain in the party. They should present this list to all prospects prior to baptism. True, this would constitute a written creed, but it would at least make the sect honest and open. It is dishonest to bring people in on the glad good news that our only creed is Jesus, and then throw them out because they did not read the fine print in the contract. We need to stress our exceptions as well as our acceptance. When I talk about these things they gender a lot of questions. Let me mention a few of them with answers.

OUR GREATEST ERROR

1. What do you think was the greatest mistake in our history as a people?

By “our history” I take it you are talking about heirs of the particular restoration movement with which we are identified. I say “particular restoration movement” because ours is one of some sixteen restoration movements. Many of them began in the same era. All had the same ideal, the achievement of unity by a return to the pattern of profession and practice of the primitive ekklesia of God. All of them suffered from the sin of division, and most of them divided over some of the same things as the concept of idealism clashed with the changing culture.

Certainly we must have hit a derail and jumped the track somewhere because we started out to unite the Christians in all of the sects and ended up smashed to smithereens among ourselves. Being human, we made a lot of mistakes, some more tragic in consequence than others. It will be a difference of opinion as to which one was the most critical and any one that I choose will produce a good crop of dissenters.

However, I think our greatest error came when we began to equate the restoration movement with the church of God. For one thing this took the “move” out of the movement and added a new party to the spectrum. We crystallized into a religious sect which we assumed was the restored church and from that time on we ceased to be unitive and became divisive. Since then we have not even united among ourselves but have divided even the “unity” movement.

The body of Christ has never ceased to be a living entity since its inception at the coronation of Jesus at God’s right hand. It was marred, scarred, bruised and battered, and appeared under some strange forms during the changing centuries, but it never died. Sometimes it was an underground entity and sometimes an above-ground organization, but it was the one body composed of all of the saved on earth at the time.

Men arose in various ages and places to attempt reformation as the form took on new shapes, for reformation is simply re-forming, and most of the reformers had as their goal the elimination of accretions and the recapture of lost values so as to return the ekklesia to its original shape. None of them had the idea that the Lord had closed shop, or that the church had ceased to exist, although they were quick to confess that it suffered from abnormality and malformation.

Each reformatory effort produced a new creed defining what men thought of as essential to the faith, and each such creed created another cleavage, so that every effort at reform of the existing order produced a new sect. The restoration movement which grew out of the efforts of men like Thomas and Alexander Campbell, was an attempt to unite all Christians by ignoring all creeds and synopses of faith and going back beyond their origin to restore to the church the primitive order of things.

It was not an attempt to restore the church. None of the restoration pioneers believed that the church had disappeared or been stamped out. In the first paragraph of The Declaration and Address, Thomas Campbell asserted that “The Church of Christ on earth is essentially, intentionally, and constitutionally one,” and identified its membership by their character. The successors to the pioneers, as always, were the settlers, and these ceased to explore and probe and began to defend. Assuming that the ground which had been captured was all there was, they denied that there was any more to the universe, and began to build a wall around it and to hang as traitors those who still wanted to be explorers.

And that is where we are today. The “Lord’s Church” in our vocabulary does not refer to the one body of believers in the world but to the particular segment of the restoration movement to which the speaker adheres. There are no “Christians in the sects” to unite, so our original goal has been abandoned, not because it has been attained, but because Satan, as always, has brainwashed us into becoming an additional sect.

The one body is the result of man’s response to the universal call of God. The restoration movement is a human attempt to restore to the called a sense of proper relationship to the revealed will. To confuse and confound the movement of God in the universe with a movement of man in the church is like confusing citizenship in the United States of America with a women’s liberation movement in California. And to designate such a movement as the United States and assume that only those identified with the movement are citizens of the commonwealth would be both absurd and asinine. Yet, as I visualize it, that is what we have done with reference to the kingdom of heaven in this age.

A PRACTICAL SOLUTION

2. Is there any practical solution to the problem we inherited?

If there is not we are doomed to become ever more sectarian and exclusivistic. There is no use trying to correct the situation by impractical methods. We have been trying them for decades and they are continually being trumpeted in “brotherhood journals” and pompously advocated and proclaimed in “brotherhood lectureships.” You could as easily straighten out the spaghetti in a can by pounding on the can, as you could to untangle our tragic mix-ups by hammering away in a one-sided college lectureship. We have organized, reorganized and disorganized the restoration movement until it is no longer a race with the runners looking unto Jesus, but a ride on a partisan merry-go-round with the passengers all looking for justification for their factional projects. Unless we get off the whirling carousel we shall continue to grow dizzier for “round and round she goes, and where she stops nobody knows!”

Our pioneers had no problem with the ripped-off fragmented religious scene of their day. They simply recommended ignoring all of the sectarian creedal tests of fellowship which had arisen, and returning to the original dynamic. They were not interested in debating the deductions and objecting to the opinions which give rise to the creeds. It was the tests of union and communion which they wanted to scrap in favor of the faith in the gospel which introduced men into and sustained them in the unity of the Spirit.

If that approach was valid for the fractured religious world of that day why is it not equally appropriate for the fractured restoration movement now? The only practical solution is to ignore all of our parties, plans and programs, and all of our debates, dogmas and details, and return to the concept of the ekklesia as the called out, the people of God, the family of God. It was never intended to be a church among churches, or a sect among sects. It was not meant to be an organization supported and sustained by other human organizations, institutions and inventions. The way to unite is to unite, not to debate!

The calling of a religious party “the Lord’s church” does not make that party the kingdom of heaven over which the Messiah presides. Designating a religious movement “the church of Christ” does not make that movement the exclusive, warranty-guaranteed body of which Jesus is the head. We are not to be identified as his disciples by our signboards but by our love for one another. If we do not have that distinguishing characteristic it makes no difference what we huddle behind. If we do have it, it may not make too much difference either.

The body of Christ in a city is not a party meeting at a certain location or street address. There is certainly nothing wrong with a group of saints meeting at such a location. There is nothing wrong with them appointing a board of trustees and owning property if they wish. The sin comes when they think of themselves as the whole body in that city and deny that any others are children of God, or arrogantly assume that only those belong to God who belong to them. The body of Christ in a given city or district is composed of every saved person in that area. It embraces every individual in whom the Holy Spirit dwells, every cleansed, justified and sanctified member of the new humanity!

The practical solution to the grave problem created by equation of the restoration movement with the body of Christ is to abandon this egotistic, self-righteous concept and return to our original goal which was to be a project to unite the Christians in all of the sects. We will have to stop trying to con honest people into believing that we have tried to make Christians and Christians only. That is just not true! We have been trying to make “Church of Christ Christians” just like the Baptists have been trying to make Baptist Christians and the Presbyterians have been trying to make Presbyterian Christians. They deny this charge just as we deny it. There is a difference! Our good Baptist friends will say that they seek to make Christians first and Baptists secondarily. We just try to make “Church of Christ Christians” first, last and all the time. Because we have come to the conclusion that “the Church of Christ” to which we belong is identified with the one body which belongs to Jesus, we do not think there are any Christians in the sects. If you are not in “the Church of Christ” in a city, you are just not a Christian, and if you are in the wrong “Church of Christ” which means in another organization than ours, you are not anyway. We are in jeopardy until some brother with a sacrificial spirit is willing to move in and start a “loyal church” and then we can move to it and be safe. We have left off trying to reach Jerusalem and have settled for building a modern Babylon, a state of unparalleled confusion.

The practical solution is to “discern the Lord’s body,” and to cease regarding it as a nineteenth century movement with a twentieth century existence, hung-up and strung-out on all of the trivia promoted by professional preachers and organizational schools. All of these things quench the Spirit under a heap of noncombustible issues. The practical solution is to triumph over the organizational concept dumped on us by a Roman hierarchy and free men and women to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, brothers and sisters in the majestic family. It is enough to be members of the new humanity, citizens of the royal and divine commonwealth.

Let us receive, recognize and respect all of God's children. Let us confirm our faith in Christ Jesus by confirming our love for them. To love the brethren in deed and in truth, as opposed to mere word and speech, is the first qualification of a peacemaker and the first principle of any endeavor toward unity. Membership with us may or may not be important but being a member of the one body is an imperative. There is no life if you are severed from the head.

THE GRADUAL APPROACH

3. Will it not be more effective to move more slowly and divest ourselves of our problems gradually?

It might be for you but it would not be for me. It is too much like cutting a dog's tail off an inch at a time to make it easier on the dog. I am not sure we will ever get rid of the sectarian spirit by dissolving it gradually. I am afraid that with such an approach there would always be a residue left in the heart. Moreover, the party spirit (hairesis) is a sin, according to Paul. It is a serious question whether one ought to pull out of sin by degrees or repent of it and be washed clean by the blood of Jesus.

I have chosen for myself the latter approach, preferring to throw off the chains than to file away at one link at a time. I do not bind this upon all and I recognize that freedom gained too suddenly may bring additional trauma to those unaccustomed to it. But I want Jesus to rule over my heart and being and I am too old now to surrender myself to him a bit at a time. I think God will stand by me if I kick the whole sectarian habit. “God is my refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble.” If I cut loose from all the moorings of the flesh, he will not let me drift. “‘Twas grace that brought me safe thus far, and grace will take me home.”

To me the party spirit is an octopus, and I am not interested in being freed from one tentacle at a time. I want to kill the octopus. I do not want one foot on solid ground while the other remains in the quicksand. But again, I would make it clear that I do not expect others to see things as I do. It is not necessary for them to implement their lives as I do. I want to be free from the virus and infection of sectarianism, and I want to be free now!

I have no intention of being a front man or a promotion agent for any factional group of earth. I belong to Jesus Christ my Lord. He is the sovereign over my whole life. Never again will men entice me into a party where I must exhibit my love for them by hating or mistreating other brethren. Jesus is not dragging me out of the sectarian spirit by degrees. He delivered me and I intend to stay free. This disturbs a lot of my good brethren who would prefer that I “line up” with something so they could more effectively attack me. As it is, they take a cut at what they think is the root of things with their little hatchets and frequently cut one of their own feet off.

REACTION TO ATTACK

4. You have been under scathing attack for your position on fellowship in a number of brotherhood papers lately. How do you react to this inwardly?

It is true that a lot of brethren have been training their big journalistic guns on me in recent months, but none of these things really move me. For one thing, those who make such personal attacks and accusations are generally professional preachers, men who in other communions would be called “the clergy.” I don’t think most of the common everyday folk like myself are as hostile and bitter. Many of them realize there is something seriously awry with our approach to unity which has resulted in so many tragic divisions. There are people in every area of the non-instrument spectrum who share my views, although a lot of them do not dare express their real feelings, or they will be cast out of the synagogues. They appreciate the fact I am saying what they would like to say.

I have a great deal of compassion for the preachers who feel that they prove their faithfulness to God by attacking me. I know of men who were “smoked out” by their brethren and had to take “a public stand” with reference to me. But I used to react exactly as they do now. I was just as factional and exclusivistic as they are. Herein lies our real hope. If God could change my heart and make it possible for me to love and cherish all of the brethren, he can change them!

One problem is that a lot of brethren exalt their power and derogate the power of the Spirit. They think they are here to save the truth and forget that the truth is here to save them. I get a real bang out of some of the things they say about my thinking. Everyone of them admits that men can be wrong about some things and still be saved. But they are not about to list the specified “issues” on which you may err and still remain in the fellowship of the Spirit. No two of them would come up with the same list. All of them would differ!

What I have done is to lift the matter completely out of the arena of wrangling over “issues” which are purely temporal and secondary, and have elevated it to the plane of relationship to God through Christ Jesus in the Spirit. This is more than one can stand who trusts in his own righteousness achieved by works. All of the “lawyers” in all of the parties oppose me and for the same reason. I belong to none of their parties but am free in Christ. I trust absolutely in His righteousness but I do not trust in my own.

I do not think God is nearly as interested in our tests of fellowship as our debaters are, and even if heaven smiled upon our silly party standards under which we march, the Father would not wilfully murder his children because they were honestly mistaken about them. Jesus shed his blood for persons, not things. It is persons who have been redeemed, not things. And persons whom Jesus ransomed can be mistaken about things and still be saved, provided they do not let the things become an object of worship and turn them away from Jesus.

I have not been mealy-mouthed or used weasel-words! I am bold in saying that the loving God is not going to deliberately destroy a loving child because he claims to speak in tongues. He is not going to brutally destroy one of his children just because that child thinks Jesus will precede the millennium. I have read the scriptures through time and time again and that is not the nature of the Father therein revealed. He loves those who have been born again, and so long as one acknowledges Jesus as the Lord of his life, his whole life, God is not going to drive him out into the cold.

When I began to write on the theme of fellowship I anticipated that I would be branded as a heretic and castigated as a betrayer of the faith. A lot of brethren cannot distinguish between the faith once delivered to the saints and their own opinions delivered daily on the brotherhood milk route. So I am not at all surprised that a lot of them are against me. It would cause me to do a lot of rethinking of my position if some of them were for me. I feel fairly safe as long as they are in the opposition. But a lot of them will see the light and change. Even if they do not I shall go on loving them anyhow!

WITHDRAWING FELLOWSHIP

5. How would you react if they should “withdraw fellowship” from you?

I probably wouldn't miss it too much. It is a little childish for brethren to talk about withdrawing something they have never exhibited or manifested. You don't miss the money if someone withdraws ten dollars he never gave you. That is the trouble with “withdrawing fellowship” in a lot of places. There wasn't any to start with.

My position is that fellowship is not something men can extend or withdraw. We are called into it by God. It is in Christ and it is the fellowship of the Spirit. As long as the Holy Spirit dwells in one he is in the fellowship. It is only one who has not the Spirit who is none of his. Men cannot bestow the Spirit and they cannot withdraw Him. They can put you out of parties, sects and denominations, which is really what you meant by your question. But anything men can put you out of, you are probably as well off out as you are in. It is like an updated sign I saw recently, “Confucius say, ‘Man who sits on tack is better off.’”

Really, I am only in the fellowship with brethren because I am in the fellowship with the Father. Our horizontal relationship is simply the result of our vertical relationship. I was not adopted by men but by God, and while all who love God should receive those whom God receives, if they do not it is their misfortune. Only God can add me to the body and only God can remove me. “God hath set the members in the body as it pleaseth him.”

I intend to stay so close to Jesus that nothing can ever move me. He is my guide and my leader. I will not fear what men shall do unto me! I shall welcome all who are in Christ Jesus and I will receive them as God received me with all of my longings, shortcomings, weaknesses, hangups and ignorance. God did not tell me that when I was good enough, or smart enough, or wise enough, he would accept me. He did not tell me that when I made a good grade on the doctrinal test I would pass. He accepted me and I have been trying to become a better person ever since, although I still have a long way to go. It isn't always easy for me!

So-called “discipline” and “withdrawal of fellowship” in our day, has little to do with what the new covenant scriptures teach. It is not spiritual action taken by those who love Jesus, but human reaction of those who fear change. It is administered not by loving saints but by institutional wardens. It stems not from love for brethren, for generally those excluded are much more loving than those who exclude them. The basis of it is insecurity. Those who think for themselves and can no longer goose-step in unison to the sound of the party trumpet are regarded as a threat to the authoritarian structure. So they are warned, threatened and finally thrown out, by status quo defenders.

We should not feel sorry for the excluded! Not every one can get out of a trap so easily. To be freed from a snare without having to gnaw your leg off is a blessing. Our sorrow should be reserved for those who pompously regard themselves as the guardians of orthodoxy and who issue ultimatums, and who arise on Lord's Day to pontificate on error by which they mean disagreeing with tradition and their opinions, and who then read a document, generally drawn up by the preacher, declaring that a brother and his family are consigned to limbo because they claim to have attained a closer walk with God through an experience with the Holy Spirit. With shepherds like this watching the flock, who needs wolves to scatter the sheep and drive them away?

WEAKENING DISCIPLINE

6. Will your position not weaken discipline in the local congregation?

First of all you need to ask if what you call “discipline” is the will of God. If it is not, it should not only be weakened, but abandoned. Is it the will of the heavenly Father to cut off from our association a saint who has diligently studied the scriptures and come to the conclusion that Jesus will return before the millennium? Is it the will of God to hound out one who believes that a Christian cannot serve in the armed forces of the United States, or one who holds that he can? Is it the will of God to set up arbitrary rules that if one is absent from three consecutive gatherings of the congregation he is summarily dismissed from the “membership” and to “return to the fold” must march up during an invitation song and make an acknowledgment and ask forgiveness of “the powers that be”? “Upon what meat doth this our Caesar feed, that he hath grown so great?”

The will of God is revealed in the word of God. It says nothing about such high-handed tactics in the family of God. We are encouraged to receive one another, to be patient and longsuffering. We are to be kind, considerate and merciful to each other. We are a family circle not a big business organization. Our names are enrolled in heaven and not on a factory payroll. The ekklesia of God cannot be maintained like an assembly line. We are not to judge one another but to love one another. We dare not “set at nought a brother for whom Christ died.”

Many of our brethren cannot distinguish between sin and error. The first is an action of the heart which is an offence against God and His majesty. It dethrones God in the inner chamber of the spirit and substitutes self in the reigning position. On the other hand, error is a mistake of the mind. We can no more endorse error than we can condone sin, but error, like disease, is not always fatal. Our hope of life is not conditioned upon a person being right, but upon being in the right person. He that hath the Son hath life, he that hath not the Son hath not life!

Error can become sin when it is voluntary or when it causes the errorist to swerve from the faith. Involuntary ignorance is never a sin. Voluntary ignorance is a sin because it causes one to fall below his potential deliberately. But all of us form opinions and not all of them are correct. We are neither infinite in perception nor judgment. We are not saved by being correct on all matters nor damned because of being incorrect on some. If we were, there would be no salvation, and damnation would be universal and the lot of all.

No opinion held under the Lordship of Jesus is a ground for congregational action against an individual. It is only when one is led to deny the relationship he sustains to Jesus through the Spirit, or to subvert the divine purpose by factionalism and deliberate fragmentation of the one body as God's unitive instrument on earth that the community of saints should dissociate from him.

One cannot divest himself of an honestly-held opinion by order of others. Such orders do not make better Christians but greater hypocrites. Anyone who denies what he holds as a conviction in order to remain in good standing with a group only proves his insincerity, and not the rightness of the group. Any group which issues dogmatic orders of this kind intrudes where it has no business, violates the rights of citizens of the kingdom of heaven and sins against the consciences of the brethren. All who engage in such high-handed action seek to lord it over the heritage of God, and become the greater sinners.

Honest opinions are our brain-children and one can no more be expected to abandon them than he should be expected to abandon his children in the flesh. One can conceal his thoughts as he can his children when his home is under attack, but he ought not to deny them to save his own skin. One who reads the word of God and meditates upon it cannot help but form opinions about what he reads. If he is a person of integrity he will never ask himself what opinions he must hold to be in good standing with men. Instead, he will reach conclusions which appear to him to be the will of God in the subject-matter involved.

To hold that a person is subject to penalty for holding an opinion is like punishing him for digesting his food. One can no more keep from digesting mental food than he can his physical food, if he is mentally healthy. Mental digestion is as spontaneous and natural as is physical digestion. It is absurd to pour every mental capacity into a party mould, for all such moulds are themselves but crystallized opinions which have been set and hardened.

Reading History

Mission Messenger (October 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

I must confess that one of my greatest pleasures in life is the reading of history. I am intrigued by it and I wade through it with gusto, gathering ideas, plucking thoughts, and stuffing my mind with them, like a boy eating candy when given five minutes of freedom in a confectionery. I can take an oversized volume of Greek and Roman annals and settle down to it with as much delight as I used to tackle blackberry cobbler with homemade ice cream over it.

I am fully aware that not everyone shares my taste. When reference to history was cited to establish a precedent in a libel case against the Chicago Tribune, in 1919, Henry Ford said, "History is more or less bunk." Napoleon offered the view that, "History is fraud, agreed upon." Matthew Arnold referred to it as "that huge Mississippi of falsehood." I think all of these pessimists were somewhat biased and I do not share their views.

Edward Gibbon, in the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, suggested that, "History is little more than the register of the crimes, follies and misfortunes of mankind." But he may have been a little perturbed because David Hume, who denied the possibility of anything miraculous, warned him that he would be severely criticized because of his chapter on Christianity. He did not regard history as I do, for I think of it as an account of the footprints of God in the passing centuries of human behavior.

A few nights ago, while Nell was working late on the subscription list, and I was seeking respite from the fifty letters I had written during the day, I took from the shelf my worn copy of The Early Church, by David Duff, one time professor of church history in Edinburgh. There have been a number of church histories written since the days of Hegesippus, who wrote the first one, but this eighty-year old one is a favorite of mine.

I am indebted to the author for many things, but chiefly for the insights into Gnosticism, which a German historian, Graul, called “the gigantic serpent which lurked by the cradle of the infant church.” Once I came to understand the great schismatic evil against which the saints struggled and fought, some of the letters in the new covenant scriptures came alive. Phrases were pregnant with meaning I had not previously seen, and John’s statement about “many antichrists” in the world was understood in its true light.

It was Irenaeus, whose name means “peace,” who seemed to have seen the real danger in the false thinking which paraded under the banner of “Knowledge,” and which Paul long before had designated as “science falsely so-called.” And it was Irenaeus who saw in Gnosticism the stolen trappery of pagan philosophy. Professor Duff writes, “He was alarmed that the Gnostics had borrowed all that their systems contained, partly from the theogonies of the old Greek poets, and partly from the systems of the philosophers, only changing names while adhering substantially to their heathen views.”

In our day, the faith once delivered, is called upon to face up to the attack of varied systems which are mistakenly called “modernistic philosophies.” The fact is there is nothing new or modern about them. Each one has its counterpart in the Greek schools of thought which existed long before the Logos became flesh. Although called by new names and operating under new brands and labels, they are as old as “the wisdom of this passing age” which Paul confronted in Corinth.

Humanism, for example, did not originate with Dante, Petrarch, or Boccaccio. It was not given birth by the Byzantine scholars who fled to Italy when Constantinople fell to the Turks in 1453. It is not at all strange that its advocates revived an interest in the Greek and Latin Classics, and it is one of the strange quirks of history that the invention of the printing press, which made possible the circulation of the revelation of God, also made possible the circulation of the written works of the patrons of the gods. Thus the stage was once again set for the struggle between the wisdom of God and the wisdom of this world.

All of this results in an overwhelming optimism in my breast. The faith faces no new foe in this generation! Certainly the enemy is more sophisticated in approach and more persistent in attack. But the faith has triumphed in every direct encounter in the past. The fact that The Way still exists is a tribute to the life with which it is energized and which makes it possible for God to use things that are not, in the eyes of the world, to bring to nought the things that are!

Our only fear stems from the weakness of the saints, and not from the power of the enemy. In the minds of many the germs of compromise lurk, and the faith is regarded as a way of life rather than as the life of the Way. Under the guise of tolerance for the world we sign a pact of peaceful coexistence with Satan. We erode away our resources in internecine strife and civil wars, laboriously toiling up molehills as if they were mountains. We get along better with the world which we are told not to love, than we do with brethren whom we are admonished to love. We sharpen our sword, not to do battle against the principalities and powers, but to hack one another into bits!

It was not by accident that John, who survived to fight the inroads of Gnostic philosophy, offered the two-pronged commandment of faith and love. "This is his command: to give our allegiance to his Son Jesus Christ and love one another as he commanded." To relinquish our allegiance to the Son is to come apart at the center of the faith; to cease to love one another is to fly apart at the periphery. Never is faith so important or love so needful as when an insidious enemy moves in for the kill.

It is impossible to gain the victory over what Paul calls "hollow and delusive speculations" with a secondhand faith or a borrowed set of beliefs. Actually such a faith is not "faith" at all, but prejudice. It is simply inherited and adopted without personal examination. In a crisis it cannot stand because the one who holds it cannot defend it. Many a person who is said to lose his faith on the university campus had none to lose. He was operating on what his father believed, or on what a favorite Sunday School teacher had said. One might as well try to masticate food in the college cafeteria with his father's borrowed dentures as to try and chew on metaphysics in the classroom with his father's borrowed convictions.

It will help us when we are assailed by clever advocates of philosophy to remember that we are battling against a foe which is not invincible, but which has been put to flight upon numerous occasions. We need not shed tears of frustration nor wring our hands in futility. No weapon formed against the truth shall prosper. History attests to the power of the faith to overcome the world. "This is the victory that overcomes the world, even our faith!" We are fighting upon familiar ground under the leadership of one who never lost a battle and will never know defeat.

"Let no one deceive you with shallow arguments; it is for all these things that God's dreadful judgment is coming upon his rebel subjects. Have no part or lot with them. For though you were once all darkness, now as Christians you are light. Live like men who are at home in daylight, for where light is, there all goodness springs up, all justice and truth” (Ephesians 5:6-8).

Where light is!* I am resolved to stay in the Son-light! No one need be reluctant to enter the fray while clad in the armor which God has provided. Nothing can stand against the sword of the Spirit when swung by the hand of one whose trust is strong and who will die for the faith he holds in Jesus.

Visions of Love

Mission Messenger (October 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

Recently I sat one evening in the ballroom of a huge hotel in the heart of a renowned metropolis. The banquet tables were crowded with attractively attired men and women— brothers and sisters in the most majestic family circle in the universe. Great chandeliers lighted the room and accented the Oriental wall panels of red and gold. Skilful black waiters clad in matching uniforms glided noiselessly between the groups of seated guests, pampering appetites educated to gourmet status by an epicurean society.

When the feast was finished and the sound of animated conversation had subsided, a man arose to speak. His ability was immediately apparent. His oratorical powers lent strength to his every sentence. He began by reading the words of Jesus about the new commandment, which really was the old commandment written again in the blood drawn from his own veins. The speech was flawless in content and articulation. The points were pressed home to friendly hearts, and the illustrations which reinforced them were meaningful and well chosen.

But suddenly I found myself in thought in yesterday's world of two millennia ago. I was not turned out to the speaker. His words found their way into my consciousness, but on wings of mental fantasy I soared back into the simpler world where all of the external trappings of the Now fall away! Perhaps an ancient prophet would have said that I was caught up in the Spirit. A modern psychologist would have replied that it was merely a case of thought transference sparked by association. I do not try to account for it. I simply recount for you the images of an unfolding imaginary panorama.

First, I found myself looking down upon a lonely island, a rocky promontory jutting up out of the greenish-blue water of a mist-shrouded sea. The mewing of wheeling gulls served to break the silence along a shore where the spume and spray marked the death of rolling waves moving in like soldiers marching relentlessly to their doom. Then I saw the grotto in which sat a bearded man whose wrinkled face spoke eloquently of his age. He was writing, dipping the calamus into an inkhorn and penning words with an awesome concentration upon the task.

The thought struck me that this was the one-time fisherman, John, last survivor of the little group summoned to be with the Son of man during his earthly pilgrimage. It was he who wrote about love more than any other, and now he was here, forsaken and yet faithful, paying the price which true love exacts during a time of crisis. It was his fate to be alive when the two great philosophies met head-on at the crossroads of history. "Might makes right" was the watchword of the Caesars, and "right makes might" was the motto of the Christ, and now the aged saint was temporarily banished by Domitian, and was in the isle called Patmos for the testimony of the word. Love may mean loneliness, banishment, and waiting for the angels to come.

Then I was whirled away to look down upon the spreading city sprawled across the seven hills, the Great Whore flirting with the kings of the earth, drunken by the wine of her own lust, exuding the sour stench of her own vomit, yet clothed in scarlet, and summoning the wealthy of the earth to her intoxicated embrace. There were the dirty ghettos with their stinking tenements, with sottish men and sodden women crawling in and out of them like insects.

But the divine spotlight sought out the inner fastness of the dank Mamertine prison, and brought into focus a man with a long chain fastened to a shackle above his ankle and the other end fastened to a hasp in the belt of a member of the Praetorian guard. There was room for the prisoner to walk about but I saw him sitting on a low stool in the shaft of light beaming through a narrow aperture serving as a window in the thick stone wall. He was writing on a sheet of parchment, thoughtfully setting down a message while tears welled up in his eyes like water flowing from the soul's unseen cistern.

I knew that I was looking at Paul, the oft-battered ambassador, and I remembered what he had previously written to the Lord's underground in this teeming world capital. "Owe no man anything but to love one another, for he who loves another has fulfilled the whole law." Love had led him into a life of hardship and suffering, "in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by my own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren."

The way of love may be the road to prison. He who once hated and breathed out threatenings and slaughter, casting men and women into prison, now loved, but drank from the same bitter cup which he once held to the lips of other saints. Love does not count the cost. It keeps no account of returns. So it enabled the aging captive to write, "And I will very gladly spend and be spent for you; though the more abundantly I love you, the less I be loved."

Once more the mental camera swung upon its pivot and I glimpsed a skull-like hill with three crosses stark against the Judean sky. Over the center one, like a rainbow, the word love was arched in technicolor and I knew that here was the love center of the universe, and all human love was simply a beam or ray flashing from it. And I remembered again those words which have challenged me ever since I first read them, "Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins." Herein is love! Not a human emotion but a divine disclosure.

Suddenly I was back in the great hall again, looking at modern men and women, twentieth century brothers and sisters. And I wondered if love was a verbalization in a vocabulary, a subject for sermons, and an exercise in expression. It is wonderful to sit with the saints in a sharing situation, to break bread with those whom you cherish for their faith. Still the gray ghosts of long ago keep marching through the corridors of the heart and as one sees the scars, the blood and the bruises, he wonders if love has grown fragile and delicate until it can no longer believe all things, bear all things and endure all things. The humble soul chastened by the memories of what has been can only cry out anew, "Lord, teach me to love!" Let us walk in that light!

Forced Conformity

Mission Messenger (November 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

“Truth is compared in Scripture to a streaming fountain; if her waters flow not in a perpetual progression, they sicken into a muddy pool of conformity and tradition. A man may be a heretic in the truth; and if he believe things only because his pastor says so, or an assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy.”

These are the words of the Puritan poet and pamphleteer, John Milton, whose character was a strange blend of winsomeness and severity. Although he became totally blind at the age of forty-four and continued so for the remaining twenty-two years of his life, he produced some of his finest material during this period of enforced darkness.

He is known chiefly in our day because of his beautiful poetry, but he was a prodigious writer of tracts, and I have read many of them such as How to Rid Ourselves of the Clergy with a great deal of appreciation. He was a firm defender of the right of every man to interpret Scripture according to his own conscience, and some of his statements have made an undeniable contribution to my own thinking, although I am sadly deficient in trying to convey my thoughts in the beautiful language which he employed.

Before I leave Milton, however, for the more prosaic task immediately at hand, let me ask you to consider this other statement which flowed from his sharpened quill. "Is it not possible that she (truth) may have more shapes than one? What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein truth may be on this side or on the other without being unlike herself . . . What great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is, that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another! I fear this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks."

In the earlier part of this year I made a rather extensive study of religious intolerance and the constant struggle of the mind to be free. I have concluded that there is always a conspiracy to reduce men to serfs to the institution and to manipulate them to the gain and promotion of others. But I have developed a deeper appreciation for those who have fought for the only liberty that is real, the freedom to think, speak and act.

Erasmus of Rotterdam said, "The sum of our religion is peace and unanimity and these can scarcely stand unless we define as little as possible and in many things leave each free to follow his own judgment."

Sebastian Castellio said, "Nothing can be essential to salvation that cannot be known, and much in Christian teaching cannot be established with absolute certainty, particularly the matters that are most controverted."

John Locke wrote, "It becomes all men to maintain peace and the common offices of friendship in a diversity of opinions, since we cannot reasonably expect that anyone should readily and obsequiously quit his own opinion and embrace ours with a blind resignation to an authority which the understanding of man acknowledges not.”

Alexander Campbell wrote, “We have been censured long and often for laying too much stress upon the assent of the understanding; but those who have most acrimoniously censured us, have laid much more stress upon the assent of the mind, than we have ever done. We never did, at any time, exclude a man from the kingdom of God for a mere imbecility of intellect; or, in other words, because he could not assent to our opinions . . . We will acknowledge all as christians who acknowledge the gospel facts, and obey Jesus Christ.”

And the Holy Spirit prompted Paul to write: “Welcome one whose faith is weak, but not for the purpose of deciding mere matters of opinion . . . Who are you that you should find fault with the servant of another? Whether he stands or falls is a matter which concerns his own master . . . As for you and your convictions, keep your personal faith to yourself in the presence of God.”

That should be enough to introduce the subject with which I am requested to deal in this issue of our little journal. It may not be generally known, but there is a frantic wave of exclusion now sweeping through Churches of Christ. Elders are jumpy and quick on the trigger. In every section of our land, motivated by reckless attack from the pulpits, brethren are being “cast out of the synagogues” for no other reason than the fact that they dare to think for themselves. And it is observable that those who are driven out are conceded by their persecutors to be pure in morals, holy in life, faithful in attendance, and studious in their habits.

Perhaps this last is the real problem. An elder in Texas said of one brother who was callously thrown out, “He was a good man as long as he stayed with our old-time doctrine. But he wasn’t satisfied and he took to reading too many books and papers not written by faithful brethren, and he tried to tell the rest of us we were wrong in some points, when we knew we had the truth all along. So we had to get rid of him before he influenced others into becoming dissatisfied with our way of looking at things.”

It is a commentary on the attitude of the elders who discharged this brother because he learned too much, that they also placed him under a social ban and notified all who were under their “jurisdiction” that they must not visit in his home, talk with him by the way, or have anything to do with him, and any violation of this edict or proscription would make them amenable to the discipline of the congregation and liable to the same penalty. It would appear that some of the congregations have been victimized by power-hungry dictatorships which reserve unto themselves the power to save or condemn!

REGULATION OF OPINION

1. But are not elders charged with regulating opinions of the members?

Indeed they are not! Elders are not to be tyrants or despots! They are fallible men, as likely to err in judgment as other men, and more liable to do so if their decisions are warped by a sense of power or pride. The opinions of elders may be just as erroneous as those of others in a congregation, and that is why no opinion can be made a test of fellowship, or of union and communion.

Only infallible men should have any right, or even inclination, to demand that their opinions be adopted by all. Since there are no such men upon earth, uniformity of knowledge and conformity of opinion can never be enforced or imposed. The Congress of the United States would make as much sense to pass a law that no person could be a citizen unless he was exactly five feet and nine inches tall, as for brethren to condition citizenship in the divine kingdom upon a certain arbitrary mental stature.

Elders are not political opportunists who can conspire, manipulate and change the rules in the middle of the game, in order to keep the power they may have unjustly seized. In the divine economy no provision is made for government without the consent of the governed. The word rendered office in the King James Version does not refer to an elective position, but to a function or work. “He that desires the office of a bishop desires a good work.”

It is a frightful commentary upon how far we have fallen in the Churches of Christ, that men have turned a function into a power structure against which there is no appeal even in cases of flagrant abuse and injustice. In some places preachers and elders meet in closed sessions and clandestinely plot to force the saints to “knuckle under” as the price for remaining in the congregation, and ruthlessly eject men and their families who dare to question if this is faithful adherence to the word of God.

Nothing is more absurd in the light of the new covenant scriptures, than to hound someone out of the congregational association because he can see no wrong in the use of instrumental music as an accompaniment to praise, or because he has reached the conclusion that the millennium will follow the return of Jesus, or because he honestly feels that “the gifts of the Spirit” are available today. Those who elevate such ideas into tests of union or communion and condition their acceptance of brethren upon conformity to their orthodox legislation should be ashamed to live and afraid to die! To wound the consciences of brethren who are in the Lord Jesus and fervently seeking to follow him, is not alone to injure them but the Lord who bought them! Elders and preachers who bind upon those in Christ something more than faith in the Lord Jesus and trust in His wonderful grace, for justification, are the modern Judaizers, the twentieth-century circumcision party. They are our revised version of the “certain of the Pharisees” who have crept in to steal away the liberties of the saints. They walk not according to the truth of the gospel. These are serious charges and I do not make them lightly or flippantly.

I affirm them because I believe that a great principle is at stake. When the divine right of each child of God to approach the scriptures for himself is abridged or denied, then have we blotted out almost half a millennium of Protestant gain and returned to the spirit of the papacy. We have turned our backs upon the ideal of true restoration and restored the spirit which made possible the Inquisition and cast that mighty pall upon the earth which came to be known as “the Dark Ages.”

The rational powers of the saints will be stultified and their thought processes stifled. If the price of being received is not to think, men who love the social institution above their own integrity will cease to think. Thus the congregation will come to be composed of frightened conformists who trust in the wisdom of men and deny the wisdom of God. Sterility will prevail and moral compromise arise as it already has in many places.

DRAWING THE LINE

2. If elders cannot draw a line on the opinions held by brethren, who can?

No one can! Are not elders also brethren? Who is going to draw a line on the opinions they hold? Why should a small group of men place an executive ban on the opinions of other saints? Is this not, in effect, imposing their own opinions upon others? If a group of brethren hold an opinion in conflict with the opinion of the elders, why not have the elders surrender their opinion? What is there about being in the presbytery which makes one’s opinion infallible and imperative?

And what is to happen when the elders hold varied opinions? Whose view is to prevail? Will it be the view of the one who has the biggest bank account and the largest amount of building and loan stock? Will it be the view of the one whose wife works hardest behind the lines to make him toe the mark and tell the others where to get off? Or, will it be the one who has the largest family and the most people “lined up”? Who will have to resign so that the eldership will be a unit in “presenting the truth”?

The fact is that God has freed us all from domination by others in the realm of opinion and made our opinions subject only to the bar of personal conscience. We are specifically told that in our reception of others, even those who are weak, we must not engage in disputes over opinions (Romans 14:1). The kingdom of heaven is spacious enough for men to dwell together in spite of differences, so long as they neither despise nor judge one another. Even then, the problem is an attitude toward brethren and not so much one toward things.

The sin is not in having varied opinions, for God receives men in spite of them. The sin comes when we “set at nought a brother” (verse 10). It lies in destroying one for whom Christ died by insistence upon having my own way (verse 15). Obviously someone is mistaken when our views clash, and both may be. But one who is not free to make mistakes is not free at all. It is about time that we assert our right to read and think for ourselves and rise up against the domination of preachers and editors. The slavish worship and adulation heaped upon journals is unworthy of free men and women. Read what you want to but make up your own mind. You are not a door-mat for other men!

Let me come down to a current problem so I may make myself clear. The traditional position of our brethren in the restoration movement has been that “the age of miracles” ended with the work of the special envoys of Christ, and when the last person had died upon whom apostolic hands were laid, the spiritual gifts available to the primitive ekklesia were withdrawn, or simply ceased through attrition.

One of the passages occupying a prominent place in the list of texts summoned to bolster this rationale was 1 Corinthians 13:10. "But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away." The context mentions the unfailing quality of love, as distinguished from prophecy, tongues and knowledge supernaturally given. It was assumed that "that which is perfect" was the completed revelation of God as now contained in the sacred canon of new covenant scriptures. Few, if any, among us questioned this, so it became the accepted, or orthodox way of explaining it. It created no problem because no one even thought of questioning it.

Now, however, it is a horse of a different color, as a man said when he saw his first zebra. As a part of that which the world of religion designates "the charismatic renewal," and which has been a recurrent phenomenon through the centuries, some of our brethren are directly involved. In order to attempt a validation of their experience they have taken a new look at 1 Corinthians 13:10 and decided "that which is perfect" has not yet arrived.

This has obviously set off a few fireworks and in some places the elders, frightened by what has happened, or what may happen, have accused those of their number caught up in the excitement, of "denying the plain teaching of the Bible," and of "having no respect for the authority of the word of God." Careful thought, unaffected by the emotional reaction of either side, will show that this is not true and such thoughtless accusations may do more damage than some of the thoughtless actions of the "charismatics."

The cold fact is that Paul did not identify that which is perfect, and he did not tell us when it was to arrive. If he had done so there would be no real hangup on the matter. We have deduced from our reasoning, that the perfect was the completed revelation as now contained in the sacred scriptures. Others question our interpretation.

That the “teaching” is not as plain as some brethren would like to think was made clear when a publisher among us asked six different brethren to explain what was meant in 1 Corinthians 13:10. All of them were excellent students of the new covenant scriptures in the original Greek language, but they all came up with a different approach, and they did not agree upon the identity of what constituted “that which is perfect.” Being such apt students they used terminology in some cases which tended to confuse, but what they said was about as confusing as the way they said it. I think a lot of common folk like myself reached the conclusion that if the “experts” could not agree we would just have to allow for differences from now on!

But both groups among us believe there is a perfected state, and that it either has come or will, and both believe that with its coming the partial will be done away. The reason both believe that is because it has been revealed, and there is not one person among us who denies the revelation of God. Our problem is not with revelation, which is the uncovering of the divine mind. It is with interpretation, which is the application of the human mind in an attempt to understand the revelation. Revelation is what God has said; interpretation is what one thinks God meant by what He said. The first is infallible, the second is not!

No one can believe that which is perfect has come, because God did not say that. He can hold the opinion that it has come. He can say, “As I understand the revelation given in 1 Corinthians 13 that which is perfect refers to the completed canon of the sacred scriptures, and on the basis of my understanding I conclude that prophecies, tongues and supernatural knowledge are no longer available.”

One’s personal conviction about the matter will be weaker or stronger based upon the mental case he can make for his deduction by his knowledge of and application of other scriptures which he sees as related to the matter. There is always a danger that we may have a bias depending upon our confidence in and advocacy of a certain viewpoint. It is difficult to listen objectively to one whom you have already classified as either a crackpot or a traditional legalist. In the Biblical connotation, the first is despising a brother, and the second is judging a brother. We are specifically forbidden to do either, because either attitude may be followed by setting him at naught.

Someone will certainly say that all of this is good in theory, but just what shall elders do when confronted with a group of saints in the congregation who testify that they have “received the baptism of the Holy Spirit and the gift of tongues”? First of all, they should fervently pray that the Spirit who dwells in all of us will guide them and give them insight in their application of the revealed testimony so none will be lost. They should ask those with whom they differ to meet with them and relate the experiences which are being rumored and they should listen carefully, patiently and earnestly without rude interruption or interjection of argument.

At the close of such a session in which they have eagerly sought to understand, they may well say, “We were anxious to hear from you personally what has transpired in your lives because we are so closely knit together by the ties of love that what affects one of us affects us all. Now, having heard you through, we ask you to meet with us in the same fashion and listen to our views which differ from yours, as you know.” Under no circumstances should such a gathering disband without all kneeling to pray that they may “keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.”

Those who claim that the Spirit has moved into their lives in a new dimension should be anxious to prove it by weighing what is said by those who have their spiritual interests at heart. But what happens, if after the sessions, there is an impasse? The possibility, and even the probability, that this will result must never deter the people of God from talking together about their differences. We must hold ourselves always ready to talk with brethren until we mutually agree that we have exhausted our efforts at agreement. Even then we must not slam the door shut with such force that we cannot open it to future attempts.

If I were an elder I would tell the brethren that they meant more to me than any opinion of mine about the work of the Spirit in individual lives. I would point out what love obligated me to do and what I felt it obligated them to do. Under no circumstances should preachers or elders harangue the brethren from the security of the pulpit in times like these, aggravating situations into an importance they do not deserve.

Of course the brethren who feel they have discovered something precious to themselves must never thrust or push it upon others who do not wish it, or who are not ready for it. If their claims about the Holy Spirit are truly valid they ought to become more understanding, loving and considerate of others. They will not measure the faith of others by their own experiences, nor conclude that God cannot accept others except on their terms. They should not deliberately create emotional reactions by publicly insisting upon testifying. It is certainly not a work of the Spirit to divide brethren over the work of the Spirit. Those who have faith in such matters, should heed the divine injunction, to have it to themselves.

It is a little silly for elders to tell people they cannot meet in their own homes and discuss what they wish. So long as brethren do not make themselves obnoxious by trying to disturb the peace we should not disturb theirs. Elders are not exempt from the admonition to “live peaceably with all men.” It is not necessary that those of us who have eaten together at the Lord’s Table for years start hating one another because of varied opinions about the present influence of the Holy Spirit. What we should all come to realize is that one’s standing is not to be judged by his gifts but by his fruits.

As I read it, the scriptural antidote provided for the problems growing out of the charismata was “the more excellent way.” This was the divine option or alternative, intended to quiet the tumult and settle the dust of strife. I fail to read anywhere the instruction to throw out in the cold those who were regarded as “God’s problem children.” I suspect that banishment of those who differ is a lot easier than loving them. Most of us find it less difficult to love brethren at a distance where they don’t “bug” us than when they are up close and do. We put them out of the congregation to “get them out of our hair.”

I am fully resolved to make no test of fellowship out of divergent opinions as to the implication of the expression “that which is perfect.” I have my own opinion about it, of course, and it is a perfectly good one. I like it better than any other opinion of which I have heard. It is not overly-used because I have not worn it out clobbering other brethren over the head with it. I get it out occasionally and examine it and polish it up, and admire it all to myself. I am not married to it like I am to Nell, so if someone shows up with a better opinion I’ll swap mine off or trade it in. I would not do that with my wife. I would no more withdraw from a brother for differing with me than I would exclude everyone who did not drive a blue Ford.

In down-to-earth terms this means that I accept both Pat Boone who wrote the best-seller A New Song, and James D. Bales who wrote the non-best-seller, Pat Boone and the Gift of Tongues. Naturally, they are both “brothers in error,” but who isn’t? In some cases they are mistaken about the same things and in other cases they are mistaken about different things, which proves that they are both human and fallible. Since I am in the same boat I do not intend to rock it or abandon it. I intend to continue to be human and fallible as long as I live on earth, and that makes it easy to put up with Pat and Jim, and all of the other brethren who admit to being human, and even those who suspect they are but will not admit it.

I got a kick out of talking with an elder in a congregation down in the hills not long ago. We've always liked one another although he thinks I may be a "mite liberal" on the fellowship question. In any event, the teacher of the adult class and his wife "got to monkeyin' around with prayers" as the elder put it, and "babbled something that they thought was tongues." The elder knew that he had to put a stop to it before it spread to "the ignorant members and they got all carried away." "How did you handle it?" I asked. "Well sir, I'll tell you," he replied. "I sent off and ordered that book by James D. Bales in which he lined Pat Boone out. The thing was pretty high priced. I've sold a two-hundred pound hog for less, but not lately, of course! I only read about halfway through it, but that was enough to show me what I had to do. I never did finish the book but I loaned it to this couple that was goin' into orbit. It didn't change 'em none. The wife said it was as dry as cornflakes without milk, and the man said if Brother Bales taught like he wrote that Harding College was a corpse and didn't know it. So I got the other two elders together and we withdrew from them. About a dozen others served notice they were leaving too, so we give them a dose out of the same spoon, and withdrew from them too. They're meetin' in a home and they pretend like they're happy. Things have settled back to normal at church with business as usual."

"Did you read Pat's book along with the one by Brother Bales?" I asked.

"No, I didn't read it. They gave it to me when I handed them the one by Brother Bales, but I just leafed through it and saw that Pat was off and as high as a kite. That's what comes from a Christian messing with that Hollywood crowd. They get used to acting and now they've got Pat acting like a holy-roller."

"Maybe the folk you withdrew from will think through their position, and return," I suggested.

"I doubt it. They said when we put 'em out that they wished it had happened a long time ago. The woman said that she felt like she did when she passed a jail, every time she looked at us. No, I don't think they'll come back, and I hope they don't unless they give up their foolishness. We've never had the Holy Spirit in this congregation and we're not about to have it now. There's nothing that can upset the peace of a place like the Holy Spirit."

SURRENDERING OPINIONS

3. Why should one not divest himself of his opinion if it creates problems for others?

For the simple reason that no person can divest himself of an opinion which he honestly holds. It is an intellectual impossibility. If one thinks a thing is true he cannot say he believes it is not, without falsifying. When you study the revelation of God as fully as you can, putting together the scriptures as you are able, and you reach a conclusion which seems to reflect the tenor and meaning of the Bible on a certain subject, that conclusion becomes your conviction.

You cannot deny a conviction, either by your own effort or at the command of another. The fact is that the more you concentrate on an effort to remove it from your consciousness the more sharply will it be etched there. Men have been tortured, put on the rack, hanged on the gallows, and burnt at the stake for clinging to convictions which they could not erase and about which they would not lie. William Barclay wrote, "We would do well to remember that, in a great many matters, it is a duty to have our own convictions, but it is an equal duty to allow others to have theirs without regarding them as sinners and outcasts."

For example, if from your study you conclude that the coming of Jesus will precede the millennium, you cannot make it incredible by denying it is credible, when it was the apparent credibility of it which influenced you to accept it. All of the people on earth who disagree with you cannot drive it from your mind by declaring that it is incredible to them. They may influence you to re-examine it, but they cannot force you to mentally relinquish it until your own thought processes lead you to do so.

Any attempt at unity based upon conformity is doomed to failure. It is simply another way of expressing unity based upon coercion, or by edict of an authoritarian power structure. It is impossible to achieve because there are always honest men who, like God, cannot deny themselves, and who are willing to die rather than betray their true sentiments.

When brethren differ in opinions, God does not demand that they surrender them. He only requires that they do not despise or judge those who differ with them. One man believes he may eat all things while another because of conscientious scruples, eats only vegetables. Neither is required to give up his conviction out of respect for the other, because he cannot do so while he is sane and rational and possessed of his mental faculties.

The man who believes he can eat meat is asked only to suspend his practice out of deference for his brother's feelings. A man for whom Christ died is worth more than one's conviction about the right to eat meat or drink wine. He may continue to hold his personal opinion (or faith) and in the absence of offence, he may practice it. The Bible does not say "It is not right to eat flesh or drink wine, or anything by which your brother is made to stumble." Instead, it says "It is right not to do so!"

It is here that brethren often move in and make laws of their own, binding them upon men and even making them tests of fellowship. There is a great difference in saying it is not right to do a thing, and in saying it is right not to do it. At various times in history, professed followers of the Messiah have concluded it was a sin to eat flesh and have “commanded to abstain from meats.” At various times they have concluded it was a sin to drink wine as a table beverage, or in strict moderation, but this is a human legislation and not a divine one. Neither is a sin according to the scriptures and no one can prove that they are sins except by wresting the scriptures.

Paul places eating of meat and drinking of wine in the same category, as things not good to do if the doing causes a brother to stumble, be tripped up in his Christian walk, or rendered weak and powerless. The right to do a thing is secondary to a love for brethren. The right not to do certain things to protect a brother’s welfare is transcendent over the right to do them to demonstrate my strength of conviction.

I am resolved not to allow my personal conviction about issues and things to sever me from the brethren whom I love. I say this in spite of all the complaints and criticisms of the intellectuals among us. In his book Who Put the Bomb in Father Murphy’s Chowder?, Richard Frisbie, writes: “When the intellectuals stop complaining, it is either because a culture has died and there aren’t any intellectuals left, or because a police state has locked them all up. In a healthy society, all that diverts them from complaining about affairs generally is the pleasure of complaining about each other.” Have at it, brethren, I refuse to be affected or side-tracked!

Applied Dogmatism

Mission Messenger (November 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

*Religious society is the object of our present concern. Christian society is composed of infants, or minors, and adults. These, when admitted to the kingdom or commonwealth over which Jesus Christ presides, have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights. Amongst these are the preservation and enjoyment of Christian life, the acquisition and enjoyment of Christian reputation, and the pursuit and application of Christian wealth. These are the inalienable rights of Christians. They are all born equally free and equally independent of foreign agency.—Alexander Campbell, in The Christian Baptist, August 3, 1829, page 5.*

Since writing the main article and answering the questions it contains I have decided to express myself a little further about the serious problem created when dogmatism leads to despotism and reduces the Lord's children to mere serfs, stealing from them their glorious heritage of freedom in Christ. I will deal primarily with abuses of the eldership, but I would not have our readers think I am singling out elders because they are more obstinate and intractable than others. There are hundreds of wonderful and worthy men who are functioning as bishops. Those who are otherwise often stand as they do because of the influence of preachers and editors. They might have turned out to be good men if they had been left alone by the partisan and political manipulators.

In the organizational set-up which we have devised and which we confuse with the “Lord’s church” the eldership in many places has been elevated to a status unknown to the primitive saints. It is now an upper echelon power structure which wields control over the lives of saints which is virtually absolute and from which there can be no appeal for redress of grievances.

A few years ago two elders and less than one-third of the congregation in a midwestern state, publicly withdrew from a third elder and the remaining two-thirds of the congregation. The affair ended up in the civil court and various preachers were called to qualify as experts and to testify as to “the doctrine, the customs, the teaching and practice, of the church of Christ with respect to the question of who has the authority in a particular congregation.”

One of the oldest and best known preachers in the South, testified that the elders had the authority over the possession, custody and control of all buildings and physical property, and to regulate the programs and policies of the congregation, and if “a substantial body of the membership assumed a contrary attitude about the matter,” the elders could drive them out and retain control.

The opposing counsel, who was an elder of another congregation in Texas, said to the witness, “I will ask you if it is not the teaching and practice and custom and doctrine of the church all over the country, to accord to every member, officer or otherwise, of any congregation, the right of self-defense in a hearing or investigation of a charge against him? Answer that question.”

The prominent evangelist replied, “It is not mandatory, nor is it the practice of the church of Christ to accord to any man, necessarily, what you say. He may be withdrawn from, and is often withdrawn from, without even being advised the act was going to take place of being withdrawn from, and maybe not even notified for weeks he was withdrawn from.”

The transcript of the testimony furnished by the official court stenographer shows that the preacher hedged all over the place when he was asked to explain what Peter meant when he said, “Neither as lording it over the charge allotted to you, but making yourselves ensamples to the flock.” The witness, hailed as one of the greatest expositors in “The Church of Christ” miserably failed when the counsel bombarded him with that.

This is a case in point to demonstrate that the community founded upon faith and love often acts in an arbitrary and imperious manner not even countenanced among the kingdoms of this world. Imperial Rome, which savagely persecuted the Christians did not behave in such an arrogant and high-handed manner. Even Porcius Festus, the Roman procurator said, “I answered them that it was not the custom of the Romans to give up any one before the accused met his accusers face to face, and had opportunity to make his defense concerning the charge laid against him.” When the Roman political hacks demonstrate a greater fairness and justice toward those accused as criminals than elders of the church do toward their brethren, it is no wonder that young people flee the confines of the institutional church.

In a certain town out west the elders gave notice to a respected brother that he would have to quit holding Bible study and prayer sessions in his home on Tuesday nights until he received permission from them to conduct such meetings and they could assign one of their number to be present and keep an eye on the proceedings. The basis of this cease and desist order was a report which some local “Hawkshaw” had retailed to the elders that the host had called upon a good Baptist neighbor to petition the throne of grace while they kneeled on the living-room rug to pray.

A brother in Texas, a rather outstanding business executive who shares some of my views about fellowship, secured a bundle of papers each month which he kept on his office desk and passed out to those he thought might appreciate them. One day he received an official “writ of mandamus” demanding that he no longer distribute dangerous and harmful material, nor disseminate heresy produced by W. Carl Ketcherside. Although signed by all four elders, it did not sound like them. A little inquiry revealed it had been written by the preacher who then got the elders to affix their signatures to try and help save the congregation from the awful sin of regarding me as a brother. However, the preacher soon left town owing quite a few merchants who could not collect their accounts from him. No further notices were served on the brother in business, so he doubled his order for Mission Messenger and is passing out twice as many. It is interesting that each month, one of the elders comes up to the office and borrows one of the papers under the guise of seeing how far I am going!

Down south, in a beautiful city where anything can happen and practically every thing does, the elders went on a little enforcement binge to get everybody into their palatial structure every time the doors opened, and to build up the treasury for the programs they had arbitrarily included in the budget without consulting the rest of the saints. They held an exclusive meeting with the preacher and came up with a document which was mailed to every member declaring that any person who was absent without prior leave or permission for three consecutive Sundays would automatically have his name stricken from the roster, and in order to be re-instated would have to march down to the front on his return and confess his wrongs. The preacher not only approved this dogmatic action but tried to justify it in a sermon by misapplying the scriptures.

A lot of good folk who have been victimized by “The System” live in constant dread that the axe will fall upon them. The brethren have devised a chain of association ban, so when someone is cast out, a warning is issued not to have anything to do with him. And the remote control reaches down several links, so that a brother may be excluded for associating with someone, who associates with someone, who associates with the original one who was dismissed for thinking that Jesus may get here before the millennium does.

This creates some real problems of enforcement for the elders. In one place they excluded a brother who was the star bowler on a team which included two other members, one of whom was a deacon. The elders served notice on these two that they could continue to play with the one excluded but they must not step up to the snack counter with him in the rink because the Bible says, “With such a one no not to eat.” He could bowl on the same team but could not eat potato chips out of the same bag. The deacon, who told me about it, said he asked the elder, “Doesn’t the Bible say that the people sat down to eat and drink and rose up to play?” The elder replied that he did not know but would look it up!

All of this helps to develop some first-class sleuths, as well as some second-class sneaks. Once I was in a short series of meetings with a little group in a small southern town. I decided to get out and visit some of the brethren who were members of the larger congregation whose preacher had warned them from the pulpit the Sunday before not to attend my studies. “This will be your only warning and it is final,” he said.

At the first place I called, the brother came out on the porch and he was as nervous as a long-tailed cat in a room full of rocking chairs. He did not invite me in. He did not even ask me to be seated on the porch. Knowing this was hardly the hospitality for which the area was noted I watched the street. A black car cruised slowly by three times. Later I learned that it was one of the elders “casing the joint” to see if I was welcomed.

But now, before you feel inclined to “lower the boom” on the elders in our great land, pause a moment to realize that most of these brethren are basically good men. Outside of the organizational bailiwick they are polite and even genteel. But given a little power and placed under all the pressures applied by preachers, and neighboring congregations, they react emotionally, and even while destroying the body, think they are defending it. They are victims, like those under them, of the factional system which deceives men and destroys the best that is in them, burning the real manhood out of their hearts.

The party spirit is insidious and delusive. It has that subtle faculty of crushing out virtues and values, and of turning gentlemen into boorish and insulting personalities under the mistaken idea that to be loyal to Jesus one must be insolent to his brethren. That the sanctity of homes and the privacy of business offices can be violated by men who intrude themselves as guardians of the faith and morals is a clear indication of Satan's power to hoodwink both the perpetrators and the victims.

As bad as the usurpation of rights may be, however, it is not nearly so dangerous as the creation of unwritten creeds by which to judge the honest opinions of humble men and women and thrust them forth from congregations they have sacrificed to build. Nothing Rome has ever done as a persecuting power exceeds in spirit what "the Lord's church" has perpetrated in some localities. Let me mention one example to illustrate to you what I mean.

A certain man and his wife, members of a congregation they had labored to help build for almost a quarter of a century, found their marriage in difficulty for reasons which need not be mentioned here. Since all of their children were faithful in service to the congregation, and their grandchildren regularly attended, they knew they must find some answer to their problem which would allow them to finish their course with joy. In her desperation the wife mentioned her anxiety to a neighbor who was a devout Methodist. The neighbor told her that she and her husband had gone through the same trauma but had been delivered from it by an experience with Christ through the Holy Spirit.

One evening the Methodist couple knocked on the door and after being invited in, sat down and told them what had happened to their own lives through prayer. The apparent radiance they exhibited made an impression upon the man and his wife, and they sat talking until midnight after their neighbors had returned home. Although they had not prayed together for years, they finally were driven to their knees by an uncontrollable desire to talk to God, and with their arms about each other, weeping, sobbing and shaking, they confessed their real feelings and errors to one another, and cried unto God for help and strength.

This was a strange and uninhibited thing for them to do, but about two o'clock in the morning, according to their testimony, the wife said she felt a tingling sensation start at the crown of her head and travel down her entire body, and at once she uttered two or three words or syllables which made no sense to her. After this she experienced an ineffable sense of release and peace. They continued together to talk to God until the streaks of dawn appeared and they realized they had continued all night in prayer. In an embrace of deep trust and security they accepted one another, each as God's gift to the other.

It was the wife who made the mistake. In her newly-found release and happiness she simply had to tell someone. First she called her daughters and the daughter-in-law to tell them that Jesus was real and had moved into their home. It frightened her daughters who thought she had "gone off her rocker." One of them hurried over to check on her, with a promise to call her sister if she needed help to restrain her mother. She found her "clothed and in her right mind" sitting at the kitchen table and reading from The Living Bible.

That was not the mistake! It was made when the wife called one of her best friends, the wife of an elder. In less than two days the news had flashed throughout the whole congregation that the couple had “gone Pentecostal” and were having prayer meetings in their home with Methodists. Although their experience had only occurred on Monday night, when they arrived for midweek meeting on Wednesday night, things were different. Friends who greeted them were strangely subdued. They did not linger to visit as usual. The woman was seized with an impulse to throw her arms around the elder’s wife, but she later described it as trying to hug a gunny sack full of leaves and grass clippings. The elders were up front in conference with the preacher, both before and after the meeting, and did not come back to greet the audience as was their custom.

The next day one of the elders telephoned and asked if he and his fellow-elders could come over and meet with them on Friday night. They were invited to do so, and arrived at the time appointed. One of them opened by saying, “Well, I guess you know why we are here.” The husband replied, “No, we don’t but we praise God that you came.” When he said “praise God” it was as if someone had pulled the same string on three puppets. They all jumped at once. I need not bore you with the details.

The happy couple were informed that nothing really had happened unto them, that the days of supernatural signs had long since passed, and that which is perfect came about two thousand years ago. They were given orders not to mention or talk about any experience to any person, either in the church or out of it, and were informed that if they did not acknowledge their wrong it would be the duty of the elders to take appropriate action.

The wife spoke up, “But I cannot help speaking the things I have seen and heard.” The elders assured her that she had been mistaken, that she was overwrought and had been hysterical. One of them said, “You are a woman, you know!” It ended by the husband asking if they might pray together. Reluctantly the elders agreed but remained seated while the couple kneeled. After the husband had prayed, there was an awkward silence. No one else prayed but at the door one of the elders said, "I hope you'll realize we did what we had to do, and that you'll repent and return to the fold." As their car backed out of the driveway the man and his wife found themselves staring at one another in open-mouthed astonishment.

The following Sunday the preacher announced that error (he pronounced it "era") was rampant in the community, and to save the church from the evil work of Satan he was going to deliver a series of talks, six in number, on the work of the Holy Spirit. He went through the outlines received in the Christian college he had attended but almost "ran out of soap" before he finished. Meanwhile the couple did not broadcast what had happened, but when anyone asked about it related it as they had to the elders. When the preacher concluded his six dissertations one of the elders called and asked if they had seen their wrong and would acknowledge it. He became highly incensed when they calmly said they had not changed at all, and if anything, were even stronger in their conviction that something extraordinary had happened in their lives.

The next week they received a formal letter charging them with advocating false doctrine, insubordination to the elders, rebellion against Christ and refusing to acknowledge the truth as set forth by a faithful preacher of the word. They were notified that unless they contacted the elders before Saturday night, to indicate their repentance and willingness to confess the guilt of the charges, they would be withdrawn from on Sunday morning. On Sunday they occupied their accustomed seats. One of the elders stood up and read a statement to the effect that they had counselled and prayed over them to no avail and because of their stubborn adherence to error they were hereby excluded.

The brother arose and asked if he might say a word. The elder was nonplussed and upset, so the preacher quickly arose and stated that the church could not allow false teachers to speak, and quoted 2 John 9, 10, "If any man come and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house nor bid him Godspeed." A former elder, who had resigned three years before, then arose and said, "I do not think that scripture has any relation to this situation, and I suggest that we listen to what the brother has to say." The elder, who by this time had recovered his voice said, "Sit down and do it now! You are out of order! The elders have the authority here and you cannot question them. I'll prefer charges against you just like I did these other two."

In the next several weeks more than forty people were excluded because of their protests at such despotic measures. They began meeting in the home of one of the brethren. When I last heard from them they were happy in the company of one another. No one else had "spoken in tongues" but the warmth of the fellowship was such that they regarded their trials and persecutions as God's deliverance from an intolerable situation. There was no spirit of rivalry toward the brethren who had excluded them, but when any of them attended at the meetinghouse they were virtually ignored. Men who had contributed thousands of dollars to help erect it were never called upon to pray within its walls. Those who had made no commitment to Jesus were given a warm welcome when they attended, but the brethren were given a cold shoulder.

This would be a tragic occurrence, fit to make angels weep, if it were an isolated case. Such callous regard for fundamental human rights, with its repercussion in the family and social life of the saints is frightening to contemplate. It runs counter to the very spirit which Jesus came to inculcate. But evidence is mounting to indicate that it is a rather common phenomenon in many parts of the country. I am persuaded that scores of preachers are living in a state of internal disruption, torn between what God expects and what the elders demand. The erosion of personal integrity under such circumstances is great. Men pay a price for trying to conform outwardly while their very bowels scream out in anguished protest.

The sheep are being led through troubled and tempestuous waves rather than beside the still waters. They stand in abject terror and cannot lie down in green pastures. And it is the axe in the hand of the shepherds and not the fangs in the mouth of the wolf which they fear most. "The System" has become a Juggernaut, relentlessly grinding its way, and crushing the pilgrims beneath its tread. And as bad as all this may be the saddest feature is that it has substituted another creed for Christ. Regardless of how deeply one may trust in Jesus it is no longer of any avail. It is a personal opinion about this thing or that which opens or bars the door to congregational grace.

When our brethren exalt an opinion about instrumental music, the support of Herald of Truth, the millennium, cups, classes or colleges, to the place that a personal view about these cancels the divine-human relationship which Jesus came to create by His atoning blood, they have sold the church down the river and done despite to the Spirit of grace. When elders ruthlessly trample underfoot the very sense of human justice because men cannot deny an experience, whether they are mistaken about it or not, then we are on the road to tyranny and despotism.

Every scripture quoted to divide and separate brethren, and to fragment and splinter the glorious body of the Son of God is misapplied. Every arbitrary action to harass humble saints and to ride roughshod over their sensitive feelings without giving them opportunity for defense before their accusers is usurpation of the worst kind. It freezes ignorance at the present level, places a premium upon spiritual illiteracy and enshrines the status quo as the ultimate of heaven's plan. It stunts growth, stultifies the conscience and promotes hypocrisy of the deepest dye.

In conclusion, I testify again, as I have said before, that I admire and revere shepherds who look with love upon the flock of God. Such men are an inspiration to my life and a blessing to my soul. But I deplore those who become drunken upon the wine of their self-importance, and who play God with the lives of others. Jesus did not purchase the ekklesia as a kingdom for petty tyrants, but as the royal domain to be governed from heaven where He sits at the right hand of God.

May heaven deliver us from the system into which we have grown and which chokes the spiritual life out of the fairest and best, while retaining and exalting those who are blind conformists, and who mistake obsequious acquiescence to the will of men for obeisance to the Lamb of God. If this seems too strong, I can but say in the oft-quoted words of Thomas Jefferson, “I have sworn upon the altar of God eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man.”

Statement of Conviction

Mission Messenger (December 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

*Few of us take the pains to study the origins of our cherished convictions; indeed, we have a natural repugnance to so doing. We like to continue to believe what we have been accustomed to accept as true, and the resentment aroused when doubt is cast upon any of our assumptions leads us to seek every manner of excuse for clinging to them. The result is that most of our so-called reasoning consists in finding arguments for going on believing what we already have. — James Harvey Robinson in The Mind in the Making.*

It is a little bit strange how one can get caught up in the realm of controversy when he really doesn't want to be. As long as you pretend to love all of your brothers, without really loving any of them, or even yourself, you are fairly safe. You come under some fire, of course, but a life of loveless mediocrity does not attract too much flak. Preachers are not generally opposed to mediocrity. They feel comfortable around it. It is only unreserved love which men cannot stand. Such love is vulnerable because it is unlimited like the love of God. And, like all true love, it seeks for demonstration. It is active and outgoing. It cannot be stifled, sublimated or suppressed. It can only be nailed to a cross.

I have some well-intentioned advisers who are always suggesting to me to “let up on fellowship” and to write about other things for awhile. They would like for me to edit a safe, innocuous journal, until the furor subsides and the attacks dwindle away. “You have so much else to share,” they flatteringly say, “and you could meet with brethren who are not under suspicion or attack, and have a quiet existence until the sun sets.” These are nice people and they have my interest at heart. I love them as much as I deplore their advice.

What they overlook is that I am not so much concerned about sharing thoughts, ideas, or concepts, as I am interested in sharing life. I am not projecting a philosophy. I am following a Savior. And he left where he was and entered a world of agony and sin, to touch people, to mingle with the crowd, and to commend his love toward them all. I can’t stop writing about fellowship. I can’t quit talking about brotherhood. Since the love of God was poured out in my heart, and rivers of living water began to flow, I can’t dam up the channel. I’d break out in a dozen places. Anyway, I am on a float trip with God and not engaged in an engineering project to control the flow. I am not the least interested in playing it safe to please a party. I am only interested in risking everything to please my Lord.

The day that I learned that the fellowship of the Spirit is actually the sharing of eternal life, the life of God, I really became a new creation. God had received me, welcomed me and loved me ever since I was born from above, but I didn’t know what it was all about. I thought eternal life was like an old line insurance policy which you had to die to collect. And then I learned that if you have the Son, you have eternal life— now! That put it all together!

John said, “This life was made visible; we have seen it and bear our testimony we here declare to you the eternal life which dwelt with the Father and was made visible to us. What we have seen and heard we declare to you, so that you and we together may share in a common life, that life which we share with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ.” The expression “share in a common life” is a translation of koinonia. That’s the word translated “fellowship.” So fellowship is sharing the life of God. That is what I am called to do. “It is God himself who called you to share in the life of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord; and God keeps faith” (1 Corinthians 1:9). Praise His name!

No man has power to extend to me a share in eternal life, and no man has the power to withdraw it. When you look at the fellowship of the Spirit as God looks at it, it is downright silly for puny and ignorant men to talk about “withdrawing fellowship” from other brethren, the sons and daughters of the Lord almighty, who loves them and cherishes them as His own. Of course men can put you out of their synagogues and Jesus said they would (John 16:2). But anything fleshly and imperfect men can put you out of, you are as well off out of it as you would be in it. Being in it will not save your soul and being out of it will not damn you. All it will do is to free you from tyranny!

While our precious Lord was on earth, “Many even of the authorities believed in him, but for fear of the Pharisees, they did not confess it, lest they should be put out of the synagogues: for they loved the praise of men more than the praise of God” (John 12:42, 43). We have many yet who are scared silly by the Pharisees. Of all my faults and sins, and I have a lot of them, that is not one. Perfect love has cast out fear just as He said it would. I am not going to be bought off or frightened off. And I am not going to give up or quit. I shall remain in Christ if every synagogue on earth slams its massive door in my face. But men cannot put you out of the fellowship when around you and beneath you are the everlasting arms!

I get scores of letters from heartbroken brothers and sisters who tell me they have been “withdrawn from.” Pompous men, filled with pride of office have issued dogmatic decrees. They must deny the premillennial coming of the Lord. They must cease to talk about the present-day work of the Holy Spirit. They must quit holding prayer meetings in their homes unless an elder is present. They must publicly admit that they think instrumental music in connection with the praise of God is a sin. They must ask forgiveness for meeting with a congregation of saints where the brethren study the word of God in Bible classes.

When these consecrated ones could not stifle their consciences and lie about their feelings, they were “cashiered out” of the congregation and drummed out of the regiment. If they had been willing to lie they could have stayed in. They should dry their tears, cease to tremble and begin to praise God. They should shout for sheer joy. “Oh the bliss that is yours when men shall persecute you and revile you and say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake.” What men do to you will not have one thing to do with the fellowship of the Spirit. The Spirit is not led by men, but men need to be led by the Spirit.

Imagine the callous indifference involved in trying to dissolve the blood-purchased, heaven-cemented ties of brotherhood over some of the inane, piddling and petty issues which have fragmented and fractured us. Shall we cut off an organ of the body trying to cure a flea bite? Shall we bomb God’s great heritage into oblivion because of a molehill in the front yard? What kind of fraternity is it which requires a man to lie about his convictions to remain a part of it? What manner of brotherhood is it which demands that one sublimate and crucify his honest opinions to prove that he is “faithful”? Did Jesus pay the cruel price to form a faction of men and women who spend their lives playing tiddley-winks with pawns of trivia?

Fellowship is a beautiful, inspiring and exhilarating word. It speaks of everlasting arms around us and beneath us, of riding upon eagles’ wings and basking in the sunlight of a love so great that it soars above human understanding. It is Jesus bending down to find a lost sheep and laying it upon his shoulder. It is a Father folding us to his bosom and soothing a broken heart. It is not arguing, striving, or debating over the merits of this or that thing as if the kingdom of heaven depended upon every person in the whole wide earth seeing it exactly as I do and agreeing with me in every minute particular.

Once I knew no better than to think that our feeble attainments constituted the divine criterion by which to measure everyone else. I mistook a life of stale conformity for the glorious communion of the Spirit. How wrong I was! How mistaken! How fallacious were the applications I made of the heaven given scriptures as I quoted them to justify our divisions when they were penned to promote that unity planned by the Father. My shame for such abuse is equalled only by the praise for Him who delivered me from feeling a need to try and vindicate a narrow traditional factional course.

I am constantly assailed now by questions in journals and queries in letters asking me if the divine-human relationship is all there is to fellowship. They want to know if there are not aspects of it which relate to association with brethren and engaging with them in their various enterprises. Of course there are, but all of them are within the bounds, and grow out of the relationship I sustain to Jesus. It is precisely because I am in the Father that I have brothers in the Lord. It is because I am in the fellowship with Christ that I am an organ among other organs constituting the one body. Brotherhood results from a common Fatherhood, fellowship is the sharing of a common Sonship.

Statements like that upset some of the brethren who are editors of partisan journalistic mouthpieces among us. One of them, who edits a pretty prominent paper in Texas occasionally takes a sly little dig at my reasoning, so he can prove to the segment for which he carries the torch that he is still “loyal” and not becoming infected with the “Ketcherside view.” I feel a deep sense of compassion for men like this. I know how they feel. Once I was just as sectarian in attitude as they are now.

It is unscrupulous to quote passages regulating my relationship to a world of pagans and aliens and apply them to my relationship to redeemed and reconciled saints. It is unfair to God's word given to urge the saints to separate from an idolatrous culture and use it to encourage brethren to separate from one another. Talk about "respect for the authority of God's word"! Brethren who thus twist and wrest the scriptures ought to be afraid to meet God in the last day. Separation of God's family from the world is commanded, division among brethren is condemned. Not even an oracle from Arkansas can change that!

But having said this we must realize that there will always be differences of opinion, understanding and interpretation among brethren who think. Sincere men who love God will not see everything alike. They never have done so. They never will do so, and to demand that as a basis for fellowship is but to kindle the flames of schism and throw more fuel on the fires of division. Such a course will not produce better Christians. It will only make bigger hypocrites.

But can men endorse actions in others against which their consciences revolt? Of course not! Can they participate in actions which their hearts cannot condone? Certainly not! It would be absurd to request them to do so! But the fact they cannot participate in some practices with brethren does not mean they cannot participate in any. In a physical family, if one brother smokes cigarettes, another brother who is deeply opposed to smoking cannot engage in it with him. He cannot purchase cigarettes for his brother nor light them for him. But that does not mean they cannot paint the house together, or eat at the same table. They are still brothers, even though there is something in which they cannot mutually engage. One is a brother who smokes, one is a brother who does not, but they do not need to divide the family into two parties which will not speak to one another, or go to visit the father together.

In the family of God, if one cannot contribute to a television program sponsored by certain brethren, he can withhold his support from the program, but he cannot scripturally withhold his company from the brethren. The fact that he cannot support the television project does not mean he cannot join with the brethren in prayer, study of the word, inner-city or foreign mission endeavors. We should certainly work together up to the point of division and not shiver the trunk of the tree because the limbs grow in different directions. It is both childish and unscriptural to deny brotherhood because we differ on what brethren may do in Christ Jesus. It is a sin against God to divide over the method of support for propagandizing the gospel or caring for the needy. If one cannot conscientiously support a method he ought not, but to divide into warring and hostile parties is sinful and shameful. It is just as sinful to be frightened into endorsing, maintaining and perpetuating such schisms.

It is wrong to pay lipservice to brotherhood and fellowship, and to pretend we are all brethren and then treat one another as half-brothers, outcasts, or step-brothers. The fact is that some among us treat pagans with greater politeness than they do brethren who differ with them and are too honest to deny it or pretend that they do not. This whole “withdrawal bit” which has become an inglorious obsession with some “Churches of Christ” and is enshrined as a part of Church of Christism is a work of the flesh. It is simply the party spirit or factionalism dressed up in the stolen livery from the wardrobe of God and passed off as a manifestation of loyalty. Nothing can be more disloyal to God than driving out and spiritually murdering His other children!

Those who are high on “the authority of God’s word” need to tell us on what ground they ignore the plain teaching of the scriptures on loving and receiving the brethren, in order to hound them out over matters which the scriptures do not even mention. Is the silence of God to be interpreted so as to countermand the revelation of God? What about the scores of passages about loving the brethren, living in peace, and welcoming one another as God welcomes us? Can these be ruthlessly tossed into our institutional garbage cans as having no meaning, value, or authority?

It seems imperative at the close of the year that I state again my personal position. I do so in full view of the fact that I must meet my Lord face to face and answer for every word. I welcome as my brother in Christ every sincere believer in Jesus Christ who has been immersed on the basis of that faith. I am in the fellowship with all such. I share with them the common life of the indwelling Spirit of my God. I make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. Any person who is good enough to be received by the Father is not too bad for me to welcome. My creed is Christ! If one is related to Christ through the Spirit I am related to him as a brother. The umbrella of God's love is great enough to overshadow brethren of diverse opinions and views. That is what mercy is all about. It is what grace really accomplishes. I am not in perfect agreement with any other human being under that umbrella. I cannot share with any one of them in all he thinks, does, or says. I am committed to discussing with every one of them our differences as long as I live, but I will do so as a brother in the one body and not as a representative of another faction. I no longer represent any faction or sect among us!

So I shall receive all of the saints while I do not condone fully what any of them think or practice. I shall receive them as God received me, not because of how much I knew but because of Him in whom I had come to trust. I am justified by faith and not by a superior knowledge. The grace of God can save an Igorot as well as an intellectual. In my own imperfection I dare not demand perfection of God's other children. But agape is love for those you cannot like and my love reaches out to embrace all of God's children in their frailty and failures. It reaches out to them wherever they are, just as He reaches out to them the same way.

I eagerly pray that you will overcome the sectarian bias and the provincial prejudice which keeps you aloof from the family of the Father, the whole family, and not just those who live within your little compound. Tear down the fences men have erected. Break down the bars of tradition. Let love reign and rule and conquer, and you will be a peacemaker and be called a child of God!

Letters to the Editor

Mission Messenger (December 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

It occurred to me that you might like to look over my shoulder and read some of the questions contained in letters I receive. A lot of good folk are concerned about what is transpiring in our day. Some of them are worried. And their letters exhibit their feelings. Without identifying the writers here are a few random questions and my reply to them.

1. How can you justify the fact that you seem to preach for the Christian Church as much as you do for the Church of Christ?

You are mistaken. I do not preach for either one. I share my feeble knowledge of God's revelation wherever I am invited to do so and welcome the opportunity. But I am not a front man for any partisan group on earth. God does not recognize any of our parties as the church of which his Son is the head. There is only one body and all the saved on earth, without exception, are members of it.

There is no such thing as "the Christian Church" or "the Church of Christ" in God's sight. Neither is there in my sight. I no longer regard our walls and fences as being valid. I ignore them and go among all the brethren. I have made a promise to the Father that I will go wherever a door is opened up unto me of the Spirit, and will lovingly teach all who will listen. I intend to keep that promise as long as I live. I am speaking for Jesus, but speaking to men.

2. How can you help people see the light if you fellowship them in things that are wrong?

You have a wrong slant on fellowship. I do not fellowship people or things, but I am in the fellowship with all who are in Christ. Fellowship is a state of sharing, into which we are introduced by responding to God's call. If a man is in Christ I am in Christ with him and we are in the fellowship. He will think and do things which I cannot condone or endorse. But we are not in the fellowship because we are perfect in life or understanding but because we are in Christ.

All of us are ignorant about many things and the fellowship is the sharing of a common life by finite beings who are often mistaken.

To be in the fellowship does not mean that we excuse, condone or endorse anything we believe to be wrong. It means we recognize the relationship we sustain in Jesus as of greater importance than our opinions, and that by working together as a unit we can help one another to greater knowledge and service. The Holy Spirit placed all of us in one body. Our task is to guard the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. We face up to our differences, not as aliens or enemies, and not as tribal spokesmen in rivalry, but as brothers in one Lord. That way we can help one another see the light on many things.

3. Isn't all this talk about unity in diversity a real come-off? Is that unity at all?

Certainly it is unity and the only kind there will ever be among thinking men who are not puppets or pawns for sectarian editors. It is silly to talk about any other kind of unity as if it were possible, or even desirable. God did not make us like a row of gingerbread men stamped out by a divine cookie cutter. Our mental capacities are as divergent as our facial features. We can no more all think alike than we can all look alike.

We will never agree upon everything, nor do we need to do so to be one. The primitive saints had many varied views but were one body in Christ. Our unity is not achieved by us but is supplied by God. It is the fact that we are all indwelt by the same Spirit which makes us one. The members of the spiritual body are like those of the physical body. Each has a different role or function. It is not performing identical services but working in unison which makes a unit of the one body into which we are gathered.

The only unity there is in any group composed of human beings is that of diversity. Every family which works together has unity in diversity. The children do not always agree with their parents but they love one another more than they love their diverse opinions. We are the United States but each state of the union is diverse from all the others. Religious politicians ought to quit trying to “con” brethren into thinking they can have unity based on conformity. There is no such thing among fallible men! If there was it would stifle all further growth and development. Unity in diversity is God’s plan for mankind!

4. What can I do to encourage the unity of the believers of which you speak?

The first thing you can do, and it is very important and extremely vital, is to begin to visit meetings of brethren outside the segment with which you are affiliated. All sharing begins with association. As long as all of us are locked up in our tight little compartments, we will only strengthen our own factional spirit. Break out of the sectarian barriers. Be loyal to Jesus and not to a party. If you cannot go to other meetings on Sunday morning, make a point of doing so on Sunday nights, or at other times.

Be friendly and cordial when you go. Don’t rush for the door as soon as the benediction is finished. Become acquainted with those who attend there. If you want to help God's ultimate program be an ambassador of peace. I go to all kinds of places, including little "storefront churches" and I simply make myself available for God to use as He wills. I am thoroughly convinced that He will open up great doors and effectual if I am willing. I think you should resolve to visit at least twelve other groups in the coming year, and more than that if you can.

5. I am a Junior in high school and I wanted to start a rap session one night per week, but the elders will not allow us to have it at the church. What should I do?

Have it somewhere else! A meetinghouse is probably one of the worst places to have it anyway, because those who come feel uptight and not really free to participate. There's nothing wrong about having it there. Where we attend, the kids are well into their second year of such a weekly gathering. But if it is off limits to you, have it in a home. Someone will let you have it in the living-room of their house or apartment. If you conduct it in reverence and godly fear, and outgrow the facilities, God will open up a place for you. He always does!

I'd like to suggest, if the authorities permit, that you start a prayer and rap session at school once per week. Hold it in the morning before school starts. It will almost certainly grow in interest. I was at one school lately where four kids met for prayer for more than a month before it began to grow. The morning I was there more than a hundred were present at seven o'clock in the morning. In another place, the kids who are for Jesus bring a sack lunch and eat and pray together every day at noon. I was with them two days to answer questions. All kinds of kids dropped into the laboratory where they meet.

In another school the Bible Club was listed as a definite social activity project, which made it possible for them to meet once per month in the library. The day I spoke to them there were 225 present out of a total enrollment of less than a thousand. These young people had changed the moral climate of the whole school. I am anxious to hear from young people in high school who are on fire for Jesus and doing something to bring a witness where they attend. If you have something going write and let me know. I'll use your letter to encourage others who would like to get going but have been stymied so far.

6. I live in an apartment complex and I am alone every day until my husband returns from his office in the evening. Is there anything I might do to help with the work of Christ?

Indeed there is! God has raised you up for such a time as this. He has planted you in that apartment as his minister of reconciliation. First, start praying that God will take you and use you for his purpose. Make yourself like putty in his hands, non-resistant and ready to be fashioned by his will. Then start thanking him for placing you there as his divine agent, for that is what you must really become.

Invite some of the neighbor women over to a mid-morning coffee "klatch," and tell them you'd like to start a weekly Bible study, and you need their help. Explain that you would like to begin the next week with the epistle of James because it is so practical. Ask those who will promise to come to read the first chapter in advance. Urge them to invite their friends to come with them. Do not be disappointed if only three or four come the first time. Thank God for those who are there and do not moan about those who are not. It will grow!

I know a sister in the Lord who moved into a new neighborhood and started a study in her home. It is now attended by women of all religious backgrounds, and the discussions are lively and informative. I went one day, by invitation, to answer some knotty problems which had arisen. We ended up staying about three hours conversing about the word of God. I know another sister who secured a room in the local YWCA building for a Bible study one morning each week. She advertised it in the neighborhood newspaper, and it is now attended by more than forty women. I spoke to them once when in the area and found them alive and vibrant, anxious to talk about the Book. God has a work for all of us but we must be willing to do it.

There has never been an era more conducive to small group study than the present. The lonely crowd is looking and longing for a chance to relate. The individual Christian has an opportunity to serve now like never before in history. Of course, he must love men's souls, and be willing to start with them where they are and as they are! Life styles are not imposed. They are imitated. If we want to change people we must give them an example to follow.

When Benjamin Franklin decided to do something about the dark cobblestone streets in Philadelphia, over which people stumbled after dark, he did not start writing articles of protest in the paper, nor convene the citizens to appoint a committee to make recommendations. Instead he placed a long bracket above his front door, and hung a lantern from it. Each day he polished the globe and each evening lighted the wick. People walking the streets after night trod safely in the circle of light in front of the Franklin house. Soon others began to put up lanterns and before long the streets were well lighted.

I wish a lot of the brethren who promised, before they retired on social security, that they were going to work for the Lord, would get with it. Some of them have done nothing except walk around with a fishing rod or a golf club in their hands, complaining about inflation and the deflation of the dollar. Forget it, and start a Bible study in your home for the rest of the retired people who are just as bored as you are. Sharing your knowledge with others is better than arguing with your wife about which shirt to put on when you eat out!

7. Are the efforts being made to encourage recognition of fellowship making any real progress that you can see?

Indeed they are! Great gains are being made all over this land. Proof of this is found in the frantic efforts of the defenders of partisan orthodoxy to turn the minds of the saints back to parochial legalism. The most stringent factions admit they are losing brilliant young preachers and even some older brethren, who are no longer satisfied with the sectarian stance they have been taught.

Hundreds of brethren are re-thinking their position in the light of advancing knowledge and more profound scriptural insights. Factional leaders are in for a difficult time as men throw off the mental shackles and reject the brainwashing tactics which enslaved so many and made increasing strife and division a foregone conclusion. In many cases it is possible for brethren from divergent groups to meet in love and tolerance and listen to each other in spite of their variant views.

Debates between brethren have lost their appeal and few are being held today. No one seems more out of place than the swaggering arrogant challenger who parades around trying to drum up a public wrangle. Calm study and research are replacing public discussion with its emotionally charged atmosphere and its striving for partisan victory. It is true that some college lectureships, seeking to project an image of defenders of the bastion, present one-sided attacks upon those who plead for fellowship in Christ. This alone is an indication that effective gains are being made. These men are not “flogging a dead horse.”

You may look for even greater manifestations of love across party lines in the future. Younger brothers and sisters will no longer buy the kind of exclusive better-than-thou spirit which has hand-cuffed us in the past. They will reject creedal Church of Christism exactly as they turn away from other creeds and isms and for the same reason. The sectarian attitude has had its day!

8. To what factor in your own approach do you attribute the growth of interest in fellowship and unity?

I do not deserve any particular credit. I just happened along at the right time. A lot of other brethren I could name have done a lot more than I have because of their superior qualifications. But when God got through to me and I became convinced of the consummate folly of our own sectarianism I became deadly in earnest about sharing the message of peace with all of the saints.

I have not avoided or evaded confrontation with those who seek to defend our human traditions. Repeatedly I have offered to go at my own expense to Florida College, Abilene Christian College, David Lipscomb College, or Pepperdine University, and be questioned publicly by a panel of three faculty members chosen by the administration, or by the student body as a whole. It is significant that not one of these institutions of “higher learning” has accepted this offer in spite of the fact that my name has been repeatedly mentioned in classes and I have been attacked while not present. Of course, the students are well aware of all this and their innate sense of fairness and justice causes them to rebel against the frightened institutional attitude.

I recall the words of William Jennings Bryan upon one occasion, “I have a fight on my hands and I am on the defensive. I have been on the defensive all my life, but when I am defending a thing I do not wait for the enemy to come and attack; when I find there is to be an attack, I go over and do the fighting on the enemy’s territory.” Of course, it is really not that bad with me. I do not regard the brethren who attack me by name in their journals as enemies. They are simply defenders of the partisan status quo. When I had a sectarian concept of God’s community I acted just like they do now.

The greatest factor leading to saner thinking is the “fulness of time.” People are weary and tired of fighting one another over secondary issues. The narrow bitter attitude inherited from a frontier culture has no place in the lives of those who are maturing in Christ. Sectarian littleness has had its day. Men who do their best to drum up a following over artificial issues, and who seek to appear as the last defenders of embattled truth are in for a hard time. Brethren are fed up with being made financial angels to bail out someone’s new crusade against an imaginary threat. Unity in Christ will displace division over “crisis issues” invented to justify existence of journals spawned by schism. Better days are in the offing! Praise the Lord!

Return to Sanity

[Abstract]

There are a lot of things transpiring in these days which are occasions for real joy. God is working in a wondrous manner to bring together brethren who have been separated and isolated and who have sometimes hated each other without cause. I am thrilled at the discovery of brothers and sisters I never knew I had. The number of these is growing all of the time.

Yesterday while I was writing on the manuscript for my next book the doorbell rang and when I opened the door there stood a young man who said he had been praying for an opportunity to meet me. He was driving through Saint Louis and decided to come and see if I was at home. His story was almost identical with scores of others I have heard the last two years. He grew up in a “Church of Christ” family, was baptized when he was eleven years of age, and encouraged from the time he started high school to “study and become a preacher.” Since the congregation was one which had split over “the institutional question” it was assumed he would attend the “loyal school” in Florida, which he did. He developed a wholesome respect for the faculty and a close relationship with most of the students. But as he began to cultivate his rational powers, and his thinking processes were awakened, he became vaguely uneasy about the validity of the divisiveness which was condoned and encouraged.

The students privately discussed the glib answers handed down by visiting preachers and debaters who were regarded as celebrities while on campus, and some of the students were smart enough to recognize fallacies and detect weak spots. They never thought of bucking “the system” and expected to continue in the framework of the party when they went forth to preach. But there was some heart-searching and mental unrest.

My name came in for rather frequent mention in classes and in private. I was presented as a heretic who had abandoned every scriptural principle, without respect for the word of God, and who would “fellowship” anyone who verbally admitted a faith in Jesus, whether he was baptized or not. Students were told that once I had stood upon a scriptural basis, in spite of certain extremes, but I had now abandoned all of that and swung completely over to “liberalism” of the worst kind.

He also told me that I was held up as one of the most dangerous men in the whole theological spectrum. I was a persuasive orator and a genius with both pen and voice so that even strong men who came under my spell were lured into apostasy and spiritual destruction. I was depicted as Satan’s most effective agent alive today, a man who could make black look white and vice versa. Some of the students developed a sort of moral and morbid fright of me, although they had never seen me or read a word I had written.

One Sunday this lad was sent to preach at a certain congregation and was invited home by one of the deacons. He wanted to demonstrate to his host that he was both faithful and alert to danger so he began to tell him about me. The man asked him if he knew me or had read anything I had written. When he admitted all he had was hearsay, the deacon told him he had misrepresented me. He gave him one of the bound volumes of my paper and asked him to read it and mark the things which were unscriptural so they might discuss them upon the occasion of his next visit.

The brother told me with what trepidation he took the volume back to the campus and how fearful he was that he might be discovered reading from what one good brother referred to as “the arch-heretic of liberalism.” But the more he read the more engrossed he became. He wrote to me and I replied at once. He became a regular reader of MISSION MESSENGER. And now we were sitting together in the same room— a man of sixty-five and another not nearly half as old. And we were brothers! There was no question about that!

He wanted to apologize for the way he had regarded me and the things he had said about me. He was conscience-stricken because he had been brainwashed by hearsay evidence, most of it from preachers who did not know me either. I told him I was long past the place where “preacher gossip,” which is always rife in all parties, created any concern. I no longer have to worry about standing in with party “somewhats” and so I am not afraid what men shall do unto me. Peace, it’s wonderful!

I told the young brother what had happened years ago when I visited the school and came in for attack from “loyal” brethren like Pat Hardeman, Bill Humble, and G. K. Wallace. All of these have now been turned out as “liberals” and have been marked off the factional roster of the faithful. Others who are there now will suffer the same fate when the political machine grinds them as grist. The defenders of today are the defamed ones tomorrow. It will always be thus when the system is built upon conformity, for it is difficult to freeze ignorance at the current level. It is impossible when men reason and think.

It is good that we are bursting out of our shells and starting to breathe the air of freedom. And it is happening clear across the board. Some of the greatest contributions to liberty in Christ are being made by young brethren who have grown up in the segment which makes a test of fellowship out of the use of individual cups and classes. Most of them still labor with congregations which have one container and an undivided assembly for study and edification, but they are not uptight about it, and would not dream of drawing a line of fellowship against brethren who do not share their position.

Brethren who always used multiple cups but were dubbed the “anti-Sunday School group” are truly taking the lead in promoting unity in many areas. Brilliant, incisive men, some of whom were noted debaters, are rejecting partisan fighting and are choosing the worthier course of becoming peacemakers. The fact is that not a single group of saints is unaffected by the plea for unity of the believers. Of course, every group has brethren who decry manifestation of love to others and call it compromise, but their influence is waning and a greater sense of oneness is affecting the hearts of men all over the land.

I am constantly receiving letters from every state in the nation in which brethren confess they are changing their position. They are coming to realize they have mistaken loyalty to tradition with fidelity to the scriptures. They are trying to undo the effect of their previous bigotry and intolerance. Perhaps never since the inception of this historical movement has it seen such a leavening influence as it is now experiencing. Raucous cries of hatred and hostility, and acrimonious accusations, fall upon ears no longer attuned to them.

Our brethren are marching to the sound of a different trumpet. They are no longer moved by the uncertain sound of the factional horns. We are growing up in Christ. We are maturing in the Spirit. Perhaps God is again preparing us to resume the march toward the goal from which a century and a half of internecine fighting has deflected us. If so, tomorrow will be brighter than today!

One of the best things happening, as I see it, is that men are starting to trust in Jesus as their hope, rather than in the church, which often means the party organization. This frees them to love others realistically as God loves them. It is not necessary to get people into a particular category or pigeon-hole to know how to treat them. One need not ask how they stand on this thing or that before calling upon them to lead prayer or share in praise. Loyalty is not tested by what you are against, but by your being with Jesus. The fundamental question is not, "What do you think of instrumental music?" but "What think ye of Christ? whose Son is he?"

This allows each person to retain his personal conviction as to things without affecting his relationship to others. The faith which should be shared with everyone is not affected by the faith which should be kept to one's self. It is a real sign of spiritual maturity when one can love and receive those who hold divergent views, simply because they follow one Lord and are in one body. It is only shriveled intellects which measure the standing of others, not by the breadth of God's word, but by the narrowness of their human understanding. This is the root of papal authority, the fruit of which is assumption of infallibility.

We will not lead the world to Jesus along the divisive path we have trodden in the past. We will negate our own influence, and lose our own children. We must renounce our past approach. It only leads us deeper into the swamps of schism. We must pull our feet out of the stinking ooze and plant them on higher ground. We should not strive to salvage any of our sectarian trappings. They will but burden us on the onward march. We must abandon our unsavory attitudes and discard our unwholesome trappings. With crushed spirits because of our past failures, but with unbroken courage for the future we must begin anew the trek toward sanity and renewal.

Everywhere there are signs that this is happening. I rejoice to see it with joy unspeakable. Let fearless men arise to proclaim anew the truth that makes men free! Let the party spirit die, be buried and never resurrected to plague us again. Let the Holy Spirit fill the hearts and animate the lives of all of us. Jesus reigns as sovereign over all the earth. Let no one else lay claim to the throne-room of our hearts. Jesus! Jesus only! Jesus as Lord, now and forever, world without end! This is my story, this is my song! Let us all sing it together and in harmony.

Two Years More

Mission Messenger (December 1973)

Volume 35

[Abstract]

It was just one year ago I announced in these pages I intended to cease publication of MISSION MESSENGER on December 1, 1975. We have just two more years of editing a paper, which began as a little inconsequential journal, and now goes all over the world. I reached the conclusion to halt this phase of my life after more than half of my earthly sojourn has been actively involved in it. It was not easy to do. I wrestled with the matter for months until I felt I had an answer to my prayers as to God's will for my lessening existence.

Editors often tend to feel they are indispensable. They come to the place where they think neither God nor the brethren can do without them. The result is their thinking, which seems so precious to them, becomes ever less meaningful to the saints, who simply quit reading what they write. This causes the editors to feel unappreciated and neglected. They rail at others for putting them on the shelf when actually they crawled upon it themselves to gain a better vantage point from which to snap at those who pass by below.

The paper is now at its highest point in readership. One month this year, July, broke our previous record. This runs counter to all past experience. The summer months have generally brought a drop off. I want the paper to expire gently, as a faithful servant in the arms of those who love him, at the very peak of his strength and virility. I want it to die, as I would like to die, facing the world in vigor until the dart of death brings release. I do not want it to go like an outworn stag making a pitiable stand against a boulder while the slavering jaws of a wolf pack move ever closer, waiting for the inevitable moment for the fight to be ended.

Ever since I announced my decision I have been besieged by letters pleading with me to reconsider. A lot of dear people have said they can hardly bear to think of not receiving the paper each month. It has brought help and comfort to them in difficult circumstances. Most of all, it has brought hope, real hope that the church will return to sanity, even after having gone so far out of its mind as to lash at itself and devour its own flesh.

A good many have volunteered to continue the paper if I would give it to them, and some have offered to buy it. But my decision is irrevocable. If someone else sought to edit it, it would not be MISSION MESSENGER, for this paper is simply Nell and myself. It has been kept alive by our own sweat and blood, and sometimes watered by our tears. It is the two of us coming to visit you each month, like your folks from down home. The paper is not profound or sophisticated. It is not dolled up in Sunday clothes. It is a country journal, the same kind of homely fare in the literary field as ham and grits and red-eye gravy on the kitchen table. I would not be qualified to edit a scholarly periodical if I wanted to do so. Fortunately, I don't want to!

The death of the paper will be as unostentatious as its birth. We began without a flourish and will conclude the same way. The last issue will simply be a farewell. I will not sell the mailing list and I will not give it away. I regard a subscription as a covenant and a faithful trust. I would as soon sell the addresses of our children and grandchildren for others to exploit as to sell the names of my brothers and sisters for profit. I know that is regarded as old-fashioned and quaint, but that's the way it is,

and that's the way I am.

For years I have had to resist attempts of brethren to organize us, dress the paper up, get an office, up the subscription price, and pay me a salary as editor. In each instance I've told them to start a paper on their own and I'd advertise it for them without charge, but to let us alone. Nell and I have continued to do all of the work except the printing, in our own house. It is the editorial sanctum, the addressing department, the circulation area, and the mailing room. And it only has two employees, neither of them paid. All of the books are wrapped and prepared for mailing in the garage. Sometimes Nell does it, sometimes I do it. It really isn't much, when you think about it!

Some of you will be pleased to know that I'm closing down the paper so I can get on with the things I really love to do—writing books. There are seven simmering on the back mental burner now, waiting for the opportunity to be served up. Most of them have been started. You'll be hearing about them as they are born. I must hurry because time is running out! I plan to submit articles to other journals where they will be scrutinized by other and younger editors who may weed out material which might hinder rather than help.

I have lived to see many prestigious journals fold up because of rising costs. The subscription rate for our little paper does not even begin to pay for its publication. It has been kept alive by brothers and sisters whose hearts have been touched and prompted by God to share their substance with us because they too believe in “bringing glad tidings of peace on earth to men of goodwill.” Many of them we have never met but they have been willing to stake their generous giving upon the integrity of Nell and myself. And each year we have ended up with all obligations paid and without a cent of debt. This year is no exception. We owe no one on earth anything except our love!

You do not know who these donors are, but we know and God knows! We are trusting Him to reward their generosity with His mercy and lovingkindness. The greatest risk we have ever faced financially will come in 1975, when we can no longer take subscriptions, while the cost goes on, many hundreds of dollars each month. We are not worried in the least. Many of our faithful helpers will continue with us until the last round is fired and the flag is furled and laid away as a memorial of the power of love, in the battle against partisanship and hostility toward God's wonderful people!

Thank you for reading our feeble offerings through the years. If you desire to continue reading until the end, send only two dollars and you will be enrolled for the duration. If your heart is moved to send more, the surplus will be used to take up the differential in cost of printing and production, and in the fund to mail out free books to college and university students. We have sent in excess of nine hundred volumes of my works all over the earth, without a cent of obligation to students. We have even paid the cost of wrapping and mailing. Praise God for your help!

All of the papers for 1973 will now be bound in an attractive book called "The Question Box." If you want one or more for your library, why not send your order now and we will enclose an invoice for the minimal amount when we send it to you? If you'd like the last three bound volumes simply request Nell to place you on the permanent list and they will be sent as they are ready for mailing.

The articles next year will deal with some of our real organizational problems and I will be saying some things I have long wanted to say. The book which results from the 1974 articles will be called Pure Words. For only ten dollars you can put five of your friends on for the life of the paper. For one hundred dollars you can do the same for fifty members of your congregation. Do you know of a better reading bargain than this? If you plan to send gift subscriptions, please hurry so we can start them with the January issue. If you'd like to receive twenty-five or fifty copies each month to hand out, write for our bundle rate. It will surprise you!

Nell joins me in this expression of thanks and appreciation to all of you. We love you whether you agree with what you read in the paper or not. If you have been accepted by the Father as a child, we accept you as our brother or sister. It is just that simple.

Defining My Purpose

Mission Messenger (January 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

On March 1, 1711, a British journal called The Spectator was introduced to the reading public by Sir Richard Steele. Associated with the Dublin-born essayist was Joseph Addison whose writing style was acclaimed for its polish, grace and elegance. The journal lasted but two years, and during that brief span carried 236 articles by Steele and 274 by Addison. Today, in literary circles, Addison is remembered chiefly because of the Sir Roger de Coverly Papers. I remember him because of his suggestion that authors must remain in the flames of purgatory until the influence of their evil writings has disappeared. For some that would mean forever.

I have been long fascinated by the power of speech, the faculty by which human beings can take abstract ideas and put them into words, and utter them in such a manner that others hearing the sounds in combination can grasp the idea which flits through the mind of the speaker. The physical organs which make speech possible are proof of the majestic design and creativity of God. The palate which acts as a sounding-board for projection and the teeth which play a role in the formation of certain sounds are contrived in such a fashion that the tongue can use them for its proper function.

Man was created as a social being. As such, he must be able to communicate with his fellows. I happen to believe he was so made that he might also converse with his creator and receive communications from Him. I have long argued that man's ability to speak is proof that he was made by an intelligent being who possessed the power to speak prior to man's creation. Speech is an imitative and repetitive process. No one has ever spoken who was not first spoken to.

A baby, taken at birth from all human association, and reared by animals, would not speak but would whine or growl in animalistic gutturals. The idea that sophisticated human speech developed from such animal sounds through millions of years of snapping and snarling, is a little bit absurd, and would require faith in a much greater miracle than that of creation by a beneficent personality in the beginning. It is my conviction that the first man began speaking only after being addressed by God and thus being taught by Him. Man heard speech before he began to speak. The record of this transaction in the book we designate Genesis, is accurate so far as I am concerned.

While all of this is most interesting, and provided the subject of a rather lengthy dissertation in one of my books, it is not now my special concern in the series of articles I am beginning herewith. I am chiefly concerned with our use and abuse of words selected by the Holy Spirit to convey the thoughts of the divine mind. I have not the least doubt that God is, and that He has spoken to man. I am fully persuaded that he employed words already in use by man and that the meaning of these words can generally be ascertained and understood in the same manner as we may understand other communications in the same time and place and among the same people to whom the divine revelation was given.

When Alexander Campbell was requested to formally state what he believed to be the essentials requisite to produce a reformation, he gave top priority to recapture of "the vocabulary of the Holy Spirit." Succeeding generations, hooked on slogans, thought they were being true to this when they glibly recited, “We speak where the Bible speaks, and remain silent where the Bible is silent.” In many cases they were like a person seeing a banana for the first time, and eating the peel while throwing the fruit away. In actuality our brethren often did neither of the things in the slogan. It became a catchword to be reeled off as an escape from responsibility to study.

In this instance the slogan was originally adopted by men as an approach to the goal of unity, which so many had sought so seriously and died without achieving. But before long it was being quoted to exclude those who could not conscientiously conform. It was used as a divisive weapon rather than as a unitive instrument. A great many who claimed to speak where the Bible speaks did so without speaking as the Bible speaks. They parroted the words and memorized proof-texts with no genuine concern for their true implication. This year, if our precious Lord so wills and allows, it is my intention to re-state some of the things which I believe have been ignored.

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

My style of writing during 1974 indicates no abandonment of my intention to promote the unity of the Spirit among all who acknowledge Jesus as the Lord of their lives. In a fragmented and fractured world I know of no greater task to which one can address his feeble talent than to encourage the saints to have a common mind for unity. We must somehow find the solution which will enable us to labor together for Him “whom having not seen we love.” Bertrand Russell declared that “we must find a moral alternative to war.” I paraphrase that statement by saying that we must find a moral alternative to division.

We cannot continue to escalate every issue into open warfare which always ends in fragmentation. There must be some dynamic which will hold us together in Christ Jesus in times of stress and tension. We dare not continue to expend our energies and waste our resources in attacking God's other children. There are papers printed in our day which devote almost every column inch to fighting brethren who honestly differ with the editors, and the paganism grows on every side. We must somehow come to that place where we can distinguish brethren from enemies, for not all who differ with us are enemies of the cross of Christ.

I believe that a disorderly and indiscriminate form of speech contributes to a deranged and perplexed body of believers. We can never restore peace and harmony in the Spirit if we do not know what the Spirit revealed, and we can never know what the Spirit revealed if we use the terms he employed in a sense which he never intended.

I think that most of our brethren are sincere. They recognize that the present disturbed and dislocated state of affairs is not the will of God. It denies the prayer of Jesus for unity and makes our plea a farce in the eyes of a contemporary society. Imagine the sorry state in which a visitor from another planet would find himself if he resolved to arrive at truth by visiting with and consulting the two dozen segments of the "Church of Christ" in our land. We have been victimized by tradition. We have inherited partisan pride. This results in only one approach to unity and one strategy for peace, the verbal bludgeoning of everyone who differs with us into submission and conformity as the price of our acceptance. One grave problem is that, along with the rest of the religious world, we have been handed a "theological jargon" which promises peace and always ends in producing polemics.

On March 31, 1819, John Adams wrote to J. H. Tiffany, "Abuse of words has been the greatest instrument of sophistry and chicanery, of party, faction, and division of society." George Santayana said in Obiter Scripto, "Words are weapons, and it is dangerous in speculation, as in politics, to borrow them from the arsenal of the enemy." That may be a true observation but I think Satan has infiltrated the ranks of the believers and captured much of our vocabulary and turned it against us. Our aim will be to re-take it and use it for that cause which means more to me than life itself.

God has demonstrated the power of confusion of tongues to divide and scatter a people. It is amazing to recognize the perversity of the human race. When God commands them to scatter they insist upon remaining together, and when he commands them to unite they insist upon scattering. After the deluge it was the divine intention that the earth be divided among the progeny of Noah who were to be dispersed abroad and inhabit and populate it.

There was one factor which operated against the dispersion. "The whole earth was of one language, and one speech" (Genesis 11:1). They were thus encouraged to remain in proximity to each other because of mutual understanding. As men journeyed from the East they came to a plain in the land of Shinar and settled there. They resolved to construct a city as a dwelling-place and a tower as a landmark and rallying center, as they said, "lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." This was the very opposite of God's will and instruction.

But in dealing with the rebellion God acknowledged the power of a unified language. He said, "Behold, the people are united in purpose, and speak the same language, and they have begun this undertaking, and nothing can thwart their plans while this is the case." What a divine tribute to the power and force of unity! It required heavenly intervention to contravene their design and scatter them so the earth would be populated. The instrument chosen for dispersing the rebels was confusion of language so they would not understand each other.

It would seem that if men can be "scattered abroad upon the face of all the earth" by the mere act of confusing their tongues, it would require a unity of language to unite them. The confusion would have to be dissipated, the dissonant and distracting elements eliminated, and a sense of understanding restored before they could be gathered together. To this a statement in Zephaniah 3:9 gives assent, “For then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may call upon the Lord, to serve him with one consent.” The Revised Standard Version renders it “Yea, at that time will I change the speech of the peoples to a pure speech, that all of them may call on the name of the Lord and serve him with one accord.”

This is important! It shows that God, who confused the language in order to scatter the people, recognizes that he must change the speech to an unmixed or pure speech, before all can call upon his name and serve him in unity. The Hebrew root form rendered “one consent” or “one accord” is literally “with one shoulder.” We still speak of the need of putting a shoulder to the wheel. We talk about “pulling together” although the prophet used a term which meant “pushing together.” In any event we need a pure speech to be able to accomplish this.

WORDS AS WEAPONS

It is an adage among us that “the pen is mightier than the sword.” In The Anatomy of Melancholy Robert Burton wrote, “A blow with a word strikes deeper than a blow with the sword.” Joseph Conrad wrote in Lord Jim, “A word carries far, very far, and deals destruction through time as the bullets go flying through space.” Jeremiah declared of his people, “Their tongue is a cruel arrow, their mouths speak lies. One speaks amicably to another, while inwardly he plans a trap for him” (9:8).

Throughout the old covenant scriptures, words are compared to a sword, and in the new covenant scriptures the word of God is called “the sword of the Spirit.” All of this points up the fact that if Satan captures the vocabulary and turns it against the saints irreparable damage may result. I am quite convinced that he has stolen a lot of the arsenal and spiked a good many guns he has not carried off. It is my intention, God willing, to point up a lot of the problems which have been caused in the whole religious realm by a surrender of the weapons provided by heaven.

Perhaps you will indulge me if I take a little space to suggest some of the ways by which the truth can be obscured and made to appear indecisive. We cannot be exhaustive because of lack of time and space but we can provide an idea of some of the problems with which I will be dealing in coming issues. It is to be expected that not all of you will agree with my emphases or conclusions, and that is not necessarily to be deplored. It is out of brotherly exchange that all of us learn. We all need critics who challenge our finite views.

No two of us would edit a paper alike. All of us have varied opinions about the relative importance of things. Some of you will wonder why I spend time with the matters we will be considering, and others of you will hail what we say as the greatest blessing in print. That is why we never try to please our readers. I am not writing verse for greeting cards, but editing a journal which reflects my honest convictions. If you do not agree with what I write, well, praise the Lord anyhow!

1. One way by which uncertainty is created is by taking terms which have a specific application in God's word and giving them a general scope. The wrong here is invalid expansion which creates new concepts never intended by the Spirit. Making a universal application of a specific not only invents and licenses novel ideas, but clouds the value of the specific by spreading it too thin. Does that sound a little confusing. Then let me cite an example.

Look at the word "church" as an illustration of what I am saying. If this word is to be used as a translation of ekklesia, and a considerable number of good brethren think we are stuck with it for the duration, it should certainly be employed as the Holy Spirit used it. In God's word it refers to the called out ones who are called together in Christ. In whatever area it embraces it includes every person in that area who has responded to the call and who has been born from above. We use terms the Spirit did not use when we talk of "the church universal" and "the local church." But if we must use these terms we have invented and sanctified by our usage, we certainly ought to be true to the original which we render by "church."

The "church universal" must include every saved person on this whole wide earth. If it does not include even one person whom God has accepted and in whom the Holy Spirit dwells, it is incorrectly used, and is not sound speech. To talk of "the church universal" and mean only a clump of congregations here and abroad which are bound together in defence of or in opposition to some issue which has nothing to do with our entrance into God's grace, is to act from sectarian motives and to project a sectarian image.

Whether the designation or denomination for such a group of congregations is borrowed from scripture or dreamed up because of some other association does not affect the sectarian stance. When I speak of the "Church of Christ" in a universal sense, and mean only congregations of believers in the world whose communicants do not use instrumental music in their public praise, I am sectarian. When I speak of "The Christian Church" and regard it as the one body to the exclusion of God's sheep who are scattered over the sectarian hills, I am a sectarian.

If I do not mean by the term "local church" every child of God in that locality I am partisan and sectarian in my meaning. The church in Saint Louis embraces every saved person in this metropolitan area. If I use it in any other manner to embrace fewer than that, my usage is sectarian. If I speak of "the church of Los Angeles” I must include every saint in that city who has been adopted into the wonderful family of God, every person who is enabled to cry “Abba, Father” by the indwelling Spirit. The church of Christ in California either includes every saved person in California or it is not the church of Christ. It may be “The Church of Christ” and there are two dozen different kinds of these in California, but there is a big difference— and I do mean big!

It is silly to talk about a Methodist Church, a Baptist Church, a Lutheran Church, a Presbyterian Church, or a Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints. There is only one church, and there never was but one. It is the body of Christ and is a divine creation. God only created one church through the Spirit because he is not the author of confusion, but of peace. Men cannot create a divine organism, and God did not create a human organization. When men adopt the word for the divine organization and apply it to a legion of human organizations they confuse and confound the sacred and profane.

Let me hasten to add that such confusion of tongues only confounds men. It has no bearing or effect upon the purpose of God. He has never been in a dither as to who constitutes his family. “The foundation of God stands firm, having the assurance that the Lord knows who are his.” Men may not be able to identify all whom God has accepted, but he knows them. In our human predicament we must be constantly aware of our need to “discern the body” and resolve never to be confined by traditional walls erected in partisan fear by our fathers.

Not a single one of the two dozen “Churches of Christ” is the body of Christ in its fulness. I do not doubt that God has children in each of them, and I do not doubt that he has children outside of all of them. It is for this reason I refuse to be confined to either of them. I am resolved to be true to the “ekklesia of God” as the Holy Spirit used that majestic term. Wherever God has a son I have a brother; wherever God has a daughter I have a sister. I praise God for delivering me from the narrow confines of a partisan clan into the glorious freedom of the kingdom of his dear Son. And I am not going back to the dark depths of a factional cave.

2. The opposite to what we have said is also a problem, for the taking of general terms and restricting them to certain specific things defeats God's purpose in revelation. Here the mistake is unjustified limitation. This is what occurs when a word like ministry, which applies to every form of service to God or man, is used to apply only to the work of a preacher, and generally to one hired to serve a particular congregation. If every child of God is a minister, and most of us pay lipservice to that concept, to call one man "the minister" is to do serious injury to the ministry of all of the other saints. Our gradual drift toward Rome, in this respect, has led us into all kinds of verbal error, which tends to be far more serious than we think.

No one who is committed to restoring the ancient order should ever be guilty of speaking about someone "entering the ministry" who has been a Christian for a number of years, or even a few months. If one does not enter the ministry when he is baptized into Christ, whatever he enters later will not be too important. One does not go away to "study to become a minister" although one who is a minister may go away to study. If a "school of the ministry" does not prepare saints of all kinds to serve, it is not a school for the ministry at all, but for professionals unknown and unrecognized in the word of God revealed by the Holy Spirit.

We will be dealing with some of these matters as we seek to recover a pure speech so that we may serve the Lord with one accord, and not seek to be served by one man. It is for this reason that I shall deal in our next issue with the distinction between clergy and laity which creeps into the language of the brethren more and more. That this is a ticklish subject, I am fully aware, and that it creates an emotionally-charged atmosphere I am well informed, but I think it is time something definitive was said about it, and since I refuse to request my brethren to deal with issues I am afraid to touch, I shall write my honest sentiments about the problem. You need not agree with what I write for me to love you, but I would like to have you read what I say whether you love me for saying it, or not.

Who Is Sectarian?

Mission Messenger (January 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

A good brother in Arkansas takes exception, in a rather pointed and scathing letter, to my intimation that the segment of the restoration movement of which he is an affiliate, is a sect. He affirms that he is a member of the Lord's church, the body of Christ, nothing more, nothing less, and nothing else. He resents deeply my lumping that church off with narrow and insignificant groups of "antis" who oppose cups, classes, and the support of orphan homes. But above all else he wants it known that members of what he quaintly refers to as "The First Christian Church" are not his brothers in Christ. They are apostates and can only get to heaven by renouncing what they are in and returning to the "true church."

The letter came as somewhat of a surprise, like the resignation of Spiro T. Agnew. It has been a long time since I have received this kind of epistle and I guess I thought that those who wrote such venom about their brethren had all died off. Much as I feel compassion for one who has to use rash statements to work off steam when he is in high dudgeon, the letter served to arouse a feeling bordering upon nostalgia. It took me back along memory's lane a few decades, to the time when such letters were in vogue, and the one who could write the meanest was always head of the debating class.

In the old days things used to get pretty rough when members of the divergent “true churches” met to discuss their differences in the spirit of Christ. Once at Sedalia, Missouri, two brothers in the flesh and in the Lord, got into a shoving match across the Lord’s table, and one swung a haymaker at the other. If a deacon had not separated them they would have scattered the emblems all over the floor. It ended up with two “loyal” congregations in town, the members of which would not even pass the time of day with one another when they met in the post office.

I don’t think that we were any worse than most of the other religious organizations around us in that day and time. I remember an old saint down in the hills who was trying to tell me the seriousness of an argument which broke out among the brethren who met in a district schoolhouse. He said, “Before the fracas ended, they fit like Missionary Baptists!” By and large, I think the Baptists as well as the rest of us have overcome that sort of reaction, and most of us are glad of it. Occasionally, however, someone feels called upon to come to the front and battle for the pride of the party.

I grew up in one of two dozen parties in the church of Christ which does not use instrumental music in its expression of public praise. There were really not that many at the time I was immersed, because the number has grown at about the rate of two for every ten years since 1906 when we were set free by the United States Census bureau and became the one holy, apostolic and catholic church of God upon earth, a matter which the Roman Catholic Church always contested. Really we did most of the contesting because the Catholic Church didn’t know we even existed.

I know exactly how our brother feels, for I once felt the same way, although I was in a different faction than the one he is in. I grew up believing that it was the house of God, the kingdom of heaven, and the bride of Christ, and I quoted scriptures which proved that we were the flock of God, while brethren in other segments were all goats or wolves in sheep's clothing. When one of them dropped in on our meetings we would not grant him any public recognition or call upon him to pray, although we were glad to see him come so he could see how "loyal" brethren behaved. We hoped that by giving him the cold shoulder he might see the error of his ways and come into the warmth of our fellowship.

Not many ever returned, and those who did were often in trouble somewhere else. They were not so much fleeing to us in refuge as they were running from a mess they had helped to create. We depended for growth mostly upon the children we reared and upon those from outside who married our members. Growth was a little slow because when some of our young people became old enough they "went over the hill." They were baptized at the age of twelve and were subsequently brought by their parents until they became too big to whip, and then stayed away.

That was not true of all of them because some remained "in the fold" and succeeded their fathers in the work, to help perpetuate the party. They never attended a place which had a preacher who was not "faithful" to the factional plea. They never read another journal besides the orthodox party organ. Sometimes they did not even read it. They knew they were safe and they did not have to read anything else, often not even the Bible.

I remember how sorry I felt deep down inside for members of the Christian Church. I regarded them all as doomed for having forsaken the faith. We had restored "the faith" and anyone who was not with us was not with God. If one of our girls married a boy who was in the Christian Church we knew she was lost. Her father and mother felt a sense of shame like they would have felt if she had run off with a sideshow freak from the Barnum and Bailey Circus.

When you have been beguiled into believing that your group is the elect of God, chosen before the foundation of the world, and you are all that God has left upon earth, the final hope of mankind, it makes you a little heady. There is something exciting about the realization that you alone possess the key to glory and that everyone else will be turned back at the pearly gates, while you sweep past into the New Jerusalem with all of the angels there to greet you with a friendly slap on the back and the right hand of fellowship.

It provides a real sense of confidence and assurance if you have been hoodwinked into thinking that when the Son of man comes in his glory and all the holy angels with him, he will immediately start culling out everyone who has attended where they had a piano, Sunday school classes, individual cups, or a Herald of Truth announcement on the cork board in the foyer. It is a glorious contemplation that you can stand off to one side with your arms folded while the poor dupes who wouldn't listen to you when you tried to tell them, are herded off, and you can then hear the voice saying to you, "Come, you blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." When you step up to the throne to receive congratulations for having pressed the right button on all of the issues, even the goats will realize how important it was to be right on everything.

I can personally testify what an inward shock it is when you suddenly are made to realize what you have actually been doing is defending a sectarian image couched in a nonsectarian plea. I know how it jolts you to see, for the first time, that the body of Christ is greater than any faction, including your own, and you have actually been opposing God's purpose by your bigotry and intolerant attitude. When you've lugged around in your inside coat pocket a signed challenge proclaiming that the church of which you are a member is scriptural in name, origin, doctrine and practice, it sort of knocks you cold to have to face up to the fact that the church of which you are a member is actually one of about a couple of dozen splinters in a historical movement which started out to “unite the Christians in all of the sects.”

That is why I know exactly how our Arkansas brother feels. He has come to equate the particular segment of “The Church of Christ” with which he is affiliated as “the Lord’s church,” lock, stock and barrel! It is the one body for which Jesus died, the genuine authorized new testament church restored in its fulness as at the beginning. It is so because it is right on instrumental music, cups, classes and colleges. It is the right church because it is right on the right things, the important things, the things that count. Anyone who is not right on these things is not right with God. Regardless of one’s faith, hope and love, he is out of Christ if he is out of step with our brother.

I do not want to hurt our brother. I would not be gross or gruff or crude. But I must be honest, and I must be plain. I do not believe that any faction or party in the non-instrument Church of Christ is the body of Christ in its magnificent fulness. I do not believe that all of the divergent factions taken together exhaust the body of Christ. For that matter, I think the family of our God is greater than any movement within it, including the restoration movement. The kingdom of heaven over which Jesus presides transcends every corral in which men seek to confine it. We have not boxed God in.

I also hold that, in the fair meaning of the term, my protesting brother is a member of a sect. His very letter of protestation demonstrates a sectarian spirit and proves beyond doubt that he is guilty of partisan exclusivism, the first and chief symptom of sectarianism. Actually, our parties may be quite right about some things, but they are wrong about the right things. They are cruelly mistaken about their attitude toward fellowship, brotherhood and the family relationship in Christ Jesus.

Any group which bases its reception or rejection of brethren upon an opinion about instrumental music, the millennium, the indwelling Spirit, or support of orphan homes has invented and adopted another creed than Christ. Faith in Christ Jesus as the Messiah of the prophets and the Son of God, goes for nothing with such a group. It is the thing one is against and not the Christ he serves which makes the difference. To set at nought a brother because he cannot conscientiously support a method of financing a television program is blatantly sectarian.

Those who make tests of fellowship out of things God has not made conditions of salvation are not Christians only. They are a special kind or brand. As far as they are in Christ and follow him they are Christians, but in areas where they create tests of fellowship based upon opinions they are not Christians. And many have more tests of fellowship than they have a real depth of Christian love and concern for their blood-bought brothers.

What our good Arkansas brother overlooks is that by setting aside and creating a special segment of “antis” he automatically puts himself in a special segment of “pros” and becomes as sectarian as those whom he wants to separate and segregate. A ghetto of “pros” is as partisan as a ghetto of “antis.” Jesus did not die for a clan or tribe but for a body composed of those who believe into him on the basis of the apostolic testimony, the good news, or gospel.

When God’s word finally got through my sectarian shell, hard as it was to crack, it became a foregone conclusion that I must receive, recognize and respect all of my brethren, simply because they were God’s children. It did not mean I would agree perfectly with any of them. It by no means meant that I would endorse their every concept and action. My reception of them as my brothers was an endorsement only of their reception by the Father through the shed blood of his Son. They belonged to God, so I belonged with them. It was Just that simple, and it still is.

Whether they were pre-millennial, post-millennial, or ignorant of the millennium, had nothing whatever to do with my recognition of brotherhood in Jesus Christ. This concept of the one body is so majestic and wonderful it is frightening to those who parade always under party labels. But it is not a threat to any particular party. It is a threat to all of them because it denies the fleshly spirit which gives them birth.

Once I saved every scrap of material about this faction or that, filing it away carefully for use in debate. Now that I have been delivered from the party spirit in my own heart I no longer keep such files. Being free from the factional attitude I am no longer concerned about members of one segment triumphing over the members of another. What I am concerned about is the triumph of my Lord over the wisdom of this passing age. I want to help bring about that glorious consummation of universal history when the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ. I am not too sure that being right on whether to have classes or not will either help or hinder in the majestic design of the ages.

I am in the one body with every member of the Church of Christ or Christian Church who is in Christ Jesus. I am also in it with a lot of folk who are not in either one of the parties created by the "great divide" in our particular restoration movement. I do not sit up nights worrying about what any of them think about me or write about me in partisan journals. I just go on loving them whether they count themselves as my friends or enemies. In the only organism to which I belong there is neither Jew nor Greek, bond nor free, premillennialist nor post-millennialist, instrumentalist nor non-instrumentalist, for Christ is all and in all.

In that wonderful body neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision, but faith which works by love. Faith and love! What a difference they make when you cease to trust in your own righteousness which is by works of law and trust only in His. What a terrific change takes place when you can truly love all of your brethren and can stop pretending.

I would not want to judge my Arkansas brother, but based on my personal, experience, I suspect that he wrote his recriminatory and antagonistic letter more for his sake than for mine. He was trying to prove to himself that he was still loyal after having read my writings for several months. I doubt he thought it would rescue me from the freedom with which Christ set me free, and return me again to the yoke of bondage. What he was doing was clanking the chains to be sure he was still confined and restrained by his “loyalty.”

We should not give up on brethren like this: Jesus never gave up on me, even when I was debating and “skinning” other brethren and trying to cut their opinions to shreds. Quietly, but persistently, the Spirit pursued me until I waded out of the factional muck so God could “lift me up and let me stand, by faith on heaven’s tableland.” It is not that I grew mellow with advancing age, for I was really not that old when I learned better. Instead, the Spirit became real, and when I opened my heart, he poured the love of God into it.

My brother may even now be on his way out of the partisan antagonism which has enslaved him. If so, it will be sometime before he will be able to openly admit it. He will first try to convince himself that his congregation is becoming less sectarian and is more open than others. One who has been factional all his life and trusted in the institution for his identity and salvation is afraid to make the break and stand alone with only Jesus at his right hand to help and strengthen. But if he is honest, the glad day will come!

It came for me when I was able to admit publicly that I had been wrong, seriously wrong, about fellowship, all of my life. I was not only mistaken but my error was such that I was actually defeating God’s eternal purpose when I thought I was advancing it. Now I know what grace really is, the quality of grace which brings forgiveness and the peace that passes understanding. It is this I crave for my brother in Arkansas, and for every other brother and sister on this terrestrial sphere!

The Scotch Influence

Mission Messenger (January 1974)

[Abstract]

I think there are few other places I have ever been where the winter can be as cold and blustery as it is in Scotland. It was my lot, the first time I went over to visit the gracious saints who live in that marvelous land of the heather, to arrive in one of the worst snowstorms they had experienced in several decades. It was a wonder to behold how they kept the big doubledecker buses operating as efficiently as they did. But they are an efficient and enterprising people and impressed me greatly with their abilities.

One day I left the little colliery village where I was staying and rode into Edinburgh to transfer to another bus which was to take me to a town where the good brethren had arranged to have their anniversary meeting a week early so I might fit it into my schedule and address them.

When I arrived at my destination shortly afternoon the wind was sweeping down in a gale from the Firth of Forth and the snow was swirling about so heavily that it was impossible to see even ten feet. When I arrived at the home of my congenial host the cup of hot tea which was waiting was more than welcome. It was such a nasty day outside that it was suggested I stay in the living-room close by the ingle, the little fireplace where the coals were glowing cheerily and sending out waves of warmth.

A large bookcase in the room was filled with bound volumes of brotherhood journals from days gone by— the British Millennial Harbinger, the Ecclesiastical Observer, Bible Advocate, and Old Paths. I settled down to an afternoon of trying to assimilate all that I could from volumes of which I had heard, but had never before seen. That evening before we went out to wade the drifts to the little old-world meetinghouse, the elderly brother came in to tell me he wanted me to select a volume of each of the papers to have as a souvenir of my visit.

Years have passed away and the brother who was so kind has long since departed to be with Jesus. But even yet when the wind whistles around the eaves and the snow piles up in my driveway, and the birds huddle in the evergreens, I go to my own shelves and take down one of the books brought from a land so far away, and when I settle down to read the well-marked pages my heart returns along the path of memory to that afternoon in Auld Scotia.

The Bible Advocate and Precursor of Unity, as it was called, was a pocket-size paperback published on Paternoster Row in London. It was “devoted to the restoration of original Christianity” according to the sub-title, and one of my favorites is the 1847 edition, now more than 125 years old. It carries a running account of the visit of Alexander Campbell to England and Scotland, written from the British viewpoint. It also presents two relatively long articles by Campbell. One is on creeds and the other on the Holy Spirit. Both are excellent samples of some of the most poignant writing in the history of the faith once for all delivered to the saints.

I acknowledge a great debt for the impression made upon my own feeble consciousness by the dissertation on creeds. Campbell recognized that the divine foundation upon which Jesus erected his spiritual edifice was a confession expressing but two ideas, both of which were related to the person and office of God’s beloved Son. “Thou art the Messiah, the Son of the living God.” When Jesus declared that upon this rock he would establish his community he rejected every other rock or proposition as basic or fundamental to reunion with the Father. This was the divinely-selected and ordained creed.

Campbell wrote, “Here then, is the whole revelation of the mystery of the Christian constitution— the full confession of the Christian faith. All that is peculiar to Christianity is found in these words; not merely in embryo, but in a clearly expressed outline. A clear perception, and a cordial belief of these two facts will make a man a Christian. He may carry them out in their vast dimensions and glorious developments, to all eternity. He may ponder on them until his spirit is transformed into the image of God; until he shines in more than angelic brightness, in all the purity and beauty of heavenly love. Man glorified in heaven, gifted with immortality, and rapt in ecstasies of infinite and eternal blessedness, is but the mere result of a proper apprehension of, and conformity to this confession.”

The marks with which I bracketed the statement on that snowy afternoon in Scotland are still there. At the time I did not know where my meditative wrestling with this sublime thought would take me. It was but the first shaft of light from the rising sun, but gradually as it rose higher over my intellectual horizon the shadows began to flee away. I could see clearly that every party among us sprung from another creed, another belief or set of beliefs bound upon men by their fellows as being essential to fellowship here and life hereafter.

In our zeal to make what we thought would be better Christians, we were actually un-Christianizing them. We were laying another foundation than the noble one consisting of faith in the majestic two-fold proposition upon which Jesus said he would constitute the summoned ones, the called-out community. Whatever it is to which one must subscribe mentally and orally to be received into and recognized as worthy of fellowship by any community is the creed of that community. And any community which demands of its communicants as a basis of reception, faith in any other proposition than the Messiah and divine Sonship of Jesus of Nazareth is not the community which Jesus planted. It is built upon a different rock.

This does not mean that none of the members of such a humanly-devised community or sect are in Christ. One can subscribe to an opinion in ignorance and consider it so important as to be a rallying-ground. He can be a member of a party through birth or association as Paul proclaimed himself to be a Pharisee as well as a disciple of the Messiah. But the community built upon an exalted opinion is no more the body of Christ than the sect of the Pharisees was the body of Christ.

Let us take a modern example recognizable to most of the constituency of that branch of the restoration movement which does not sanction the use of instrumental music in its public praise service. A man may become convinced that certain kinds of orphan homes created by brethren to care for the needy are human institutions and without divine warrant, and that he cannot support them financially or otherwise. Certainly if he cannot support them without violating his conscience it would be a sin for him to do so.

In his zeal to defend or promote his personal conviction which he regards as scriptural he may convince others of the rightness of his position and they may adopt it. But when they begin to demand that all brethren reach the same conclusion and hold the same opinion as to implication of the scriptures, regardless of personal conscience, as a price for being regarded in the fellowship, they have made an opinion into a creed. Every new creed will create a new party as certainly as the law of cause and effect operates in the universe.

But a party which crystallizes around such a creed is not the community which Jesus planted. Its adherents may give allegiance to Christ, and insofar as they do they are disciples or followers, but one no more needs to be a member of such a party to be in Jesus than he would need to be in the Baptist or Methodist parties to be in Christ. Men need not surrender their opinions in order to have unity. Indeed, they cannot do so, for personal convictions represent our mental and moral values. All they need to do is to cease regarding them as creeds or foundational truths upon which to erect rival parties. To the strife-torn saints in Corinth, Paul wrote, "For other foundation (that is, for unity) can no man lay, than that which has been laid, and that is Jesus Christ."

When it first dawned upon me that I had been promoting unwritten creeds as the basis of partisan existence and acceptance, I could hardly believe it. I fought myself all the way back across the Atlantic Ocean trying to find some loophole to justify my remaining a partisan. One finds security in such a role. He is hidden behind monastic walls and scarcely needs to think. That is actually the most dangerous thing he can do. All of his thinking is done for him. He need only comply mechanically to be honored and respected by those in the party, and hated by those outside of it.

Fortunately God won out in my life and I shall never again build a party or plant a faction, upon any opinion of mine. I will not defend again as a kind of loyalty that spirit which produces factions. Campbell wrote, "Creeds have often operated and their tendency in time of defection is to cast out the good, intelligent, and pure, and retain those of a contrary opinion." He was right. I have seen it happen. I have helped drive out characters more pure and gentle than those we have retained who lifted up their voices in accusation against others who would not lie about their conscience.

Campbell went on to say, "Human creeds have made more heretics than Christians; more parties than reformations; more martyrs than saints; more wars than peace; more hatred than love; more death than life; that they have killed or driven out all the apostles, prophets and reformers, of the church and of the world.”

There is nothing wrong with having opinions. There would be something seriously wrong with one who did not have an opinion. Opinions do not divide us. It is only opinions graduated and elevated into dogmata which create schisms. It is then that opinions are forced, driven and pressed until they result in war and strife. And, it is then that opinions become creeds by which to judge the worthiness of others to be received. My brethren in the restoration movement have at least twenty-four unwritten creeds, for every party is based upon a creedal foundation, deny it though they all will. All of this has been done in the name of “loyalty” and every party is the “loyal church” in the sight of its own participants. I have never met a disloyal brother by his own admission.

I am through with the whole sad and sorry mess! I refuse to be maneuvered by party politicians every five years or so into “taking a position” on this or that opinion and promoting another division. I recognize none of our party fences as valid or necessary to my personal relationship to God in the Spirit. Count me out when you start calling the roll of “faithful preachers” who line up behind some party leader or party journal. I am built upon the rock. My creed is that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah and God’s Son. Every person whom God has planted on that foundation is where I am in spite of our mistaken views, warped ideas and wrong opinions. I neither intend to drive him from that foundation nor fall off of it myself.

I am no longer interested in “lining up” some of God’s children on a partisan foundation. I am desperately concerned about having all of God’s great family remain together upon the one foundation. The opinions they hold neither frighten nor perturb me until they arrogantly begin to advance them as basic to my relationship to the Father and his other children. Although Campbell is not my hope of eternal life nor my authority in things spiritual, I began this article by mentioning the effect of his writings upon my thoughts. I would mention another statement from his pen which has been valuable to me.

Amongst Christians there is now, as there was at the beginning, a very great diversity in the knowledge of the Christian institution. There are babes, children, young men, and fathers in Christ now, as well as in the days of the apostle John. This, from the natural gifts of God, from the diversities of age, education, and circumstances, is unavoidable. And would it not be just as rational and as scriptural to excommunicate one another, because our knowledge is less or greater than any fixed measure, as for differences of opinion on matters of speculation?

Indeed, in most cases where proscriptions and exclusions now occur in this country, the excluded are the most intelligent members of the society; and although no community will accuse a man because he knows more of his Bible than his brethren, and on this account exclude him from their communion; yet this, it is manifest, rather than heresy (of which, however, for consistency's sake, he must be accused,) is, in truth, the real cause of separation.

I do not want to bore you to tears with quotations from men whose thinking has helped to shape my life, but I would like to include one more. Most of us have heard about John Locke, the British philosopher who was born in 1632, and wrote an Essay Concerning Human Understanding. I learned about his paragraph on the true church and read it over and over a number of years ago. I should like to share it with you.

“Since men are so solicitous about the true church, I would only ask them here by the way, if it be not more agreeable to the church of Christ to make the conditions of her communion to consist in such things and such things only as the Holy Spirit has in the holy scriptures declared in express words to be necessary to salvation. I ask, I say, whether this is not more agreeable to the church of Christ than for men to impose their own inventions and interpretations upon others as if they were of divine authority, and to establish by ecclesiastical laws, as absolutely necessary to the profession of Christianity, such things as the holy Scriptures do either not mention or at least not expressly command. Whoever requires those things in order to ecclesiastical communion which Christ does not require in order to life eternal, he may perhaps constitute a society accommodated to his own opinion and his own advantage, but how that can be called the church of Christ which is established upon laws that are not his, and which excludes such persons from its communion as He will one day receive into the Kingdom of heaven, I understand not.”

This is but another way of saying what I have constantly affirmed about myself, that I will make nothing a test of fellowship which God has not made a condition of salvation. One who is qualified to be received by the Father of all glory is qualified to be received by me. If we receive all whom God receives and allow one to stand or fall to His own master, we can have that unity which the Father designed for his family. The one body was the creation of the Holy Spirit. Every party is the creation of the party spirit. I expect to allow the Holy Spirit to bind me to every precious child of God, and I refuse to allow the party spirit to separate me from any such child. I have learned the difference between the unity of the faith and the conformity of opinion and interpretation which is the real goal of politicians among us! The body of Christ is composed of parts but not parties.

The Carnal Spirit

Mission Messenger (January 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

One of the tragic features about that list of sordid things called “the works of the flesh” is that they seldom appear singly in the heart. One who is infected with the virus of carnality often develops a variety of symptoms, not all of which are external and visible. This seems especially true of “the party spirit,” an insidious disease which causes one to regard those who flock together around an issue unfurled as a sectarian battle standard, as infallible in interpretation and wholly consecrated to God.

Every party tolerates within its ranks those who are greedy, covetous and envious while castigating and attacking those in another faction whose lives are pure and dedicated and whose only crime is intellectual honesty. Most parties mistake the law of the pack for the love of the flock. But the one most bitterly attacked by every sectarian is the one who refuses to be conned or cornered into limiting either his love or activity to any party. Such a person is not so much a threat to any sect as he is a living rebuke to sectarianism itself. He strikes at the mother rather than the brood.

I can recall, and I do with a sense of abiding shame and deep penitence, when I was regarded as a factional leader, standing before an audience and naming and accusing brethren whom I had never met and whose writings I had never even critically examined. I operated purely upon hearsay and most of it from those as biased and prejudiced as myself. Such boorish and ignorant public behavior was regarded as being like Paul, who named Alexander the coppersmith and Zenas the lawyer. It was certainly not like the words of the apostle to “be generous one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another as God in Christ forgave you.” What an assignment!

I wish I could excuse such an uncharitable attitude upon the basis of my youth and immaturity at the time, and no doubt these played a part in it, for young men like to play to the grandstand. But it was also evil and vicious, and it was contrary to the spirit and instruction of the Lord of life. When one treats God’s other children worse than he treats heathen, and is more polite to pagans than to saints, Satan is operating the switchboard on his brain cells and he has his mental wires crossed.

I thank God for his deliverance, and many as the things are which I must yet conquer, I praise him that I am free from having to sit up nights and rack my feeble brain contriving arguments with which to blast other brethren in some other faction. It is a real blessing to be able to fight the devil without first withdrawing from everyone else in the same fight.

Satan never did a better job for populating hell than when he convinced men that compassion is compromise, fellowship is failure, and walking in love is weakness in the Spirit. I am resolved not to be hoodwinked into hostility, or harassed into hatred. I shall not dissolve the ties of brotherhood in factional gall.

The Clergy System

Mission Messenger (February 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

No class or order of men that ever appeared on earth have obtained so much influence, or acquired so complete an ascendancy over the human mind, as the clergy. The Christian clergy have exercised, for about fifteen hundred years, a sovereign dominion over the Bible, the consciences, and the religious sentiments of all nations professing Christianity.— Alexander Campbell.

In this article I am going to discuss what I believe to be one of the gravest errors into which the religious world has ever fallen. So widespread has it become that it will be virtually impossible to ever overcome it. So subtle is its encroachment that even those who deny being guilty of it are nonetheless victims of its malignant influence.

Historians search in vain for the date of its birth, and analysts are just as puzzled about the motivation which foisted it upon an unsuspecting world. Everyone is agreed that once it was not a part of God's revelation or purpose, yet it was suddenly on the scene exercising a baleful influence and claiming divine sanction for its existence, intruding itself as an interloper into the vocabulary of those who proudly claimed to speak where the Bible speaks, and to remain silent where it was silent.

I refer to the rise of the clergy system with its unwarranted and unscriptural distinction between "clergy" and "laity." Never has there been a more serious imposition upon the kingdom of heaven, and never another more widely accepted. How did “the clergy” originate to first usurp the rights and privileges of all the saints, and then to claim their prerogatives as a divine right? Some assign the beginning, which ultimately resulted in “a universal father,” a papa, or pope, to the need for a strong voice to sound out the position of orthodoxy in a time of schism and heresy.

Others ascribe it to the overweening ambition of aspiring men to stand between their fellows and God, and to exercise a mediatorial office because of a fancied superior knowledge or life. Still others think the seed was planted in soil fertilized by political alliance with the church, making it possible for the secular ruler to control the destinies of a people by elevating men to hierarchical prominence in the spiritual structure.

Whatever its origin it became so powerful that, almost without exception, it became “the way of life” for religious organizations, and in the case of one, the Roman party, it became “the church” itself, to the exclusion of other communicants who bore the tax burden and picked up the tab for its maintenance. So much a part of the thought processes of our generation has it become that even those who seek to offset it are tricked into using its vocabulary, and parroting its specialized jargon.

A good example is found in the book Body Life by Ray C. Stedman. The theme of the little volume is “to search out from the Scripture the nature and function of true Christianity and thus to recover the dynamic of early Christianity.” The subtitle of the book is, “The church comes alive.” Yet, in the Foreword, Billy Graham writes, “The Peninsula Bible Church began with only five laymen.” And Stedman speaks of meeting “pastors and concerned laymen.” He says a lot of fine things from which all of us could profit but when he talks of “the ministry of the laity” as something separate and apart, he employs “the speech of Ashdod.” There were pastors in the primitive community of saints but they were also a part of the laos, the people of God.

Perhaps, as we shall later point out, there is nothing seriously wrong with the mere words clergy and laity. It is the creating of a distinction between them which is so fraught with danger. The fact is that all of God’s clergy are laity, and all of God’s laity are clergy. Every child of God is a priest. Every child of God is a minister. Every disciple of Jesus has entered the ministry. The word of God knows nothing of a disciple who is not a minister. So long as we pay empty lip-service to this concept while practicing something which is exactly the opposite, we are hypocritical and acting out a sham.

Certainly those who justify their separate existence from the rest of the religious realm upon the ground that they represent a movement to restore the primitive order, ought to restore first of all the divinely revealed concept of the ministry of the saints, seeing that it was the gradual renunciation of this which resulted in the multiplication of parties from the hoary “mother of sects” upon the banks of the muddy Tiber, to the latest little group following a self-proclaimed member of the “reverend clergy.”

Yet, my brethren, in spite of their anguished protestations to the contrary, betray themselves in both speech and writing. Frequently, I sit in meetings of brethren, especially in Christian Churches, where a speaker will talk about how he involved “his laymen” in a certain project. A Roman Catholic prelate could not have said it better. The patronizing clerical tone in which one speaks of “my laymen” or “my elders” shows how much closer we are to Rome than to Jerusalem.

The Churches of Christ, non-instrument, are not too far behind. In a recent letter, a good brother speaks of resigning from the function of bishop and adds, “I’m satisfied to be just a layman.” Another, speaking of a preacher who became fed up with bickering in a congregation and took a job as a schoolteacher said, “I am just not too sure how he will make it as a layman.” This is the language that belongs to the system which has its roots back to the Dark Ages and Italy, regardless of how innocent those may appear who use it.

Before the precious blood of the Lamb wiped out distinctions and removed all thought of caste among those who are in him, God had a special clergy. When the tribe of Levi stepped forward in answer to the call of Moses at a time of grave crisis, the members of that tribe were elevated to the status of a professional priesthood. They were separated from the people (the laity) in whose behalf they were to come before God with sacrifices and offerings, and in ritual observance. The tribe of Levi found their inheritance (kleros) not in the land with the people (laity) but in the direct service of God.

As priests of God the members of this tribe could perform certain functions which were forbidden to others under the penalty of death. They could touch holy things which others were not permitted to touch. “At that time the Lord set apart the tribe of Levi, to carry the ark of the covenant of the Lord, to stand before the Lord to minister to him, and to give the blessing in his name to this day. That is why the Levites have no portion or inheritance with their brothers; the Lord is their inheritance, as the Lord your God promised them” (Deuteronomy 10:8, 9).

This is very clear and one need not be too astute to observe that under the Mosaic economy a select group was set apart from the rest of God’s people and ordained to officiate and minister unto God. It was the exclusive right of the priests to bear the sacred ark. They intoned the regulation blessing over the heads of the people in the name of God. The people were barred from encroaching upon or entering the sacred precincts. They dared not touch a piece of the hallowed furniture.

The priests wore a special garb, a robe or tunic, girded with a special sash, and topped off with a tall head-dress. No one outside the priesthood was allowed to wear this distinctive attire and any person who did so would suffer death for impersonating a priest. The priest was a mediator. He stood between the people and God. Men approached God only through other men who were empowered with sacerdotal authority. "If any one of the common people sins unwittingly in doing any one of the things which the Lord commanded not to be done, and is guilty, when the sin which he has committed is made known to him, he shall bring for his offering a goat . . . and the priest shall make atonement for him, and he shall be forgiven."

A special priesthood must draw its support from those for whom it officiates. The priests cannot farm or make a living. They must busy themselves with affairs of the temple. They must keep the ritual program moving. Those who constituted the priestly clergy could not farm, and those who farmed could not be a priestly clergy. So the people (laity) had to support the priesthood with their tithes and offerings.

"The Levitical priests, the whole tribe of Levi, shall have no holding or patrimony in Israel; they shall eat the food-offerings of the Lord, their patrimony. They shall have no patrimony among their fellow-countrymen; the Lord is their patrimony as he promised them" (Deuteronomy 18:1, 2). The priest was entitled to demand the part coming to him before the contributor could use anything for himself. "This shall be the customary due of the priests from those of the people who offer sacrifice, whether a bull or a sheep; the shoulders, the cheeks, and the stomach shall be given to the priest. You shall give him also the first fruits of your corn, and new wine and oil, and the first fleeces at the shearing of your flocks. For it was he whom the Lord your God chose from all your tribes to attend to the Lord and to minister in the name of the Lord, both he and his sons for all time."

There can be no question but what, under the fleshly covenant, written and engraven in stones, God created a clerical caste separate and apart from the people. Members of this group encamped between the body of Israel and the sanctuary where God dwelt. They wore beautiful robes which distinguished the wearers from the remainder of the people of God. They performed functions forbidden to those who had not been anointed.

But the cross of Christ forever wiped out all such distinctions. They were abolished and done away when the legal custodian delivered us to Jesus, and faith in God's Son superseded that righteousness which is by deeds of the law. Every child of God is now a priest. Every person on this whole earth who has been purged and purified by the blood of Jesus is a priest of God. "To him who loves us and freed us from our sins with his life's blood, who made us a royal house, to serve as the priests of his God and Father . . . to him be glory and dominion for ever and ever! Amen." (Revelation 1:6).

The old covenant, being a covenant of the flesh, with its seal of circumcision in the flesh, made its appeal to the fleshly nature. It provided pomp and pageantry, ritual and liturgy, gold and glitter. It had its visible temple of wood and stone called "the house of God." But this whole arrangement was temporary. "All this is symbolic, pointing to the present time. The offerings and sacrifices there prescribed cannot give the worshiper inward perfection. It is only a matter of food and drink and various rites of cleansing— outward ordinances in force until the time of reformation" (Hebrews 9:10).

The time of reformation came! The age of which the prophets spoke was ushered in. The new covenant, written not with ink, but with the Holy Spirit upon tablets of the heart became a reality. We were no longer minors in virtual slavery. The term was completed. God sent His own Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to purchase freedom for the subjects of the law, in order that we might attain the status of sons.

What happened? Like the trembling, cowering multitude at the foot of Horeb, when the first covenant was given, we did not want God speaking to us. We did not want to become a family with its intimacy. We were afraid to be sons. We rebelled at the idea of a Father. We wanted a God afar off, a remote Deity to be worshiped in an institution and by a prescribed ritual. One can be a member of an organization, pay his dues and attend the meetings, without ever really becoming involved. His contribution pays for the benefits which the institution is created to provide.

So we wanted worship to be something done for us, a performance prepared in advance and carried out by trained actors whom we could watch and applaud and appreciate for their skills. We did not want worship to be the crying out of our own hearts for help or the sobbing on the shoulder of our elder brother, who endured all things as we do and was yet without sin. We craved an “order of worship” printed in a program and appropriate to holy days and holy seasons. And the flesh triumphed over the Spirit. We got what we wanted and we can go through it for an hour once per week wholly detached in life and concern.

Once more the startling questions of yesterday come echoing through the empty, dusty, cobweb-strung hearts which are no longer the abode of the Spirit. “Can it be that you are so stupid? You started with the spiritual; do you now look to the material to make you perfect? Have all of your great experiences been in vain— if vain indeed they should be?” (Galatians 3:3, 4). We have not progressed in the Spirit. We have retrogressed to the law. We have gone back to the weak and beggarly elements. We are acting as if the death of Jesus was a myth and the cross at Calvary a fantasy. We are not the family for which God planned. We are an organization of our own design, coming before God with a mixture of Judaistic and cultural forms which we have blended together and call worship. There is a veil over our eyes in the reading of the Word.

Let me not be vague. Let me not hint at what I mean. We have refused to believe that the God who created heaven and earth and all that is in them does not dwell in temples made with hands, and neither is worshiped with men's hands as though he needed anything. So we continue to spend millions of dollars every year to prove that Paul was mistaken when he stood among the pagan shrines at Athens. One of the strengths of primitive saints was that they had no shrines like the pagan world. Their God could not be localized, confined or shut up, so that men would have to visit Him as they did the sick. And now we dedicate buildings to God exactly as Solomon did in the days of spiritual adolescence, and men stand up and intone in sepulchral tones, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go up to the house of God."

We have refused to learn that Jesus did away with holy places and holy days.

We are the temple of God. We are the house of God. Men can no longer dedicate material structures to God who gives us life and breath and all things. We do not go up to the house of God. It is the house of God which does the going. The only sanctuary God has on this earth is a consecrated human heart. He recognizes no place as a sanctuary or holy place because it has stained glass windows, wall-to-wall rug of institutional quality as the salesman stressed in his pitch to the building committee, or pews to match the pulpit furniture. I am the house of God when I am in a library, or the bathroom, or the shopping center. And if I am not the sanctuary of God there I will not be when I am in a meetinghouse designed for my air-conditioned comfort.

Such a place is only holy when it is filled with sanctuaries, with living, loving, throbbing, pulsating bodies of the ransomed and redeemed, sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty, brothers and sisters rejoicing together, weeping together, sharing pain and tribulation, and joy and peace. When we build a “house of worship” and have a dedication ceremony, call it temple or what you will, we must think of a clergyman to conduct the ritual. A temple requires a special priest to minister. The pulpit becomes a stage for a performance in our behalf and the pews become a grandstand from which spectators view the performance.

When people find the Lord Jesus in a real and vital way, and want to live very close to him and experience the fellowship of others in praise that is spontaneous and unrehearsed they find a pall and chill when forced to sit through a dramatization with a robed choir and an actor. The praise of God is not intended to be a spectator sport but the pouring out of one’s own heart. A great many young people in the university, who come on the first day of the week, often to sit on the floor for lack of chairs, sing together, share together, walk up to the table of the Lord together, weep over their sins and comfort one another while holding hands, find themselves when they go back home in an atmosphere so detached from real life they can hardly stand it.

Not long ago I was invited to speak in the meetinghouse of a congregation with a long history in the restoration movement of which I am likewise an heir. The building is a huge Gothic structure styled according to medieval times. When I arrived the clergyman invited me to the “vestry” and the choir robing area. The place was a bustle of activity, as the performers made ready, some of them taking a last swig of coffee before they had to go on stage. A bell rang a three minute signal. The reverend clergyman, dressed in an official robe, gave me instructions where to sit when we formally marched in. The processional sounded on the organ, and we took our places, standing while two acolytes, schoolboys dressed in robes, marched the length of the aisle with tapers to light the candles on “the altar.” It was a scene right out of ancient Jerusalem, or perhaps out of ancient Rome or Paris or Avignon.

It is mockery to call such a stony-faced performance the ekklesia of God in its social gathering around the thanksgiving table ordained by the Father. Whatever you may think of such so-called “high church” exhibition it has no relationship to the family of the living God meeting for a visible demonstration to the pagan world of that warmth of fellowship made possible by a blood brotherhood. When the recessional had sounded and we had moved from the pulpit to the vestry I asked “the minister” if he ever went to the door and greeted “his flock.” He replied, “I’ve got troubles enough of my own without listening to theirs.” I knew that he had troubles of his own about which even he did not know.

I hold no brief for the inappropriate jokes and undue levity which pulpit clowns feel they must indulge to keep the folks happy and entertained. Many times these are a cover-up for superficial knowledge of the Word of God and serve to fill in the borrowed sermon outlines from the latest book supplying such predigested food to harried preachers who must meet the needs of every other person in the community while neglecting their own families. There is such a thing as quiet dignity. There is a peace that passes understanding. But I deplore the cold, sluggish and frigid approach which Alexander Campbell described as “sacred gloom, holy melancholy and pious indolence.” The calm of the cemetery hardly appeals to one who has been born again.

In Christ Jesus our Lord there is not one item of praise or spiritual performance which is the exclusive right of a particular class. Any child of God who is qualified may serve in carrying out the will of God. The relegation of that which belongs to all to a special coterie of saints is a step away from the simplicity in Christ and God’s purpose. Let me give you an example. In some places the strange notion has grown up that presiding over the Lord’s table is a function of the elders, or bishops, while distributing the loaf and the fruit of the vine to the assembled brethren is the work of deacons. There is not one shred of justification for this notion in the scriptures, yet that is about all the elders and deacons do from week to week in some communities of believers.

Any brother who is capable of doing so has an equal right with any other to preside at the table of our Lord, and all of the brethren should take turns distributing the bread and fruit of the vine unto the saints. These are not official acts to be carried out by special functionaries, and a congregation which truly wants to represent the ekklesia of God should encourage every brother, young and old, to participate. So far have we drifted into traditional red tape and spiritual bureaucracy that a good sister told me not long ago, “We were recently disturbed about a month ago when not an elder showed up by the time the meeting began and we were afraid we would have to dispense with the Lord’s Supper. Fortunately one showed up late who had experienced car trouble and we had the communion.” With all respect to my good sister in Christ, she was taking a leaf right out of Rome’s book of ritual. Elders who are truly worthy of their calling will quit looking at service at the Lord’s table as their exclusive work by right of office and will start to urge and, if necessary, train all of the brethren to preside and share. It is time to break some of the traditional bonds which have no scriptural basis.

No one is an authorized baptizer by virtue of position or office. Any Christian has the right to baptize a person who confesses his faith in Jesus as the Messiah and God’s Son. This is not a clerical act. It is not the prerogative of an “ordained minister” for every child of God is a minister of God, and ordained of God to fulfill the divine will. We should encourage Christian fathers to immerse members of their own families, or those who lead others to the Lamb of God to immerse them into the blessed relationship. What is wrong with allowing a high school student who has converted one of his schoolmates to baptize that one into Christ?

In open forums the question of performing marriage ceremonies is always raised as an exception to what I have stated. But one who performs marriages does so as a representative of the state, not of the community of saints. It is a license from the state which permits him to serve in this capacity and the qualification for officiating is set by the constitution of the state, and not provided within the framework of God's revelation.

If a "local minister" is jealous and afraid that others will steal his glory, he is a living example of one who is disqualified by temperament and understanding to fulfill the role which he assumes. The purpose of special functionaries is to "train or adapt the saints to carry out the work of service to the building up of the body of Christ." The body grows through that which every joint supplies. The best leader is not one who does everything but one who can get others to do it. No one has an exclusive right to engage in teaching, exhorting or admonishing the saints. Why should the talents of scores of brethren be stifled and sublimated so that one can grow by exercise? Shall we bind all of the members of the body but one, and let them become paralyzed through disuse? Are not all of the bodily members expected to perform the work for which they are gifted by the Lord? Are any gifts of God useless and worthless?

We owe a tremendous debt to men like Elton Trueblood, the eminent Quaker philosopher of Richmond, Indiana, who has written some of the most startling and revolutionary material on the subject of "ministry" in our generation. It is startling because so little of it is heard from other sources, and revolutionary because it is an honest attempt to restore the concept of ministry as it was in the primitive company of the redeemed.

No one can seriously read the chapter "A Practical Starting Point” in the book The Incendiary Fellowship, or the one titled “The Abolition of the Laity” in the book The Yoke of Christ without being made to think about the great chasm between what we practice and what God purposed. Unfortunately, we suffer from two evils. Many of our brethren never read anything that is spiritually enlightening. They consider that is the “duty” of the preacher. And many of those who read never do so seriously, with a view to making any real change in their thinking. It is not likely that a Quaker philosopher will change those who refuse to be changed by apostolic disclosures.

We are tricked into thinking that we are free from “the clergy system” because we have been clever enough to employ other terms to designate our clergy. But being a clergyman has little to do with whether “the common people” designate one by such titles as “Reverend” or “Right Reverend.” One who appropriates to himself by reason of his status, the regulation and conduct of that worship which is the right of all, is a clergyman whether he admits it or not. What is the real difference in function between “the located evangelist” hired by a non-instrument Church of Christ, and the “pastor” hired by the Baptist Church a block down the street?

The pagan business world looks upon them as identical in status with each other and the parish priest. Both can get reduced fares for the clergy upon airlines. Both can carry a “clergy certificate” for purchase of tickets on bus lines. In some places they will both receive cards admitting them to professional sporting events upon mere payment of the sales tax. In other places they receive a “clerical discount” when they purchase a suit or topcoat. A lot of those who inveigh against “the clergy system” from the pulpit on Sunday accept a “clergy discount” on Monday, thus demonstrating anew that where a man’s treasure is there will his heart be also.

It may have been such casuistry which caused Edward Gibbon in his well-known literary work Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire to write, “To a philosophic eye the vices of the clergy are far less dangerous than their virtues.” It is easy to dismiss this by reminding ourselves that Gibbon was a skeptic, but it might help if we earnestly weighed the observation.

Not only the world which surrounds our little oasis regards us as “the clergy” when we appropriate the function of preaching, and contract to proclaim the word at so much per annum with vacation time specified. The saints who are taxed to support the organizational complex feel the same way. It is “the minister” who has his name on the signboard out front and upon the official letterhead. He has an office in the consecrated structure, and often a secretary who alone can admit you to the inner sanctum. The very world we have created for ourselves sets him apart.

In many places the bishops are “the forgotten men.” The catalog of tremendous qualifications expressed to Timothy and Titus were given apparently to make sure that a man was qualified to officiate ten minutes per week at the Lord’s table, and in some places to wear a white carnation on the coat lapel as contrasted with the deacons who may be identified with the wearing of a pink rosebud. I always get a bang out of being around a group of men who get in a real dither just before time to march in to the stage, about whether or not everyone has his flower pinned on.

Hardly anyone ever calls the bishops to advise with them in times of marital, financial or social difficulties. The elders are not solicited to come and counsel a wayward son. If a member of the flock is hospitalized a frantic search is made to locate “the minister” to go and “have prayer.” I have long been concerned with what we do when we have prayer.

In justification for the brethren who hoped to devote their efforts to proclaiming the message of God’s grace, I must point out that they are upset and frustrated because they have been caught in the gears of the institutional meat-grinder or are constantly being run through the congregational corn-sheller. In their hearts they believe in the priesthood of all believers and in the ministry of all the saints. Secretly, I think a lot of them resent being put on the stage to say “the right things” in “the proper way” which means to employ the kind of religious jargon and double-talk which opposes sin without making it lose its respectability.

But “The System” operates to produce professionals, and a lethargic and indolent people, good-hearted though they may be, would rather hire someone whom they can own to “conduct worship,” whatever that may mean, than to worship in Spirit and in truth. And “The System” operates only to perpetuate itself just as does the political system or the economic system. And it makes no difference who is elected or selected. The System does not change.

“The System” uses men so long as they follow its unwritten creed and conform to its traditional method. But men are expendable. They are good only so long as they produce. Once they rebel at being owned and made flunkies they will be sent packing and reduced to a pulp, made to feel that they are deserters, renegades and apostates. And all of this will be done by good people who think they are following the will of Jesus. So it becomes easier just to play ball than to fight the team, the umpires and the fans in the stands. I say it is easier, but deep inside it corrodes the soul.

Since I have nothing to lose but my soul, and cannot be hired, fired, or railroaded out of anything, I think, with your permission, that in my next issue I will make some rather simple and plain suggestions about what we can do to get out of the trap without having to gnaw a leg off. I hope you will read it, and if you don’t agree with it, I will love you and praise the Lord anyhow! But I would like to have you read it! In the meantime may God bless you!

Not An Ambassador

Mission Messenger (February 1974)

[Abstract]

During the past several years it has been my privilege to associate directly with several groups of young people affiliated with the “Jesus Folk.” This is a loose categorization because they come in a lot of varieties like lettuce seed. I have visited their communes, lived with them for brief periods of time and shared with them their interest in my best friend, “the man from Galilee.” In every instance I have been received with respect and politeness and the hours we have spent together have enriched my life.

Many of these young people are from homes where their parents had no commitment to Christ. Some of them, sensing their rejection, developed hostilities and went the whole route of the “Beat” generation. Many of them know the agonizing and frightful battle against drug addiction, having been hooked for long months. Some are young Jews, and a few of these I have helped to lead to Jesus as the Messiah, the Son of God, the one who can put it all together.

It has been an interesting thing to me to listen to these eager young people who know that Jesus is real, and who accept the Bible as the word of God. They do not question the origin of the scriptures nor doubt the validity of what they teach. But with no previous discipline of study they are likely to think that Ezekiel was writing directly to the people in Saint Louis or San Francisco, and this results in some bizarre interpretations and applications.

Since they are correct in assuming that God has lost none of His power and the infinite time-clock is not about to run down, they sometimes conclude that He sends direct messages or “prophecies” today. I have been in a lot of groups where an earnest, soft-spoken young man, with long hair and a bearded face, stood up in faded jeans, while reading a “prophecy” he had “received from God.” Invariably these are quaint and generally couched in the 1611 language of the translators of King James.

I never raise a question about the origin of such a message before the group where love for one another prevails with such intensity and there is an eagerness to know the will of God for life which previously was so raw and frightening. Instead, I seek out the young “prophet” and sit down with him to quietly talk over the nature of God’s revelation.

It comes as a surprise to many of my youthful friends who have rejected the symbols of an affluent, but morally-degenerating society, that I hold that God’s revelation was completed some nineteen centuries ago. I do not believe there has been an additional revelation since John wiped the ink from the point of the calamus and laid it aside after penning “The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen.” Our knowledge of God’s will for our lives is by deeper insight into revealed truth, and not by additional revelation.

When Jesus came in the flesh, he embodied all the traits and characteristics of Godhood in the flesh. And while he was here he called, qualified and commissioned certain men to be his ambassadors. He designed to give unto them and their contemporary assistants, the prophets, a knowledge of the mystery which had never before been divulged, that the Gentiles were to be incorporated into one body with the Jews, and made partakers of the glorious promises. Paul said, “By revelation he made known to me the mystery . . . which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit” (Ephesians 3:3, 5).

This revelation was given to them to make all men see the mystery of the fellowship. The revelation was not given to all men, but to the apostles and prophets. Through their proclamation all men will be led to see God’s purpose. The household of God, the saintly citizens, are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone (Ephesians 2:20). God is not still laying the foundation. He is building upon it. We no more need additional apostles and prophets than we need another Christ.

There are no ambassadors for Christ alive today. An ambassador is a minister of state with special powers, given the authority to act in behalf of and instead of a sovereign who has sent him forth, in making treaties and formulating covenants. It is improper to sing of ourselves implying we are ambassadors. The apostles were ambassadors of the King. They were empowered to sit on twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes. Paul declared, “Now then we (that is, the apostles) are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ’s stead, be ye reconciled unto God.”

I have no ambassadorial power. All I can do is to repeat to men the terms of amnesty which the ambassadors revealed. The apostles and prophets had no successors to office because they fulfilled the purpose of the office for all time. They did not abdicate their office, they retained it. They are in the foundation as much as they ever were and they exercise authority through their revelation. I am built upon that foundation. I am one of the living stones growing together with others into a holy temple in the Lord.

But I am not a prophet or revelator. If I received a revelation from God as did the apostles it should be incorporated in the holy scriptures. If the Spirit gave me a message for a congregation in Buffalo there should be an addition to the sacred canon, starting out, "Carl called to be an apostle, to the saints in Buffalo." But I assure you there will be no First and Second Carl to augment First and Second Peter, nor will there be a First and Second Buffalo to update the letters to Corinth. I am still digging into the apostolic revelation and coming up with ideas to revolutionize my feeble intellect and bring me closer to "the man from outside."

Modern "prophecies" and "messages from God" are generally the fruit of a meditative and contemplative heart, suddenly rescued from despair and depression and brought back from the brink of death. When one goes through a crisis experience of deep despondency and finds help from an unseen hand reaching down to snatch him back from a world of scrambled brains and confused minds he is eager to praise and magnify his deliverer and he ought to be. As thoughts of purity and thanksgiving begin to seep back into a heart which was empty and void, he is liable to mistake them for a revelation from God. In a sense they are, of course, a revelation to him, uncovering what previously was a mystery and foreign to his heart. Too, it seems a natural tendency of those who have been saved to think of themselves as the saviour of others.

I like to sit and explain this to my young friends to whom Jesus is so new and His word so fresh. Maybe we are in the student lounge or it might be we sit down on the library steps outside. Most of them listen respectfully because they know I love them very deeply. And a lot of them concur in my explanation of revelation. Many of them exhibit more enthusiasm about what I say than those who sit in the pews and sometimes nap through the class on Sunday morning. As one kid put it recently, "Wow! Like that's great! To think that God exploded that artesian well nineteen-hundred years ago, and I've been running around with my tongue hanging out and dried up like a piece of leather from thirst and didn't know where to go and get a drink. Man, that's cool. It comes on heavy!"

When I got back to my car in the university public parking lot, I buckled the seat belt in order to silence the buzzer, and leaned back and said "Wow!" An old duffer like me! But then I am not used to that kind of enthusiasm about the word of God. Some folks my age don't intend to get used to it.

Error and Sin

Mission Messenger (February 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

Several months ago I made a distinction between error and sin. My almost casual reference has brought several requests that I enlarge upon my statement and explain more fully what I meant. Sin is essentially a product of the heart, while error is a mistake of the mind. Jesus declared, “But what comes out of the mouth has its origins in the heart; and that is what defiles a man. Wicked thoughts, murder, adultery, fornication, theft, perjury, slander— these all proceed from the heart” (Matthew 15:18, 19).

Basic to sin is the factor which was responsible for the first transgression, the exaltation of self and enthronement of the ego to a sovereign state which denies or defies the authority of God. It is rejection of the principle, “Thy will, not mine be done,” and acceptance of the opposing rule of action, “My will, not thine be done.” Sin is the revolt against God of an accountable being. It is often the result of a deliberate choice to do one’s thing without reference to the will of God.

Not all sin is premeditated. One may sin through ignorance and when he becomes aware of it he must at once proceed to secure forgiveness. This is made clear in the old covenant scriptures. “If any person among the common people sins inadvertently and does what is forbidden in any commandment of the Lord, thereby incurring guilt, and the sin he has committed is made known unto him, he shall bring his offering, etc.”

A man may be in error and not be a sinner, although error may lead one to sin. But simply being wrong or faulty in understanding is not a sin. It is obviously better to be right about everything than to be wrong about anything, but infallibility is not an attribute of fallible man. It is ridiculous for our brethren to fight the doctrines of infallibility in Rome which recognizes only one man as infallible, and then create a system which demands that every man be infallible to be received into their number. One may even understand the terminology in which a proposition is stated and be mistaken about the proper application of it.

No one has yet apprehended all truth in its fulness, not even revealed truth. Therefore, no human mind can be used as a measure or criterion for all minds. The most brilliant mind on earth is finite, and is by nature incapable of grasping the infinite. No generation exhausts the possibility of apprehension so that knowledge can be frozen at the level of that generation and all research cease. To attempt to freeze knowledge at a given level is actually to freeze ignorance.

All sects demanding conformity are based upon the false premise that all honest men will form the same judgments and reach the same conclusions when exposed to the same doctrinal revelation. Because of this, it is further assumed that any person who forms a divergent opinion is simply not honest. There are several things which indicate this is not so. It is not the case in any other field. A good example is constitutional law. The Constitution of the United States reads the same to every jurist, but there are grave differences over its implications. Even justices of the Supreme Court differ, and are seldom a unit in their decision. That is why we are treated to majority and minority opinions.

Moreover, even the most rigid parties among us acknowledge that universality of opinion is unattainable by thinking men. For this reason they elevate the one issue around which they polarize and it becomes the partisan beau ideal, while on many other matters tolerance is exercised. Thus, men who must pay lipservice to an opinion about certain institutions and their mode of support in order to be regarded as loyal by a party which runs up the factional standard may disagree about scores of other matters, some of which are regarded as of such vital importance by others that they build parties around them.

Actually, what happens is that an opinion, or interpretation, is made into a dogma or creed, and becomes the foundation upon which another sect is built. The glory of the faith revealed is that it is not predicated upon a metaphysical conclusion but upon belief of certain historical facts validated by credible witnesses. One who acknowledges that the subject of these facts, Jesus of Nazareth, is the Messiah and God's Son, and surrenders his being unto his lordship may be in error about many other things and still be saved.

There are no error-free disciples of Jesus in the flesh. Instead of arrogantly pretending that we have perfect knowledge, our proper attitude should be one of openness to truth, so we can alter our concepts as we learn more. One is not wishy-washy when he changes his course because of a greater knowledge of the Father's will. The person to be pitied is the one who is glued to his past and is afraid to read or investigate what is said by those who differ with him, for fear he might be changed.

There is room in Christ for those who are mistaken else none of us could be in him. Freedom from error is not a term of admission into the family of the Father, but trust in His Son is certainly required. All of us are in error about many things, even though we have an eager desire to know the truth. We are not rebelling against God. We love him and seek to obey his will as we understand it. Being mistaken is not a sin unless it is deliberate and voluntary. It is for this reason we must be gracious toward and tolerant of our brethren. Tolerance is not endorsing anything you believe to be wrong, but simply enduring someone who believes it to be right.

I think it will be readily agreed that we will never be able to unite all who believe in Jesus sincerely, except upon the ground of those things which are universally admitted, that is, truth which is at once recognizable as essential to the very nature and structure of the kingdom of heaven. It is for this reason that the apostle while writing about the unity of the Spirit, defined it in terms of seven cardinal facts. Nothing else can possibly produce unity among men in their current state.

I subscribe wholeheartedly to the statement of Alexander Campbell, "It must strike every man of reflection, that a religion requiring much mental abstraction or exquisite refinement of thought, or that calls for the comprehension or even apprehension of refined distinctions and of nice subtleties, is a religion not suited to mankind in their present circumstances . . . Christianity consists infinitely more in good works than in sound opinions, and while it is a joyful truth that he that believes and is baptized shall be saved, it is equally true that he that says, 'I know him, and keeps not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him.'"

When opinions, interpretations and deductions are made the rallying-ground of the saints, when they must be subscribed to in order to be received, then we have new creeds and new confessions, and then we will have new parties and sects. When orthodoxy becomes the standard for judging righteousness, all of the powers of the inquisition, though refined, will again be the agents of conformity! And that will be a sad day!

White or Black Shoes

Mission Messenger (February 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

For several years I have been impressed by those members of the Dunkard Brethren Church whom it has been my privilege to meet. They are gentle, humble and unassuming. Like myself, they prefer the plain life, and this carries over, as it should, into their public expressions of praise to God. They have frequently attended my meetings in which instrumental music was not employed, since they deplore it, as do certain Presbyterian congregations. I have recently read a book Purity of Worship by M. C. Ramsay, M. A., containing a stern denunciation of instrumental music. It is distributed by the Presbyterian Church of Eastern Australia.

The Dunkard Brethren are one of the segments of a fragmented restoration movement and have their roots in what historians refer to as “the radical reformation” to distinguish between it and the one which Martin Luther helped kindle. They publish a paper called Bible Monitor, under the auspices of a Dunkard Brethren congregation located on a rural route out of Converse, Indiana. I have been a reader of this little periodical for many months.

I am intrigued by its motto which reads: “Spiritual in life and scriptural in practice.” The purpose is stated thus: “Be it our constant aim to be more sanctified, more righteous, more holy, and more perfect through faith and obedience.” I am sure that my own readers would label this as a worthy objective. The writers for the little paper are not journalists. They, like those in most religious parties which are exclusivistic, know all of the other adherents and recognize immediately the faithful and loyal.

I am also an heir of an attempt to produce unity by a restoration of the primitive order of things, but our forebears were principally from Scotland and Ireland. Those who sired groups like the Dunkard Brethren came primarily from Germany and the Low Countries. They were serious in their attempt to reproduce the way of life in the first century and thus made the love-feast, foot-washing, and the prayer veil for female communicants, part of their recognized approach to God. Our brethren, when confronted with these matters, arbitrarily decided they were simply cultural customs and threw them out as having no relationship to restoration.

Every restoration movement always has two barrels at hand while studying the scriptures. One is labeled "To be retained" and the other "To be discarded." As men study the word, which is so plain that a wayfaring man even if he is a fool cannot err therein, they throw in one barrel what is binding, and in the other what can be left out. The trouble arises because they cannot all agree on which things should go in which barrel. Even after they get the party barrels filled to their satisfaction with the right assortment, someone always gets itchy fingers and lifts something out of one and throws it into the other. Then a fight breaks out, a new faction is spawned and a "loyal paper" is started to resist the encroachments of the apostates.

No restoration movement ever has an easy time. Although their divergent groups always debate and argue, each one is "the Lord's church" and "faithful to the Book." In some Texas cities there are as many as ten different groups called "Church of Christ." Every one of them is "faithful to the Book" as they describe themselves, while all of the others are disloyal. They may be more nearly correct on the latter statement than on the first.

Even humble folk like the Dunkard Brethren have problems. It is difficult to “hold the line” against innovations. This comes to light in the October 15 issue of Bible Monitor. A good sister is writing about certain conditions which she evaluates as “Satan perching on the front benches of our churches today.” Her chief concern is the mode of dress. In order to preserve what is called “gospel plainness” the Brethren have always worn unadorned black suits with no coat lapels. They have rejected neckties and wrist watches as symbols of pride and worldliness.

The women have always worn drab looking dresses with black shoes. The head covering is a plain bonnet, an indispensable part of the costume. There is no jewelry or hair styling. All of this is fairly well maintained in a rural setting with its isolationism and clannishness. But the world does not remain static in order to accommodate our faith. People tend to travel more in times of affluence and the Brethren are not immune to this tendency.

So the good sister “humbly submitted” an article detailing her concern. She decried the wearing of white, pink, yellow, or blue shoes, in place of black ones. She was agitated about those who were beginning to wear colorful prints “instead of the plain modest dress” and who added insult to injury by styling their hair high, while setting the covering half-way back on their heads. She knew that some had even worn a watch on the wrist.

In her inner agony of spirit, she asked, “Where is our church going to end at? Will there be a sharp turn that we will have to take or will the church keep going, hoping that some day these poor souls will wake up? Will there be such a church as we so-called Dunkard Brethren people in twenty years from now? It makes me wonder.”

Some of my readers will be inclined to smile smugly at the quaint, old-fashioned things regarded as visible symbols of holiness by good people. I do not share that feeling at all. I find myself filled with compassion because I have been associated all of my life with people who have projected other things as symbols of that same quality.

The word of God enjoins modesty in apparel, but it was uninspired men who decided one was a better person if he wore black shoes rather than white, or squinted at the sun or looked at a pocket watch rather than one strapped about his wrist. The Dunkard Brethren are right to urge modesty but they are wrong in thinking it can be obtained by arbitrary selections bound upon others by human dogma. These things are not indicative of Christian discipline but of party subservience, and they are enforceable only so long as men check in their intellects and abdicate their right to think or question.

Certainly one can be pure in heart if he has lapels on his coat. He can also be immoral in a coat without lapels. To paraphrase the scripture and take some liberty with it, "Neither a creased gray hat availeth anything, nor a plain flat black one, but faith which works by love." But let those who read this paper not look with disdain upon our friends in other groups for we share the same hangups and often judge the worthiness of others before God by their conformity unto us and our traditions.

Transforming Speech

[Abstract]

Words may be either servants or masters. If the former they may safely guide us in the way of truth. If the latter they intoxicate the brain and lead into swamps of thought where there is no solid footing. Among the sources of those innumerable calamities which from age to age have overwhelmed mankind, may be reckoned as one of the principal the abuse of words. — Thomas Hartwell Horne.

It was Sir Winston Churchill who came up with the famous quip that the inhabitants of Great Britain and the United States were one people separated only by a common language. I learned how true that was when I first went to Great Britain. Up to that time I had always assumed that I spoke English, but after I heard the English brethren speak I knew that one of us did not. Since they were on home territory I gave them the benefit of the doubt.

The same thing may be said of those in the various segments of the restoration movement of which we are heirs. I think you could blindfold me and allow me to listen for ten minutes to a brother from the non-instrumental Church of Christ talking to one from the Christian Church, and I could pick out the one who represented each segment. As Simon Peter was told when he was trying to gate-crash on those who arrested Jesus, “Your speech betrays you.”

Both groups have their distinctive terminology or jargon, and one does not need to be a linguist to pick them out. I know a brother who claims he can listen five minutes to a radio speaker from the Churches of Christ and tell which “brotherhood school” he attended. One day he was stumped. He could not tell whether a speaker was from Harding College or Abilene Christian College. It turned out that he had gone to both and each had left its mark upon him. Each has its own version of the “holy twang” as it used to be said of the pioneer preachers.

We form our vocabulary by our thinking and we also form our thinking by our vocabulary. It is true that “as a man thinketh in his heart so is he,” but it is equally true that “as a man speaketh so will he become.” Most of us are unwitting victims of our speech habits and some of us are unwilling to be, but we have been bound by the skeins of custom and tradition until we are as helpless as Gulliver when wound up in the threads of the Lilliputians.

This is made especially manifest among Christian Church leaders who nod vigorous assent when I point out publicly that under Christ there are no holy days, holy things, or holy places. There are only holy people, and the only sanctuary God has on earth now is a consecrated human heart. Before the service has concluded someone will inevitably announce that the morning question forum will be in the adult study room while the night gathering will meet back in the sanctuary. Not long ago, a man said to me, after a meeting which had been frequently punctuated with vociferous “Amens” that “If these people get home and think [about] what you really said, they will recall every amen they uttered, and you’ll be in for trouble!” Apparently no one went home and thought about what I said.

If one of the brethren is present from the “anti-Sunday School wing” of our ripped-off brotherhood he will always get me off to one side and point out, in all seriousness, that the term “adult classroom” is in the same category with “sanctuary.” It is getting to the place where everyone but me is so jumpy that I may have to do all the talking and air my mistakes. I've got a lot of them which could stand a little airing, I'm sure.

I had better get to my theme, though, and quit rambling around and visiting with you as if you had all day. It could be your wife is waiting for you to help dry the dishes. Let me begin by saying that I have yet to meet very many brethren who do not pay lipservice at least to the priesthood of all believers, and the ministry of all the saints. When I bear down on that theme publicly, and I generally manage to squeeze it in somehow, the preachers who are present nod assent as fervently as they ignore what I say when I leave town.

I am convinced that most of us know we have been maneuvered around by the Enemy until we are trapped into perpetuating a system which is not scriptural, but we feel we must hang on to it or see all of "our gains" washed down the drain. I think the average man hired to be "the minister" of a congregation of God's priests would be tickled pink if the elders told him they were going to put him on the program to take his turn at edifying the saints about once every three months, while other brethren spoke on the other Sundays. There is little danger of that happening in a lot of places because the followers of Jesus would desert the place like flies when someone gets the Flit gun out. If the preacher didn't speak there wouldn't be anything to complain about while eating the pork roast and browned potatoes.

All of us pay lipservice to the priesthood of all believers but the thought that we should practice it has somehow escaped us in the shuffle until it is as remote as trying to fly to heaven without wings. There is no greater waste of talent on earth today than is found in the average community of believers. If a business concern or manufacturing plant carried on like we do it would have to file for bankruptcy in less than six months. If the physical body never exercised any member but the mouth it would become flabby, futile and frustrated. We've got a big team but no one ever carries the ball but the coach. The rest of us stay in the huddle. When "the board" meets in a lot of places it is to plan more work for an overworked preacher and even then the meeting breaks up in a verbal fight. If the members spent as much energy in visiting the sick and going about doing good as they do in squabbling we could take the world for Jesus. There is no energy shortage in the talk field.

We have not restored the primitive ideal of a community able to edify itself without importing a professional edifier. We have let out the job of building us up in the most holy faith to a building contractor. Instead of having an equipping ministry we have developed quipping entertainers. And the congregation grows larger in number and weaker in ability. We do not seem to distinguish between flab and muscle, and we think that the bigger we get the more righteous we are. The biggest man I ever saw was in a carnival sideshow, but he was so helpless he couldn't even walk. They had to swing him over into a truck with a derrick. People came to see him but he did not do anything.

It is not at all certain that the devil cares how many we take in provided they act like many of those already there. They do not fight him any harder now that they are in the army of the Lord than they did while still on his team. Salvation in Christ Jesus and sanctification of the Spirit mean a great deal more than getting people into the water and enrolling their names on the roster and reporting their accession. Being in the church no more guarantees that you are a Christian than being in a potato patch assures you are a potato.

We bang away at the Jehovah's Witnesses as if they were the worst thing that has happened to the country aside from Watergate and the gasoline shortage. And I confess that ever since I was a lad and knew how they had to alter their books to cover up some of the laughable prophetic blunders of Pastor

Russell, who missed the mark as far as Joseph Smith of the Mormons, it has taken a lot of genial good will to be patient with them. Yet, with all of their ludicrous cover-ups they come more nearly practicing the ministry of all believers than those of us who have to hurry home on Sunday so we will not miss the Green Bay Packers or an old John Wayne movie on television.

Of course, one could sit here like I am doing and complain about his brethren until after dark, but it would do little good. So I want to suggest some changes in our spiritual vocabulary which will help us to more nearly do what we timidly affirm we would like to do. If you cannot agree with what I write, praise the Lord anyhow! I will not get uptight because you do not see it like I do. But I'll never die happy without writing it and I am sure you want me to die— happy, that is!

1. We need to quit talking about people “entering the ministry” when we mean taking up preaching as a profession, or means of livelihood, or both. Any service we render for Jesus is ministry. The brother who mows the lawn at the meetinghouse is a minister. So is the one who repairs the furnace or the speaker system. A mother who takes care of her children and rears them in the fear of the Lord is a minister. The sisters who meet and make quilts for the home for the aged are ministers of God.

We enter the ministry when we are baptized into Christ, and if we do not, there is something seriously wrong. The word minister is merely another word for servant, and just as a soldier enters the service the day he is inducted, so we enter the service of the King the day we pledge allegiance to Him in baptism.

2. We need to quit talking about people volunteering for “full time service” when we are referring to them accepting a special assignment. This makes it appear that the saints who do not march up and stand in front at “the altar call” are not full-time servants. But God has no shift workers and no part-time workers. Anyone who is in Jesus is in him day and night, body and soul. The very act of having Christians come up and volunteer for “full-time service” creates the impression that those who do not are not obligated completely. But just as a soldier who enlists is a full-time soldier, so every Christian who has enlisted is a full-time soldier. You do not turn Jesus off like you do the gas burner or the faucet in the kitchen sink.

3. We need to quit talking about people “leaving the ministry” when they get tired of trying to find sermon outlines for Sunday and go into the real estate business or start teaching biology in high school. A man who sells real estate is God’s minister in the real estate firm. If he is not he probably would not be God’s minister in the pulpit either. One who teaches languages in a public school is as much God’s minister as one who preaches on Sunday.

Every Christian is a minister, every child of God is a priest. All of us claim to believe that, but if you think we do, let someone change his card from reading John Doe, Minister; to make it read John Doe, Priest, and see what the elders do to him. But why not? If you can take one word that applies to all of the saints and appropriate it for your embossed calling card, why not take another one? But a person who quits preaching as his job may not “leave the ministry” at all. He may exchange one field of ministry where he feels inept for another where he can function with greater latitude and success. You only leave the ministry if you leave Jesus. I know some men who are preaching and who would be Grade A automobile mechanics. Why should they continue to stay in the pulpit where everyone is gritting his teeth at them when they could repair automobiles for the brethren and win their smiles, whether they had teeth or not?

One need not quit working in a factory to “become a minister.” Paul was as much a minister of Christ when he was sewing tents or riding a plank in the ocean after a shipwreck, as when he was standing on Mars’ Hill telling the Athenians about the God who made heaven and earth and all things that are in them. Luke was as much God's minister while prescribing for patients, as when traveling with Paul. Zenas was God's minister while practicing law. We have been trapped into thinking that ministry consists of making talks in a holy place, a dedicated structure, a temple made with hands, but that may not really be fulfilling our real vocation.

Elton Trueblood hit the nail on the head, and hit some of us in the same place, when he pointed out that it was a neat device for people to hire someone to be their minister, thus relieving all of the ordinary members of ministerial responsibilities. He adds, "But this way lies death," and then he tells why. You ought to read it in that engrossing book The Incendiary Fellowship.

Incidentally, I am pretty much encouraged by what a lot of good Anglicans and others are writing in these days. I suspect that about fifty years from now a good many of those within the "restoration movement" will be saying the same things. We tend to take about that long to catch up because of our enforced isolationism, and tendency to read only what is written by "faithful brethren," who are often not very faithful and certainly not good writers.

One statement that helps me was written by Bishop Stephen Baynes in the London Church Times: "There is nobody stuffier than a parson who is acutely conscious of the privileges of his order, of his monopoly of theological learning, liturgical authority, general sanctity, and so on. The worst of it is that the laity so often believe in all this nonsense, and put the sacred ministry on a pedestal, until they feel that the only way a man can serve God is by being ordained."

Then there was the statement of Canon Edward Patey, who was addressing a group of teachers from a technical college, meeting in Coventry: "All orders are holy. Plumbers are as much in holy orders as the clergy, serving God and their fellows.

Electricians, park-keepers, doctors and typists are all working as much with the things of God as the priest with the sacrament.” Of course I allow a little for the language of these good Episcopalians, seeing they have their own jargon as do we, but with a few men like these augmenting J. B. Phillips, John R. W. Stott, Michael Green, and the late C. S. Lewis, we might get something going even yet!

4. We need to quit making a big furor over those who propose to prepare for certain kinds of ministry to the exclusion of those who expect to pursue other avenues of service. It may take more intestinal fortitude to teach a third grade in a ghetto school in the inner-city in America than to hie off to some place in Africa as a missionary. Let me explain further. I know a congregation which takes particular pride in the number of preachers it has started out, through the years. And it has had phenomenal success. This is the constant emphasis and pressures are brought to bear on young people in high school to make plans to “prepare for the ministry.” They are urged to keep alive the tradition and “not let the church down.” In almost every meeting where visitors are present someone proudly mentions the number of men who have “entered the ministry.”

Every year a dinner is held to “honor recruits” and high school graduates who have enlisted for “full-time service” are seated at the head table with their parents and grandparents at a special table nearby. Each recruit is presented an expensive Bible after being lauded for his decision. But no one mentions those high school students who have resolved to devote their lives to teaching history, majoring in sociology, or serving as research technicians in the field of space exploration. Yet if these latter live for Jesus and witness to his impact upon their lives they may do as much to change the hearts of men as those who are granted public acclaim.

There is nothing wrong with having a dinner for those who are going to minister for Jesus, but it should be held for all of them, and not for a special caste. The one who presides might well say, “Tonight we have met to honor four young people who are graduating from high school and want to pursue the ministry in which they enlisted at the time of their baptism into Christ Jesus. One expects to be God’s minister in proclaiming the Word on campus, another in operating a Shell Service station, still another in coaching athletics, while another will be driving his father’s garbage disposal truck.” Granted this may not enhance “the image” of the church, but the last will certainly improve the state of the community. And it has been my experience that those who carve out an image, always end up bowing before it and worshipping it.

I know you think I threw that “garbage truck” bit in for kicks, but I did not. I want to tell you a true story of using a garbage truck as a pulpit from which to share the good news. It did not have a sign on it “Gospel Chariot” like you see on some “church buses” running around town on Sunday. But it was a gospel chariot just the same.

One of the most interesting men I have ever met firmly believes that God has called every Christian to share the good news. He never “studied to be a preacher” and I doubt that he even finished high school. If you were out shooting preachers (and I hope you are not), he would be the last one you’d fire at, and you might not aim at him at all. He doesn’t look like a preacher and he doesn’t act like one. About the only thing he has in common with preachers is that he eats a lot. But I confess that I have learned things from him that no “clergyman” ever taught me. He has a heart of gold but his courage is solid brass. He is one of the best psychologists I have ever seen.

He started three congregations by just going from door to door in as many areas, and talking to people with such genuine warmth and concern that he won their confidence and started home Bible studies all over the place. Every time he baptized thirty or forty and they were going real good someone would move up from Georgia or Alabama and want to bring in a preacher from down home to “set the place on fire.” All three places were successfully bombed and embalmed by “down home preachers” who got everyone into a big fracas and then headed back to the promised land that flowed with grits and red-eye gravy.

A lesser man would have become discouraged, but this man was too simple for that. He knew he was called to be faithful, not successful, so he just kept on and left the final account with God. He developed a real burden upon his heart for a resort area where many came to spend the entire summer, leaving Jesus at home, if indeed they ever knew him. He resolved to plant the cause in the area with God’s help, so he sat down and talked over the strategy of conquest with his wife, a motherly soul who never placed an obstacle in his path. He agreed that he should get into some kind of work which would enable him to visit every house regularly and where the people would like to see him come and even welcome him.

While he and his wife were praying a thought struck him like a coconut dropping from a palm tree. Everyone welcomed the garbage man. The longer he stayed away the more anxious they were to see him. If he missed them they would call him up to see what was the matter. So he bought a garbage truck from a city firm which was glad to sell an old one. He had some notices printed soliciting business. On the back of the cards were the words, “Jesus will be asked to be my partner in this business as he has been in all else I have done. I shall try to treat you as I think he would want me to.”

He got all of the business he could handle and people came out to talk to him about his card. Then he had a small folder printed, very neatly done with the words on the front page reading, “I can clean up the mess in your driveway but only Jesus can clean up the mess in our hearts.” In less than six months seventeen people were gathering every Sunday in a room in the sports pavilion to break bread in memory of Jesus. If you had a hundred garbage-men like this in a state you'd start a hundred new congregations and no one would be bugged by a financial drive to get them going!

Please don't get me wrong. We should not get rid of preachers. We can use more of them than we have, and we should support them and do so well. What we need to do is to free them to do what God wants them to do, take the good news to a perishing world. We need to grow up in Christ Jesus until we do not need to pay a man to referee our little dogfights, listen to our whining complaints about other brethren, and act as a glorified nursemaid in God's incubator room. Why can we not learn to feed ourselves? Why do we need someone else to warm the pabulum and break the Melba toast of the bread of life into little bite size chunks for us? Let's support brethren who have the ability and willingness to take the message to the pagan culture instead of making them errand boys for the church.

Since we are all priests let's start acting like priests. This doesn't mean to turn your collar around but it does mean to reverse your thinking. Look around you. Study the congregation and community. What needs are there? How can you best serve those needs? What can you do that will count for God? Let's straighten up our vocabulary and straighten out our lives. Let us quit saying, "There he is Lord, send him!" and start saying, like Isaiah, "Here am I Lord, send me!"

Kokichi Kurosaki, in his book One Body in Christ, points out, "Man is a creation of God and God does not create like a factory, by mass production." You are a minister of God, but you are a unique minister of God, and thus, your ministry will be unique. If you do not carry it out no one else can.

The Last Prophecy

Mission Messenger (March 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

A few days ago I was reading in my recently acquired copy of The New International Bible, when I decided to study again the gospel record of John. I found myself especially wrapped up in the account of the resurrection of Lazarus, which Alfred Edersheim declares “marks the highest point in the ministry of our Lord.” It was this event which started the ball really rolling which made Golgotha the watershed of human history (John 11:51).

All of us are going to be raised from the dead by the voice of Jesus, but the case of Lazarus was a little different. He became sick and died specifically that Jesus could reach the summit of his miraculous demonstration by calling him back from his dreamless sleep. When Martha and Mary sent messengers to inform Jesus, “Lord, the one you love is sick,” Jesus returned the word, “This sickness will not end in death. No, it is for God’s glory so that God’s Son may be glorified through it.”

It is not my purpose here to detail what happened. Suffice it to say that by the time Jesus arrived at Bethany, about two miles from Jerusalem, Lazarus had been dead for four days. But when Jesus went to the grave and called for him to come out, the record says that he did so with his hands and feet wrapped with strips of linen, and a cloth around his face. Jesus said to the onlookers, "Take off the graveclothes and let him go."

So impressive was this event that a lot of the Jews who had come to console Mary, expressed faith in Jesus. But there were others who hastened back to Jerusalem to tell the Pharisees what Jesus had done. They were so upset that they joined the chief priests in summoning a meeting of the Sanhedrin. When they convened the members were all in a dither. "What are we accomplishing in trying to stop the influence of Jesus?" they asked, and then added, "Here is this man performing many miraculous signs." The enemies of Jesus who were present acknowledged the miracles. It is only his enemies who were not present who deny them.

The power of miracles such as the raising of Lazarus, to make believers was acknowledged freely by the members of the august council. They could not forget that they lived in an occupied country and that the Romans were suspicious of all Jews who began to amass a following. So they said, "If we let him go on like this, everyone will put their trust in him, and then the Romans will come and take away both our temple and our nation."

At this point, Joseph Caiaphas, the high priest that year, spoke up. "You know nothing at all! You do not realize that it is better for you that one man die for the people than that the whole nation perish." The Sanhedrists were apt students of the Torah and the traditions, and thus recognized at once the quotation from the Midrash, or commentary, Bereshith Rabba, "It is better one man should die than the community perish."

Here was justification for planning the death of Jesus. Despite the Roman prohibition, denying the right of the Jews to execute a man, the high priest had furnished them the motivation for ridding themselves of Jesus in order to preserve the nation which God had ordained. The power of miracles clashed with political expediency and the latter won. John writes, "So from that day they plotted to take his life."

But John also writes something else about the adage of which Caiaphas reminded them. "He did not say this on his own, but as high priest that year, he prophesied that Jesus would die for the Jewish nation, and not only for that nation but also for the scattered children of God, to bring them together and make them one." Caiaphas, who later rent his garments when Jesus was brought before him, did not realize the final outreach of his words. A greater power was behind them, and although the high priest thought only of murdering Jesus to save a nation, God took his words and used them as prophetic of the atonement by which all men may be saved.

It is interesting indeed that John says that the death of Jesus was for God's scattered children "to bring them together and make them one." This was involved in the prediction of Caiaphas although he knew it not. He was the chief religious adviser of those who thought of themselves as exclusively the children of God. In the temple environs where he presided there was a court of the Gentiles with a wall separating it from the court of "the people," and on the wall a painted sign, "Any Gentile crossing this line will incur the penalty of death."

It was the design of an infinite God to use the cross to batter down such walls so that eventually in Christ there would be neither Jew nor Greek, male nor female, bond nor free. All who were called of God and who responded to that call to come out of the domain where sin reigned and trust in the righteousness of Christ Jesus would be one. Caiaphas did not realize this, nor did he know that with his statement Jewish prophecy came to an end. His was the final prophecy and it was involuntary. With him the prophecy of the Mosaic economy, as well as its high priesthood culminated. The goal of prophecy was reached in the atonement and the priesthood of Aaron ceased with the nailing to the cross of the handwriting of ordinances.

I find it thrilling to realize that this last prophecy before the conquest of the arch-fiend of the universe with the weapon he had chosen, was dedicated to the unity of God's scattered children. It is for this reason that I would lend my feeble talents to help gather them together so that the dream of his death may be realized. So long as the children are not one, that long is the will of God not done on earth as it is in heaven.

If he died to make us one I should live to help us realize that unity. I am resolved never to allow any issue, opinion, or human vagary of thought, to undo what His blood has accomplished. Nothing that my brethren may think under the Lordship of Jesus is as important to me as the blood which cleansed us and made possible the blessed new creation. Although my views of the implementation of his will and my ideas of his expressions through his twelve ambassadors are important to me, I shall never allow them to erase the effect of the cross, nor make that tragic death an inglorious failure.

I shall receive all of God's scattered children when and where I find them. I shall receive them not because they agree with me but because they are his children. I shall not seek to make them one with me in any faction, segment or school of thought, but in Christ. If we are in Christ it is enough for me, because it is in Christ God proposed to make us one. I shall never again think, so help me Lord, that only those are his children who huddle around some partisan standard, even though that standard be correct.

Nor will I ever confuse any movement, no matter how valid its claims, with the one body which the Spirit created. Call it restoration movement, unity movement, or whatsoever—movements are launched by men and most of them have worthy basic goals, but the one body is the creation of God and those who are in it have been accepted by God whether accepted by anyone else or not. Movements may be helpful, and even essential, at certain times and because of certain conditions, but when they cease to be regarded as movements, and are equated with the kingdom of heaven, they become dangerous and divisive. Then they cease to be a road to solution and become part of the agonizing problem.

God regards nothing as the body of Christ which contains fewer than all the saved of all the earth. There are factions many and parties many, but there is only one body. By one Spirit we are all baptized into it. The Spirit never baptized any person into a sect or party. And no one was ever baptized into the one body because he was either right or wrong about some secondary issue, but because he believed that Jesus was God's anointed Son.

Let partisan promoters and factional agents cut their brethren off and cull them out because they will not forfeit their right to think for themselves; let them blast each other as liberals and antis, but I shall refuse to be made a political pawn by such childish claptrap. I shall recognize all of God's children and receive all of the redeemed. It is silly to think you can unite by dividing or combine by castigating one another. We will never achieve oneness by debate nor argue ourselves into harmony. We must receive one another where we are and as we are, if we are in Christ Jesus, and the Spirit will lead us into deeper unity and involvement with one another.

We must build bridges rather than erode chasms and throw out lifelines rather than hurl challenges. It is only little men who measure the breadth of truth by their puny and imperfect understanding of it, or who limit the boundaries of divine love by their feeble comprehension of it. If I am mistaken in judgment, and I well may be, I would risk loving too much than too little. I would rather receive as a brother someone God may have rejected, than to reject one whom God has received. If I err in showing mercy let it be in the extension of it to someone undeserving rather than in the neglecting of someone who is.

We are called out of sin and called together in Christ that we may further the divine purpose of uniting the scattered flock. Once we were bitter, carnal and worldly, hated and being hated. Now that we have been rescued from such ungodly behavior, shall we drag the old man of sin from the grave and exhibit these ruthless characteristics among the saints? I have renounced the works of the flesh and have received my brethren. In this path I shall walk!

Was That Thunder?

Mission Messenger (March 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

One of the really intriguing incidents in the life of Jesus took place the day he rode an ass into Jerusalem and the populace turned out to wave palm fronds and scatter them in his path, while yelling, “Hosanna: Blessed is the King of Israel who comes in the name of the Lord!” It may get to you a little when you realize that a few days later some of the same ones were yelling “Crucify him!” But you should not be too cynical. It is always that way. It is the nature of mobs to crown you one week and crucify you the next.

One thing that heightened the excitement on that Sunday was the fact that several people who had been present when Lazarus was summoned from the grave still wrapped in his shroud, were in town, and buttonholing everyone on the street, telling them what had happened. This honed the curiosity of the folks to an edge as sharp as a razor, and they were elbowing their way into good vantage points from which they could get a firsthand glimpse of the wonder worker.

Then something strange happened. A group of Greeks who had turned up in the city for the feast looked for Philip and said to him very politely, “Sir, we would like to have a look at Jesus.” This probably unsettled Philip a little so he consulted with Andrew and the two of them personally relayed the request to Jesus. The result was electrifying. Realizing the importance of the desire of these “other sheep” Jesus pointed out again the necessity and imminence of his death and subsequent glorification.

In the emotional state of the moment he cried out, “Father, glorify thy name.”

Immediately, according to John, a voice spoke from heaven, “I have both glorified it and will glorify it again.” The people who heard it were at once divided in sentiment “Some said that it thundered; others said, An angel spoke to him.” Times have not changed a lot. On the university campus I’m constantly in contact with brilliant young men and women who can’t tell the difference between God speaking and thunder.

Of course the real problem is that a lot of humanistic thinkers do not believe in the supernatural and they have to scramble around to come up with a naturalistic occurrence to explain what took place instead of a miracle. And some of the explanations drummed up are farther out than miracles. You really have to have a lot of faith to go for them!

Even William Barclay, whose background material for the word of God is fantastic, weakens a little bit when confronted with some of the signs that Jesus did, and injects for optional consideration some of the screwball ideas which have been bandied around by theologians whose faith is as weak as their explanations.

A good illustration is the case of the feeding of the five thousand with one hamburger bun for each thousand and a couple of sardines. It is asked if it is logical to believe that people like this would set out without taking food, and it is suggested they all had a pretty ample lunch stashed away in their haversacks. But they were selfish and did not want to get it out lest they might have to share with the others. However, when Jesus began to pass around the meager supply of food which he had cadged from a little kid on the fringe of the crowd, everyone got ashamed and hauled out his provisions, and it turned out they all had more than enough to eat after all.

As Barclay points out, if this explanation is accepted it “was not the miracle of the multiplication of loaves and fishes; it was the miracle of the changing of selfish people into generous people at the touch of Christ. It was the miracle of the birth of love in grudging hearts.” This sounds very beautiful and I am all for changing selfish people, but I do not think for a minute it is what happened here. If it was I doubt that all four of the gospel writers would have recorded it.

Barclay writes that if there was an actual multiplication of loaves and fishes it would be hard to understand. He is correct, but I think that the outstanding expositor overlooks one thing. The miracles of Jesus were happenings. They were matters of fact, and can only be interpreted in the light of evidence or testimony of eyewitnesses. Facts need not be understood in order to accept the testimony. We are not called upon to explain them but to weigh the evidence. It is correctly said that “Facts are stubborn things.” A fact does not depend for its validity upon whether or not anyone can explain it, or whether or not anyone believes it. Belief of a fact may change a man, but disbelief of a man does not change a fact.

I have been saying for years that no one living today can deny the miracles of Jesus. In order to do that one would have had to be present at the time to see whether it happened or did not. All he can do now is to question the veracity of the account of the witnesses, and to do that he must either show they were not present, or, if they were present, they did not have adequate opportunity to know what transpired. Failing this, he must prove they were incompetent because governed by some ulterior motive or were wholly untrustworthy in character. Simply saying you do not believe something happened a couple of thousand years before the earth was blessed by your coming, doesn't mean a lot if there is ample testimony from those alive at the time that it did happen.

I do not know that Jesus fed five thousand people with five loaves and two fishes, because I was not present for the event. If I had been present I would probably have been on the front row, as hungry as I generally am. But I believe it happened and I don't think the idea that everyone had a bunch of sandwiches with him is worth the snap of your finger. I think you have to take courses in advanced theology to believe things like that. It just does not appeal to a common, everyday, down-to-earth disciple of Jesus like myself. You reach conclusions like that by degrees.

Don't forget that Matthew and John were present for the occasion. They helped pass out the food. Their record was written long after the event occurred. Mark records that the disciples came to Jesus and asked him to dismiss the meeting and let the audience go because "they have nothing to eat." If it turned out that all of them had brought an oversize snack along, surely the writers would not have allowed that statement to stand for it would have been a blatant untruth.

Matthew writes that Jesus took the bread and fish, and looking up to heaven, blessed the food, "and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude, and they did all eat and were filled." Mark says, "He gave the loaves to the disciples to set before them, and the two fishes divided he among them all." Luke declares he gave the food to the disciples to set before the multitude. John writes, "He distributed to the disciples, and the disciples to them that were set down; and likewise of the fishes as much as they would."

John, who was on the scene, records an interesting sidelight. After everyone had eaten to repletion and the disciples had gathered up twelve hampers of table scraps, the people got to thinking about it all. John puts it this way, "Then those men, when they had seen the miracle that Jesus did, said, This is of a truth that prophet that should come into the world.” They began to conspire to take Jesus by force and make him a king, and thus inaugurate a welfare state with free food doled out every day. It is hardly sensible they would have talked and acted in this manner if all Jesus did was to inspire them to get their sack lunches out of their knapsacks.

The next day the whole bunch showed up on the other side of the lake to remind Jesus that Moses had fed their fathers every day for forty years while he had just supplied food for one day. They cleverly inserted a couple of questions. “What sign do you contemplate doing so we can see it and believe in you? What do you intend to work?” The intimation was that if Jesus wanted to be thought of as being as great as Moses he would have to put them on a free food stamp program for at least forty years. Jesus was not fooled. He said, “You didn’t look me up because you witnessed the miracles but because you filled your stomachs with the bread I supplied.”

The problem with the one who must explain every act of Jesus in natural terms is not with miracles but with the nature of God. His primary unbelief is not related to miracles but to Deity. I hold that God is omnipotent and all things are possible unto him. I do not need to sit around contriving natural explanations. If the power of God is not supernatural it is not the power of God. So when God speaks I do not flim-flam myself into thinking it merely thundered.

All testimony must be confirmed to be rendered credible. Human testimony is confirmed by natural means, while supernatural testimony is confirmed by supernatural means. Miracles did not make Jesus the Son of God. They merely acted as substantiating proofs that he was what he claimed to be. I am absolutely convinced by the life he lived and the words he spoke that Jesus is the Son of God. I believe the miracles for Jesus’ sake as well as believing in Jesus for the miracles’ sake.

I am pledged to Jesus fully, completely and unreservedly. He is my everything. He is my all. Anyone who tries to weaken my faith in Jesus is wasting his time and mine. I am joined to the Lord and I am one spirit with him. I will not be beaten loose by skepticism nor pried loose by doubt. In fact, I am dead and my life is hid with Christ in God. That's the way it is! And I am happy on the way to glory!

The Changing Scene

Mission Messenger (April 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

Human beings never welcome the news that something they have long cherished is untrue: they almost always reply to that news by reviling its promulgator. — H. L. Mencken in “Minority Report.”

An entomologist, that is a bug-studier, could tell you without batting an eye that a gadfly is of the family Tabanidae. I didn't know that back when I used to drive a two-row cultivator pulled by a nervous team, or try to milk a jittery cow with huge horseflies buzzing the scene and crash-diving on the old girl's hide. And now I guess it doesn't make any difference whether I know it or not. When we talk about gadflies we generally refer to someone who goads our sacred cows, and “bugs” the brethren. A good way to get into real trouble with the folks is to stick a hatpin into a favorite balloon.

You'll forgive me, then, if I deny any ambition to prod one of our borrowed institutions which we have had around “the Lord's church” so long we now think it's scriptural, just as we do a lot of other things we've invented or shoplifted from the bargain counters of some of our sectarian neighbors. Really I no longer get a bang out of pointing out that the whole idea of a professional ministry is foreign to the very nature of the family of God. Brethren do not want to re-consider their practice in the light of the word. They simply prefer to be left alone with it while they “restore” the primitive order.

It used to be that most everyone thought I was kind of a crackpot, or on an anti-institutional “high” for advocating what all of our pioneers contended for so consistently. The generally expressed view was that even if the ministry of all the saints was scriptural it wouldn’t work in this generation when the faith has degenerated into a spectator sport. Our brethren, unlike the Savior, come not to minister, but to be ministered unto. While he came to give his life they are content to come and give their money to keep the machinery running and the gears operating.

This does not mean they are not sincere. It does not imply they are not children of the Father and my brothers and sisters. They are victims, as we all are, of the amalgamation of the once-delivered faith with cultural influences and affluent western civilization values. We have become organized and institutionalized. We cannot do anything Jesus wants done until we form a committee and pass a bunch of by-laws. We’ve painted ourselves into a corner and now the first and greatest commandment is “Thou shalt not rock the boat,” and the second is like unto it, “Thou shalt not make waves.” All of us want to be faithful, but our problem is how to be faithful to Jesus while also being faithful to the image we have carved out.

A lot of good brethren used to think that the ultimate goal was to get a huge congregation, erect a massive cathedral and secure a staff consisting of a senior minister, an associate minister, a youth minister, a minister of education, and a minister of evangelism. The prime task of the elders was to arrange try-outs for rival candidates, bargain with them about salary and fringe benefits and hire the ones who could improve the community image. It was argued, rather vehemently, that we could not hold the people without a good pulpit man, an orator of outstanding ability. No one ever stopped to ask whether we ever truly had those whom you have to keep buckled into their seats with oratory.

Then something happened. A revolution occurred in the world around us and “the establishment” came under fire. The establishment consisted of the political, the economic and the educational systems. It came to be believed these were always operated by an “in group” to manipulate the masses and to perpetuate injustices. Persons really meant nothing except as they were gears in the whirring wheels. As always, the revolution lapped over into opposition to entrenched religion.

A lot of good folk thought the church would not be affected because it was not of this world. The body of Christ is not of this world but the institutional church is very much of this world. For years it has been talking about “the business” of the church, and has been trying to ape the world to get the job done. That is why it was affected by the industrial revolution, and also by the Space Age revolution. And the recent revolutionaries argued that the church has always tolerated greed and practiced racial hatred and segregation, using minority groups to provide entertainment because of their quaint mannerisms. Anyone who thinks this has not been true in the so-called restoration movement needs only to recall how Marshall Keeble, a genial conformist was used to attract white people to a tent which sometimes had a rope stretched down the aisle, with one side reserved for white folk and the other used as a “nigger heaven” like they had in theaters.

In politics the battle raged around the police as guardians of the institution, and against judges as its protectors. In economics it zeroed in on corporation managers, and in education against the administrators, some of whom were locked in their offices while others were locked out. The protesters were not heard by most of us because we were trying to yell louder at them than they did at us.

One reason we were not bothered too greatly was because the protest against the church and organized religion took a slightly different turn. People just dropped out, frustrated, empty and sick at heart, because they were hungry. And most of us thought it was good riddance of bad rubbish, which shows how low we can fall, when we think of God's thirsty people as rubbish. Jesus did not die for rubbish or garbage but for people. But some of us would rather live with garbage than with people.

In any event, when the revolution was directed against the religious establishment it had to seek out as most revolutions do, a figure who was deemed responsible for the closed-door policy. Since the clergyman, or professional preacher was regarded as the authorized spokesman for, and the "top banana" in the religious structure, he lost face. He was toppled from his former pinnacle and his pronouncements, like the stock market, hit a new low in value.

How far he fell in the minds of those who were crystallizing a new culture can best be understood when it is recalled that the village preacher was once called the dominie, or lord, and then the parson. This is simply an Anglo-Saxon word for "the person." The local curate was the man of highest honor. Often he was the only person who could read. Those who received a letter had to visit him to learn what was in it and to have him reply in their behalf. When they raised a good crop of vegetables they always took the preacher enough to see him through the winter. When they butchered, they took him some of the best cuts of meat. He was always called upon to pray at school functions, and was the only one called upon to return thanks for blessings in any home he visited.

He was quite literally the person in the community. He was expected to talk in a different way, and to have a wholly different bearing from others. When he was seen approaching, ribald laughter was softened, and shady stories being told by members of the flock were suddenly brought to a screeching halt. He lived in the parsonage, the home of "the person" and some of our brethren wholly unaware that the world has changed about them still call their place of residence "the parsonage.” Some of them do not even know what it means, and most of them are unconscious of the fact that the glory has departed.

I was born into “the old world” when science had not yet made possible the intellectual breakthrough and the preacher’s word was still an end to all controversy. But now the community at large no longer regards the preacher’s home as the orb around which all else revolves as satellites. So much did the reputation of the clergyman fall (call him what you will) in the eyes of the educated world that the surest way to empty an auditorium on a university campus was to announce that a minister would speak. There were exceptions but they were rare indeed. Men such as Billy Graham, with smooth-functioning machines, could drum up a crowd, but lesser lights who tried to duplicate his crusades had to organize furiously to import busloads of constituents from their own segments of the religious complex to make even a fair showing.

For one thing, the smart young thinkers of our day, steeped in history, knew about the original religious crusades, and the very word turned them off. It will always be a real question as to how much we have contributed to the energy shortage by “a crusade” conducted in a large central auditorium by a personable brother from Arkansas, or somewhere else. The last one I attended found the place just about surrounded with buses bearing the label “Church of Christ.” Pressure was put on to bring sinners to be converted by the sermon under the influence of crowd enthusiasm and mass psychology.

The last night I attended was a little like “old home” week at one of “our colleges,” with people standing up on the seats before the show got under way to wave at someone from down home, and wives hunching their husbands to keep them awake. The message was the good news about Hell and who would have the red carpet treatment of the devil. It was apparent that hell would be more crowded than the auditorium. Across the street was the jail noted for its homosexual rapes. A block away was the police station with its constant parade of prostitutes, addicts and pushers. The little island of light was surrounded by the pagan world, but no one seemed to know it. They came and listened and got in the buses and went home, thrilled that hell was not for them!

I am happy when anyone is baptized into that wonderful glorious relationship with my precious Lord, blessed be his name, whether it is in a portable baptistery erected on a huge stage, or in a creek in the cow pasture, such as the site of my own obedience, while simple country folk sang, “O happy day that fixed my choice on thee my Savior and my God,” as they looked through the shimmer of their tears. But I occasionally have vagrant thoughts about such things as crusades among people who are proud that they “call Bible things by Bible names, and do Bible things in Bible ways.”

Like the university students, I am probably prejudiced by my knowledge of history which indicates that “the crusaders” were whipped into a frenzy by some pretty scroungy characters like Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless. Fortunately, the brethren who promote our crusades are good men, earnest men, eager to capture the “holy land” from the agnostic Turks and the arrogant Muslims of our generation. But they do not go where these are. Our real problem is that we meet together to talk among ourselves about other people, but the other people do not know we are there, unless someone persuades them to come.

Recently I talked to an enthusiastic and well-meaning brother who wanted to organize a “Children’s Crusade.” Young people would do the singing, act as ushers, lead in prayers, and do the preaching. I did not tell him that the original “children’s crusade” set up in France, by Stephen, a shepherd-boy of Cloyes, ended in disaster with the kids sold into slavery. It never fails to impress me that in the days of yore, described in the scriptures, no one who met a sinner ever hauled him somewhere else to hear someone else tell him about Jesus. No one ever organized something first in order to tell the old, old story. I have known men who have been secretaries of “evangelism committees” for years, who have never once visited a neighbor to talk about Jesus. All they have ever done is to interview professional “Jesus talkers” to try and hire one to do the work God has called us all to do. It could be that bringing in someone from a distance will have more effect upon the community because he is not so well-known. In some cases it is a good thing he isn’t. Sometimes our brand of Christianity suffers as folk come to know us better. It does not wear well under the constant observation of skeptical pagans.

Telling people about Jesus is not a professional job. Grace has not been put into the hands of suave dispensers to be glibly dispensed. Because we have hoodwinked ourselves into thinking it is, our motto now is, “There he is. Lord, send him!” We have about come to the end of our string. Prices have been going up. The cost of preaching the good news is inflated. Getting a good preacher is as difficult as getting a good plumber. Those who have a record of “success” and who can demand a princely sum including fringe benefits— housing, car allowance, secretary, social security assessments paid, and three meetings per year to pick up enough extra to buy the children’s school clothes— can negotiate with the pulpit committee (whatever that is), and turn down the call. Many are called but few choose to come. It is evident from reading his letters that Paul was not a good organizer. No wonder he had to make tents.

Do not get me wrong. I am not blaming the preachers at all. Most of them are not paid too much. They must combine the talents of office administrator, community co-ordinator, hospital chaplain, director of organized activities, camp supervisor, liaison man, umpire, referee and trouble-shooter. I doubt you could ever adequately reimburse a man for exercising the courage, or poor judgment, to hire out to a congregation whose members have fought, gouged and hacked away at each other for three generations while singing “Peace, peace, wonderful peace, coming down from the Father above.” What is it worth for walking boldly into a den of brotherly lions bearing a signboard reading “Church of Christ— Romans 16:16”? What is the going rate for sticking your head into a meat grinder or jumping headlong into a community rock crusher?

What kind of salary can recompense one who clings to a job because of a commitment made around a campfire when he was fourteen years old, and who knows that his disillusioned wife is slowly coming unglued with her personality ripped to shreds and torn to tatters by trying to “keep up the image”? How can you pay a man for driving him to the brink of insanity because even his most intimate relationship with his wife is a matter of cold routine and duty because she realizes she married a man who is owned by others and these have first call upon him because they own the house, they put up the money, and they have first claim upon him? What can you pay a man to rear his children in a goldfish bowl or a shop window where everyone is watching for a flaw or looking for a lapse in a freckle-faced kid who knows that a family picnic is always contingent upon someone not going to the hospital with a ruptured appendix, falling off the tractor with a heart attack, or having a dish-throwing contest after three weeks of fighting and bickering “in the name of the Lord”? How do you make it up to a man whose son said, “My Dad was so busy saving the world he lost his own children”?

No, the preachers are not to blame! If they all quit tonight and went to work in service stations or teaching school, it would not cure the situation. It would come unraveled like a sweater on which someone pulled the wrong thread. You see, the congregations are not to blame either! Not even the “official board,” whatever it is, and the elders and deacons who invented it are to blame. What is to blame is The System. We did not create it. We inherited it. Probably no one created it. It is like Topsy in Uncle Tom’s Cabin who said she was not born, she just “grewed.” Like the machines of industry, so is the system. We no longer have it, now it has us. We’ve tried to make ourselves believe that it is of God, that He is the Father of a system instead of sons and daughters. We’ve tried to make ourselves believe that it is the body of Christ, and that he is the head of a system instead of living members. And we quote scriptures to clothe the system with respectability so that the shame of its nakedness will not appear.

Now the wheels are whirring at such a rate we cannot think. We are dizzy with meetings, many of which are meaningless. We have loaded calendars with all kinds of inane gatherings which keep our intellects down to the minimum and assure we will not think too deeply, nor reflect upon our direction. The merry-go-round of religion never stops, and the music is never silenced. It was Georges Bernanos, the French priest and philosopher, who wrote the most poignant stuff about what happens when you get caught in the machinery. Once he said:

I ask God’s forgiveness if the spectacle of the fool scratching himself affords me pleasure. The evil is not in the fool but in the mystery that encourages and exploits him, that encourages in order to exploit. The brain of the fool is not an empty brain, it is a congested brain wherein the ideas ferment instead of being assimilated, like undigested food in an infected colon. When one reflects on the means of coercion that the System has at its disposal and that grow more powerful each time, one realizes that the mind can keep its freedom only at the cost of an unremitting effort. And which of us can boast of keeping up our efforts to the end? Which of us can be sure, not only of resisting all the slogans, but of resisting the temptation to set one slogan against another? Moreover, the System indulges in any form of self-justification; there is no time; the catastrophes follow each other too quickly. It prefers to impress its victims with the idea of an inevitable necessity.

The System (call it what you will, even “Church of Christ”), which often destroys integrity and makes good men compromise, is not God’s doing and it should not be marvelous in our eyes. It is not the fellowship of the saints which was intended to satisfy deep human needs and provide the cooling water of life for parched souls. I know people who are caught in the gears and who dread to even attend a meeting of the saints on Sunday. They are boiling and seething inside when they are forced to listen to “the company lawyer” take the stand and rip them off, while being paid with the money they had wanted to use for a family vacation but dared not do so because they had to “lay by in store.” It is bad enough to have salt rubbed into a wounded spirit without being billed for the salt. When people dread to see Sunday come because they will be subjected to a soul-deadening and lacerating experience, may God have mercy. We missed out on restoring the early Christians and restored the early Pharisees.

It would be wonderful if we could face up to reality and admit that we have provided an image and developed a machine which is not patterned after God’s design at all. I doubt that most of us will ever be able to do so. Our brethren are entrenched in the idea that the “Church of Christ” as we have made it is the church of God as he wanted it. They have confused a nineteenth-century movement with first-century faith. If someone questions the validity of some of our cultural accretions and additions he is harassed and persecuted as an attacker of the Lord’s church. We treat prophets as they have always been treated.

History will reveal, however, that there was never a reform that was not sparked by a “heretic.” Bland conformists never work a reformation. W. H. Auden says their watchword is, “We would rather be ruined than changed.” We do not have the concept of ministry, fellowship or service which was revealed by the holy apostles. What we do have is a synthesis produced by sectarian pride and fear of human failure. The faith today is big business. Men sit up nights thinking up schemes and gimmicks with a religious slant to get the shekels from the purses of those who are a soft touch when Jesus is mentioned. They are not about to return to the simplicity and unadorned worship of God which was a part of the freshness of the morning of the new creation.

Then every congregation was a training center for every saint. There was no officer's training school for an elite group. The whole word was taught to the whole church, and leadership rose to the top from among the brethren as cream rises upon the milk. Every bite of the bread of life is for every child of God. Every drop of the milk of the word is for every member of the family. There are no soldiers in the army of God who do not need the shield of faith. Every person is expected to carry the sword of the Spirit. There is no concept of one man carrying the shield for the company or of wielding the sword for the rest. Each person is to be trained to the use of his fullest potential. That is God's will, and it is regrettable that it is not generally our goal.

Men must be "led in worship" because they can no longer praise God. Service is now something to be conducted and not something to be rendered. We now "hold services" rather than bestow them. And this must be done by someone trained in the art because the saints are no longer qualified to exhort one another, edify one another, or share insights and spiritual strength. Men who have been bishops or pastors for years, become frantic when a preacher gets a cold or goes to the hospital, and have to burn up the wires to try and borrow someone to come over and feed their flock on Sunday morning. They are unable to throw down fodder for the sheep without having someone come in who has studied homiletics, hermeneutics and pastoral psychology.

Once I wrote a paragraph in my book The Royal Priesthood which I want to repeat here with the hope that you will meditate upon it:

The religious world in general has lost the pattern of the corporate worship of the original community of baptized believers. The early church gathered around a table; the modern church sits before a pulpit. The Lord placed the table in the church so it could remember its debt to him; the clergy placed the pulpit in the church to bring it in debt to them. In the early church they all spoke one by one; today all the speaking is done by one. Then the spirit was kindled; now it is quenched. Then they claimed to love each other and talked about Jesus; now they claim to love Jesus and talk about each other. In those days all exerted an effort to exhort; now all must be exhorted to exert an effort.

I find myself disturbed by one attitude. Many brethren seem no longer concerned by what is scriptural. They have become pragmatists so their objection to mutual ministry, the sharing of all the gifts of the saints, is simply that it will not work in these days. There is always the demand to produce a congregation which is successful without a minister hired to minister to the saints, that is, to pastor the sheep. It would seem that our task should be to determine the will of God and make it work rather than to devise an alternative. We are not legislators but citizens under a Sovereign.

Regardless of what else may be said, we have lived to see a myth exploded. The idea that men will no longer assemble for simple sharing sessions has been blown to smithereens. I know three “house churches” composed of former elders, preachers, and men from every walk of business life. These assemble every first day of the week in homes of the saints where the coffee table becomes the Lord’s table. Here any saint can express his heartfelt views. No sectarian sign adorns the building, no one is paid for serving his brethren.

In spite of this I am staying where I am, because I believe that all effective reformation comes from within. I refuse to believe that God’s way will not work. Somehow and in some way, we will see again the informality and spontaneity of the early saints, and ritual and form will lose their significance. I shall probably be saying a lot more about it if I live, and if I do not, others more eloquent will arise and say it better than I can voice it!

Alice in Wonderland

Mission Messenger (April 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

Not long ago I asked a group of students if they had ever heard of Charles Lutwidge Dotson. None of them ever had. I then asked them if they had ever heard of Alice in Wonderland. All of them had. But none of them knew that Dotson was the author and that Lewis Carroll was a mere pseudonym. Really Dotson was a pretty important member of the faculty at Oxford University and was author of some rather outstanding mathematical treatises, not the least of which was Euclid and His Modern Rivals, published in 1879.

Few people know about that one, but almost everyone knows about the fantasy of Alice which was written fourteen years previously. Originally done for Alice Liddell, the little daughter of the dean of Christ Church, it caught on with adults as well as with children, and some of the characters such as the March Hare, the Mad Hatter, and the Cheshire Cat, have become a part of our proverbial language.

I am mentioning this because of the promotion of this clever blending of imagination and reality, irony and absurdity, in our day. I noticed in the book review sections of the Yuletide season a revival of interest in this 110-year-old story. There is a reason. Hard-nosed publishers do not generally sink their money if there is no market for their wares. But why should there be such a present concern for Alice in Wonderland?

The answer seems to be obvious. It is the same as the reason why “Amazing Grace” written by John Newton, who died on December 21, 1807, was picked up by the remnants of the “Beat Generation” and elevated to a place among the ten most popular songs. Newton became master of a slave ship, played around with drugs, and ended up a general wastrel. But the grace of God plucked him like a brand out of the burning, or as he put it, “saved a wretch like me.” And the young people who had felt condemned to a Zombie-like existence, damned by drugs, shunned by society, and doomed to a fate worse than death, found how amazing grace could really be. “I once was lost but now I’m found; was blind but now I see!” And they identified with John Newton, whose mother died before he was seven years old.

The same thing is true of Alice. Her world was suddenly changed. It was not that it was turned topsy-turvy and there was a question of how to get it right side up again. It was an unfamiliar world, an alien world, where remembered values had no real relevance. Was there any right side? Alice was altered psychologically, but there was a change of environment as well as physical size. Moreover, her companions seemed both real and unreal. And this brought up the big question. Since everything was changed, could it be possible that the change was in her, and the world was unchanged except in her eyes? And if the world was the same and she was different, was she really the person she had identified with previously, or was she someone else? If she was another, then who was she?

Carroll pin-pointed the predicament by having Alice muse in these words: “Dear dear! How queer everything is today! And yesterday things went on just as usual. I wonder if I’ve been changed in the night! Let me think, was I the same when I got up this morning? I almost think I can remember feeling a little different. But if I’m not the same, the next question is, ‘Who in the world am I?’ Ah, that’s the great puzzle.”

Not long ago the police picked up a sixteen-year-old boy walking in one of our parks at 2:00 o'clock in the morning, a very dangerous thing to do. There was no sign of intoxication, no indication of drugs. But the boy did not know who he was. He could not even give his name. About two years ago I was in a "rap session" with a group of high school kids who were seniors. As we sat in the comfortable library, surrounded by the embalmed lore of the ages, I asked, "If you were given an opportunity to learn one thing with absolute certainty, what would you most like to know?" A straight-A student who was a wizard in mathematics, spoke up and said, "Who I really am!" I asked why. He replied, "Because then life for me might take on some sense."

At another high school I passed out a list of ten questions and asked the students to check what they'd really like to have me discuss as we sat in a circle in the band practice room. The question for which most of them opted was "What's the real difference between me and my dog?" A sophomore girl came to me recently, crying and asking if she could talk to me. We sat down on the rug in the lounge and I asked, "What's the matter?" She recovered sufficiently to tell me, "Nothing makes sense. Nothing really matters. Nothing ever changes. It's all in a jumble and I'm all mixed up. Life is awful and I wish I didn't have to live."

I understand the search for identity. It explains a lot of things which have happened in the last few years. Movie and television script writers have tried to dramatize it. Playwrights have attempted to stage it before our eyes. Fiction writers have sought to capture it for us. Serious analysts have tried to define it. Unfortunately, a lot of parents "have eyes and see not, ears have they and hear not." So they have continued in their comfortable and snug cocoons, wrapped about with the skeins of materialism, which insulate them from agonizing reality. But their children often know what their elders refuse to know. So the gap grows wider and the chasm deeper.

A recent author of “a Christian study of contemporary writing,” has said that the idea behind Alice in Wonderland, the whole pattern of its development, is that life viewed with a certain cold, rational clarity, can appear to be a nonsense story. There is ample demonstration, I think, for the validity of her observation. It was H. G. Wells who wrote, “There was a time when my little soul shone and was uplifted at the starry enigma of the sky. That has gone absolutely. Now I can go out and look at the stars as I look at the pattern of the wallpaper on a railway station waiting room.” With all respect to this eminent historian, I wonder what he is doing at a railway station if he isn’t going somewhere. It is silly to sit there if there is no train.

Joseph Krutch, the brilliant artist and critic, said, “There is no reason to suppose that man’s own life has any more meaning than the life of the humblest insect that crawls from one annihilation to another.” And Pablo Picasso, who translated the ripped-off, fragmented, crazy cockeyed world into bizarre art forms said, “Today, as you know, I am famous and rich. But when I am alone with my soul, I haven’t the courage to consider myself as an artist.”

Alone with my soul! There is the secret, although expressed by an exponent of the distorted, the unsymmetric and the deformed. It is not the world in which I am that makes sense, but the world which is in me. I am not empty if my body is a temple of the Holy Spirit. I am not alienated if I am with him who said, “Henceforth I call you my friends.” I am not alone if I remember he said, “I will never leave you nor forsake you.”

The world may press in upon me but it is powerless to crush me. There is a victory which overcomes the world and it overcomes my doubts now. The world will not have the final word because the world will pass away with the lusts thereof. It is he who does the will of God who abides forever. I know who I am. I’m the child of a king. I’m a son of God. I’m a friend of Jesus. There’s no problem of personal identity with him who said, “I will not leave you orphans, I will come to you.” The world outside may be populated with people who are as wild as the March Hare, crazy as a Mad Hatter, and who grin as vacuously as a Cheshire Cat. But Jesus is real, real in my soul! It is his reality which makes me real. It’s not wonderland but wonderful grace that counts! Yes, Alice, there really is a Jesus.

What Happened?

[Abstract]

How did the heirs of a consecrated effort to unite the Christians in all of the sects, become so hostile to one another that they ended up as one of the most fragmented movements on the current American religious stage? What happened to those who started out to restore the one body, to cause them to add as many as a couple of dozen additional factions to the already frightful mess into which the followers of Jesus had been betrayed?

In the beginning it was not so. Thomas Campbell, the genial unfrocked Presbyterian preacher wrote, “The cause that we advocate is not our own peculiar cause, nor the cause of any party, considered as such; it is a common cause, the cause of Christ and our brethren of all denominations. All that we presume, then, is to do what we humbly conceive to be our duty, in connection with our brethren; to each of whom it equally belongs as to us, to exert himself for this blessed purpose.”

When Aylett Raines, a brilliant young preacher for a branch of Universalism, who was immersed, asked to be admitted to the Mahoning Association with which the Campbells were identified, the question arose as to whether one holding his philosophy could be received. Thomas Campbell arose and deprecated the introduction of such questions relating to opinion. He said, “Brother Raines has been with me during the last several months and we have fully unbosomed ourselves to each other. He is philosophically a Restorationist and I am a Calvinist, but notwithstanding this difference of opinion between us, I would put my right hand into the fire and have it burned off, before I would hold up my hands against him. And from all I know of Brother Raines, if I were Paul, I would have him in preference to any young man of my acquaintance, to be my Timothy.”

In a spirit of submission to one another, since all had submitted themselves to the Lord, those who had grown up under the teaching of Barton W. Stone, and those who had come under the tutelage of Alexander Campbell, met in Lexington, Kentucky, and with tears of joy received one another and embraced in the unity of the Spirit. Their differences were so great that a mere mention of them would fracture any of our fragile factions now, but these men were giants in understanding and in brotherly love.

It was when a third generation arose that lesser men began to shiver the trunk of the tree which had borne such noble fruit. Confronted with changes, many of which were more cultural than spiritual, they became frantic because of fear that all would be lost if unwritten creeds were not devised as bulwarks to protect the gains of the past. Boastful and arrogant men became the heroes of the divergent groups. It was then they developed the fallacious notion that purity of doctrine could only be maintained by division of the body, and agitation for disunity began under the guise that true unity could only come by conformity of all to the party standard and programs.

In 1906 formal division was recognized even by the United States Census Bureau, and men began to deal with issues by debate rather than by dialogue. The party spirit, a work of the flesh, was enflamed. Open hostility burned in the hearts and flashing eyes of men who warred with one another “in the name of the Lord.” Problems were approached with cold hearts and hot heads, rather than with warm hearts and cool heads.

The result is that we have made a travesty of a noble plea and a tragedy has marred our approach to the purpose, plan and prayer of Jesus for the unity of all believers. But we no longer live in an age of religious infighting, bitterness and sectarian emphasis. That stance is as outmoded as transportation by horse and buggy. It is time for us to re-think our approach, which grows less tenable with each passing year. We have divided ourselves out of influence with thinking people, and rendered our plea for unity a joke.

But we need not remain in the trap in which our fathers were ensnared. Our repetition of their error will not endear us unto God. To perpetuate their follies will not honor them, but disgrace us. Let us renounce once and forever that forlorn and tragic philosophy which has severed us from one another in the past and will only serve to splinter us further in the future. I propose that we return to our first schism and undo it. Unless we have the courage to do that we will always be a fragmented people, resting under the stigma of our own division while vainly pleading with others to unite.

It is silly to try and salvage our pride at the cost of losing our souls. Instead of trying to patch up a craft which is not seaworthy, let us abandon it and board the larger vessel which the Lord launched, and not man. Are our traditions more precious to us than God's other children? Shall we maintain our parties while we heedlessly set at nought our brethren? There will never be a more propitious time than now to rise above the narrow and circumscribed limitations of factionalism. Division is a dead carcass which needs to be interred without a wayward tear, and buried without remorse of conscience. It has served no purpose except to confuse and confound the saints and throw a blockade across the highway of holiness.

Division among brethren is a sin. It is carnal and immature. It is a work of the flesh. It murders the best sentiments in human hearts and turns men into spiritual cannibals, biting and devouring those whom they should serve in love. Turn your ears from the raucous cries of partisans who would make of you all that God has condemned and blight all that he has commanded. Let the light shine in! Let the darkness flee away! Let brotherhood come into its own and fellowship be the source of joy of which even angels sang.

Into the Action

Mission Messenger (April 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

I am a soldier. I enlisted to fight. I am engaged in a war in which there can be no truce or armistice, no cessation of hostilities to pick up the wounded and bury the dead. When I pledged allegiance to the King, and got measured for my suit of armor, I took the sword of the Spirit and made a commitment to swing the weapon until I fell lifeless in the thick of the fray and the swirling dust of the battlefield.

That is why I resent every retreat and deplore every inch of surrendered territory. I cannot live with myself unless I am planning a strategy by which to recapture every province overrun by the implacable foe. And no other such abandoned area rips me off like the field of higher education. By its very nature all education is the domain of the Sovereign under whose command I march. Its purpose should be to bring the universe intellectually, morally and physically to acknowledge his lordship. Men are to love him with all their minds. He is the creator of the cosmos, the ruler of heaven and earth. To see a domain which is his, captured by the enemy and using its resources to fight against his cause makes me burn within with a fierce determination to fight it out.

I want to penetrate the lines. I want to take the fight through them, behind and beyond them. I want to be a commando for Christ, never forgetting that while a commando fights as a part of the regular army he must fight apart from the regular army. Sometimes he must fight alone. The great university complexes of our generation represent the place where the action is. Here secular man is seen in all of his vaunted glory, in the power of technology, scientism, and the wisdom of this passing age. Here the classroom may become the training ground for enemy forces, the arsenal of enemy strength. And I have an obligation to capture this humanistic stronghold. "The weapons we use in our fight are not the world's weapons, with which to destroy strongholds. We destroy false arguments, we pull down every proud obstacle that is raised against the knowledge of God; we take every thought captive and make it obey Christ."

That's war talk! It is battle language! I love it! Destroying strongholds! Devastating false arguments! Pulling down obstacles! Capturing thought and making it do obeisance to my King! That's great. It's terrific! The clash of arms! The din of battle! What exhilaration! What thrill! I am not too high on campus ministry which has as its only object the protection of "our young people" by building a corral and riding herd on them.

Christian campus centers should be drill fields where young people are trained in the art and science of spiritual warfare, places for examination of the strategy of Satan, command posts where counter-strategy is developed and from which it is directed. They should be arsenals and ammunition dumps where one can come and secure a replenishment of fire power to get back into the lines again. All too often they are simply rest and recreation areas for those who have never smelled burning powder or seen the spiritual blood flow from gaping wounds.

There is nothing wrong with providing an off-campus facility where students can retire from the raw paganism of the teeming campus, where they can play ping-pong and indulge in the great American pastime of criticizing the “institutional church” which is generally as impervious to their criticism as to everything else outside of its Sunday-school rooms. It is not sinful to have a place where you can drink hot coffee or sip iced Cokes with other young Christians, but if that is all we do, a generation will pass away and the revival of Greek philosophy and pantheism will pass unchallenged and unchecked.

We have not been called to hold the fort, but to storm it. Our task is but half done when we make sure we go through four years of disciplined study and come out unscathed and unscarred. We are to guard the faith but also to share it. Every unsaved person on the campus, red or yellow, black or white, moral or immoral, brilliant or mediocre, must present a challenge. Fortified by prayer that God will open up a door to the heart we must move in upon him with love and rescue him from slavery, even while hating the garment that is spotted by the flesh.

Jesus is not simply Lord of the foolish or of those with whom I feel comfortable. He died for intellectuals as well as people like myself. And when I am in a philosophy class where the faith once delivered is under attack I must bombard heaven with my request for reinforcements, but at the same time I must zap the attacking professor with love. If I allow my feelings of resentment and hostility to be directed toward him for whom Jesus died, instead of his fallacious rationalization, I render myself useless. “Whom the gods would destroy they first make angry,” is a heathen adage which contains a kernel of truth. I propose to stalk relentlessly every teacher of error, shadowing him until I find the weakness of his reasoning and then moving in to capture his thinking for the Captain of my salvation.

I do not resent his paying me back in my own coin, probing and poking at my faith, seeking to discover the chinks in my armor and the weak spots in my defense. War is not always one-sided. We have not been furnished a long-range rifle, but a sword. And a sword is not for sniping, but for close infighting, face-to-face combat where you can hear the steel ring and see the sparks fly. The shield of faith will extinguish all the fiery darts of the wicked. The helmet of salvation will never be dented by human philosophy.

The ground I occupy is safe. I have fled for refuge to the Rock of ages. He is my strong tower and my defense. My position is unconquerable although frequently assailed. I represent no sect, party, or religious movement. I offer no defense for any group, segment or faction. My only creed is a person. That he is the Son of God embraces my position. I am simply a member of the fellowship of the unashamed. "I am not ashamed of the good news about Jesus, it is God's dynamic to save everyone who believes it, whether he is a Jew or a Greek." For this I live, and if I know my heart, for this I would be willing to die. This is the ground upon which I shall join battle with my opposers. This is the ground upon which they must face me. Jesus died for my sins. Jesus was buried in the grave. Jesus arose again the third day. Jesus is now seated at the right hand of God. Upon these facts I risk my soul and rest my hope. To a trust in these I seek to win every soul.

For my faith in these facts I am a militant. I crave to do battle for trust in these things. The prime question of the universe is, "What think you of Christ? Whose Son is he?" All other questions are secondary to this. One can be right about all of them, but if he is wrong about this he is lost. If he is right about this, he may be wrong about many other things and still be saved. Let others argue, fuss and fume about little questions which they have puffed up into false importance. My concern is Jesus, Son of God and King of kings. I am not concerned that men bow to my feeble wisdom. I am only concerned that they kneel in acknowledgment of his sovereignty.

The real enemy is out there and I refuse to fight with other soldiers in the tents of the saved! Let others who have time argue and debate with one another about this or that strategy, but I crave to make contact with the forces of sheer unbelief. The wisdom of this passing age can never overthrow that wisdom which is from above. But they were made to clash head-on and my task is to bring the truth as it has been revealed into direct conflict. I must conquer or be conquered, capture or be captured. My orders were not given by men but by the King. While others advise to take it easy, his words are to take it to them! I can never be happy unless I do! I've got a quarrel with Satan!

Pastoral Flypaper

Mission Messenger (May 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

We often believe we are constant under misfortunes when we are only dejected; and we suffer them without daring to look on them, like cowards who allow themselves to be killed through fear of defending themselves— La Rochefoucauld in Maxims (1665).

A lot of good folk like to point to great scientific advancements to show the tremendous changes which have occurred during the brief span of their lifetime. Undoubtedly they can point in many directions. But while plunking astronauts down on the moon in a space bubble is a good illustration I doubt it is necessary to become all that scientific. There are a lot of simple things which also demonstrate how we have altered. As a kind of everyday down-to-earth example, take our attitude toward flies.

One little puny insignificant housefly can now throw a dinner party into a tizzy. Not long ago I was the guest of a fairly calm brother who was married to one of the most nervous females I have ever seen. She fluttered around the table while preparing lunch like a sparrow in a chicken house. When we sat down to eat, a lone fly made his appearance and buzzed the scene. You never saw such beating the air. Every time the determined and persistent insect got anywhere near her end of the table, the wife took a swipe at him, missing him as far as the last batter on a girl's softball team. Finally, the husband, who was far more upset by his wife's actions than by the zooming around of the fly volunteered to bat the offender into the wild blue yonder. He politely excused himself to me, arose and got the advertising section of the Sunday paper, rolled it up into an effective weapon, and returned to the scene of action. When the fly headed in his general direction, coming in low to make a three-point landing on the fruit salad, the genial host took a cut at him and hit the dish of apple butter. He scattered pulverized Jonathans all over the wall-to-wall carpet. Mighty Casey had struck out!

It wasn't that way when I was a lad. In those days flies were expected. They were as much a part of the dinner scene as cooked turnips. Most people could not afford screen doors, and those who did have them found them little protection. Almost every screen door had a hole in it big enough to throw a cat through. This was a convenience because there was always a bedraggled feline with which to practice such shots. That was the day when grown folks ate first and got the pick of things while the kids were expected to run and play until summoned to sort through the remains and gnaw on the necks and backs remaining on the chicken plate. Also the gravy was as cold as a miser's heart.

Always, however, there was one youngster who did not get to play. His job was to mind the flies. Armed with a peach tree branch with the leaves still on it, he stood behind the guests, gently waving the limb back and forth, keeping the swarm of hungry insects at bay, and only occasionally being lucky enough to knock one into the dish of black-eyed peas. No one got butterflies in his stomach because flies fluttered around the place.

Some of you will remember Tanglefoot, the flypaper with the sticky substance on one side. If you laid a sheet of it on the kitchen table and sprinkled a little granulated sugar around on it, it became a death trap for unwary insects. I shall never forget the time I was setting the table and placed the sticky sheet temporarily on a chair. I was in a hurry to get back outside and play “shinny” with a battered Pet Milk can and I forgot and left the Tanglefoot on the chair. It was the day the “Watkins Man” stayed for lunch and he drew that chair. Mom scraped it off the seat of his pants the best she could, flies and all, but I later heard that when he got up from his wagon seat, the seat decided to get up with him.

There wasn’t much to do when rain poured out of leaden skies, with only the ducks getting a kick out of it while the chickens huddled under the back porch. We would play “Fox-and-Geese” on a homemade board, using grains of corn and beans for counters. Sometimes we would play checkers, and the checkers had been cut from a broomstick with half of them colored with black shoe polish.

When things like that palled you could always lean on the table and watch flies get caught on the flypaper. When one gingerly approached it in happy anticipation of the sugar, and got one foot caught in the glue he was “in a heap of trouble.” He took his other front leg and tried to extricate the first by rubbing it. But he was like Brer Rabbit cuffing the tar baby. Soon he was stuck with all four feet. For awhile he feebly struggled but finally gave up the battle and grimly settled down to face the inevitable. It was not long in coming. A few more twitches and then the final quiver found him hopelessly entangled.

I think this is what has happened to a lot of us human flies with the reference to the clergy system in the restoration movement. We are all stuck up and bogged down in the semantic tanglefoot. We started out nobly to restore the ancient order to the church. Like plumed knights we rode forth to try our lances against every system which had been devised by man and which prevented the recapture of that marvelous simplicity which was in Christ Jesus. But we were lured by the sugar and the syrupy sweetness of the sectarian system and we have given up the struggle. We are discouraged with ever achieving our goal and now some of us doubt that it ever had any real value to start with.

Justification for the conclusion that a good many brethren couldn't care less about real restoration— a conclusion which I have been reluctant to reach— stems from several factors which are quite general. Our brethren seldom say anything about the clergy system, and never about the form of it we have adopted. It is not unfair, I think, to say that many of them resent anyone even questioning it, much less examining its claim to scripturality. I receive more bitter letters about my writing on this theme than any other. Some of them accuse me of opposing proclamation of the gospel. Others express deep grievance that I am arrayed against preachers. Our tradition has blinded us. We cannot distinguish between opposition to a borrowed system which has its stranglehold on the whole Christian world, and proclaiming the message of hope and heaven to a world of frightened mankind steeped in sin.

In some places, particularly in seminaries which are sometimes dedicated to development of a professional clergy caste, my writings are dismissed with a flirt of the hand and with the casual offhand remark, "That's Carl's hangup and hobby, and you just have to overlook it and forget both it and him. At his age he can't last too much longer and we can outlast him if we are careful and he doesn't give us high blood pressure or apoplexy."

Our restoration fathers had much more to say about what they called "the one-man hired pastor system" than they ever did about any other problem which confronted them. They had a fairly clear-cut idea of what the revelation of God taught on what we now label "church polity." They respected that facet of revelation as much as they did any other. So do I. Our washed-out attitude toward certain portions of God's word stems from the fact that a lot of us read it to validate what we already have and not to find out what God wants us to do. We have “restored” the apostolic church, and there’s really nothing left to do except to go along for the ride and not to think too much.

I am quite convinced that the system we now practice and defend has no scriptural basis. This is a grave charge and I make it with reverence for God and respect for the hearts of all my brethren. I think we are not only denying by our actions the priesthood of all believers and the ministry of all the saints, but I also think we have no burning desire or intention to implement them. We have given up the fight and are mired down in the sticky “goo.”

The pastors in the primitive communities of the saints were not the proclaimers of the word, the preachers or evangelists. They were the bishops or overseers. They were not imported or invited in by a pulpit committee. There were no pulpits in primitive congregations. The pastors were selected from the flock and given their responsibility when they met the qualifications and requirements as specified by the apostle and not until then.

There is no such thing hinted at as hiring a man from the outside to come in and pastor or shepherd a flock for a fee. Neither is there a suggestion that men were appointed as bishops in order to encourage them to try and qualify or to become more faithful. To ordain men to this sacred office merely to fill a form, meet the requirements of the by-laws, or encourage them to be more diligent is a burlesque upon God’s holy arrangement. And to allow oneself to be ordained as an elder or bishop when not qualified is to be thrust into a position where you must give an account before God.

The word pastors in Ephesians 4:11 is from poimen, a herdsman, shepherd or flock-tender. It is distinguished from evangelists in this very passage. An evangelist was, as the word clearly indicates, a bringer of good news. He was a herald or announcer. He told the world about what God had done for mankind at the cross. The pastors were the feeders and guides of the gathered flock. In the Authorized Version the word poimen is rendered shepherd 17 times. It is the word for the shepherds who came to the stable in Bethlehem after hearing the angelic chorus. It is also the word for the functioning of Jesus and was used by him five times in John 10.

The term poimaino is rendered by “feed” 6 times and is translated “feed cattle” once. In Acts 20:17, we are told that when the sailing vessel upon which Paul had booked passage anchored in the harbor at Miletus “he sent to Ephesus and called unto him the elders of the church.” He recalled to their memory that when he was among them he had taught them publicly and from house to house. He told them he would not see them again. But it is obvious he had trained them until all he needed to do was to commend them unto God and to the word of His grace.

So he charged them to “take heed unto yourselves and to the flock over which the Holy Spirit has made you overseers, to feed the church of God which he hath purchased with the blood of his own (Son).” Overseers is the same word elsewhere rendered “bishop.” The elders are the bishops of a community of the saints. Thus, when the apostle wrote to the congregation in Philippi, he addressed his letter “To all the saints in Christ Jesus who are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons” (1:1).

But the word feed is a form of the word rendered pastor in Ephesians 4:11. It means to tend to the flock, to do the work of a shepherd. So the words for elder, bishop and pastor are all applied to the same men. Elder signifies they must be men of age and experience; overseer signifies that they must supervise and guide; pastor that they must lead and feed the flock. The first has to do with age, the second with authority, and the third with activity.

I do not want to be obnoxious to my brethren, and I have no desire to “bug” them, but one thing is ever apparent, and that is the fact that the one “most important” functionary among us is never addressed or mentioned in the apostolic epistles. One can hardly imagine addressing the saints in various places and not doing so through the preacher. It is not an exaggeration to say that in the Churches of Christ (non-instrument) there is no way to write a letter to the saints at all. The preacher reads it first and if it does not pass his censorship the saints never know that it was written. Some of the letters by Paul wouldn’t have gotten past the front office.

What has happened to us, of course, is that we have adopted a new office and created a new officer to fill it. Since we have done so it has to be scriptural, not because it is in the scriptures but because we have it, and it is a part of our “restoration pattern.” We did not create this office at all. We borrowed it. It is simply the sectarian pastor system and we like it because it works. We have no real concept of how to make the ideal of God work in our day because the brethren who constitute the churches were not converted to the task of really serving. They have come in to be served.

It would not do to call the new officer whom we have installed “the pastor” because we know “church polity” too well to do that. (It may be mentioned in passing that some of the congregations, especially in Christian Churches, do use the word “pastor” and it appears as the title on the stationery exactly as it would in the Lutheran Churches, for example.) Generally, we cover up the system by applying another title. Our pastors are evangelists, ministers, preachers, varying in different places according to the term which will provide the best cover-up.

In 1 Peter 5:2, 3, the apostle instructs “the elders among you” to pastor or tend the flock of God and to take the oversight thereof, that is, function as bishops. The work of the pastor is the work of the bishop, and it is the function of elders. The qualifications for bishops are the qualifications for pastors, and there was a plurality of these in every congregation. Before they could serve they had to demonstrate their ability to care for the church of God by ruling and regulating and governing their own family circles.

“He must manage his own household well, keeping the children submissive and respectful in every way; for if a man does not know how to manage his own household, how can he care for God’s church?” (1 Timothy 3:4, 5). Contrast this with the modern practice of teaching beardless youths “pastoral psychology” and graduating them to start out with diploma in hand looking for a church on which to practice the art. We have come a long way, but in the wrong direction.

God’s word would not permit a man to serve even as one of several pastors until he met stringent qualifications. But “the System” creates pastors with machine-like precision and on a production line basis, who single-handedly attempt the task with hardly any of the qualifications but with a portfolio of sermon outlines, some of which have no more relationship to life than if they had been sent down from Mars. A well-modulated speaking voice which can rise and fall in proper cadence is hardly a compensation for the vacuity of some of the messages that are delivered, and which send the people away as empty and devoid of spiritual strength as they were when they turned into the parking lot.

No longer are pastors chosen from among the local saints, upon the basis of the qualifications for bishops. Now they are called in to exhibit their wares. The word sermon isn’t even in the Bible and for a very good reason. Preaching to the church, as Alexander Campbell pointed out, was not once mentioned in the sacred scriptures. Nothing that men have devised is more absurd than a “trial sermon” presented as a credential in rivalry for a job. The very idea places the task of proclaiming the good news on a crass commercial basis. It denigrates the gospel, depresses the preacher and secularizes the saints. Imagine one who loves the Lord being forced to compete for the favor of people who want to “size him up” before negotiating with him to see if they can raise enough money to employ him to come and throw down fodder for starving sheep.

Ponder the selection of such a one for such a spiritual task by the cut of his clothing, the length of his hair, or the shine on his shoes. Do not forget that a candidate may be turned down because of the color of his necktie or because he twitches his eyebrows as nervously as Sam Ervin. Regardless of what else enters into it, candor and truth force us to admit that one’s spiritual knowledge may not mean nearly so much as his pulpit mannerisms or his effect upon the congregational image. Ah, that image! How we worship it! A great man of God may stand but little chance if the saints are looking for a “good mixer.” If the brethren belong to “the personality cult” a plain man filled with the Spirit but who cannot play softball, had just as well go bark up a persimmon tree as to “try out” for the “opening.”

What can we do about this sad, and even disgraceful state of affairs where strings are often pulled and politics are frequently played? Most places do not realize that they are not selecting a man at all, but he was selected for them from afar. He was picked out of a group of prospects and sometimes the fact that his father is a generous contributor has much to do with the selection. None of us like to think that these things are true, but all of us know they are, and they are true in every segment of the restoration movement.

So, what can be done? In most places nothing will be done! Nothing can be done if “the System” which we think of as “the Lord’s church” has made cowards of us and we tremble for our jobs. I do not hold to the idea that because you cannot do everything you ought to do nothing. But whatever is done in most places will have to be done slowly. We will need to proceed cautiously unless we propose to kill the patient while pretending to cure him. All of us, including myself, are victims of a condition which has crept up and put its tentacles around us and we will disengage ourselves only with patience, if at all. A lot of good folk think we will never do it, so they are resigned and are obeying the first and greatest commandment "Thou shalt not rock the boat."

Running from responsibility, or quitting cold-turkey, will not get the job done. Anyone can resign where he is and chase around over the landscape looking for a church more to "his liking" but that only transfers the problem. The chances are he is the problem. The System has weakened congregations until they are helpless to stand alone without receiving artificial respiration on a weekly basis. But the fact that some of them have survived the sermons they have heard indicates a greater strength than one might imagine. A constant diet of noodle soup is not calculated to develop soldiers who can go out and tackle principalities, powers, and spiritual wickedness in high places, or low ones either. It takes more than pap or pabulum to produce fighters for truth.

The way in which we have enlisted the saints has started them out as incubator babies. They have been on milk so long they cannot immediately be force fed with meat, or they will choke to death. Let us candidly admit that we have gotten people into the water without really getting them into Christ. They came out of the baptistery all wet and some of them have been that way ever since. We have brought babies to birth who never intended to grow. We have enlisted soldiers who never intended to fight. We have enrolled runners who never intended to race. They want to sit in the grandstand and watch fencing exhibitions. They prefer to lean on the sword rather than to wield it.

I think we can keep them coming, if we can keep enough "new ideas" dreamed up, or borrow enough gimmicks from our good sectarian neighbors and "apply them" to the "true church.” But the question is if this will get them to heaven or simply delude them into thinking they are safe until it is too late. Can one live a life of peaceful co-existence with the devil and receive the unfading crown at the end of the journey? Can one be called a soldier who never picked up a weapon and wouldn’t know which end to swing it by? Can one be called a soldier of the Lamb who cannot find 1 Corinthians without flipping the pages after having enlisted twenty years ago and never missed “Sunday school”? In short, are we simply fooling ourselves and hoodwinking both the brethren and the public about what the faith is all about? You think I’m all worked up about this, don’t you? And you could be right about that!

No one will ever develop into a soldier by listening to repeated lectures on how to enlist. A capable fighting force does not result from recurrent oratorical flights on “The Steps to Salvation.” You can assemble a bunch of raw recruits together and have a community sing once per week and top it off with a nice talk, and ten years from now they will be no more capable of warfare than when they enlisted. A Jehovah’s Witness can make them dive for a foxhole like a scared rabbit.

Our problem is we have been preached to death instead of taught how to live. The sermons change only in the titles assigned to them. The church has become a place to entertain the troops, not to train them. We have to pamper them to keep them coming. We actually spend more in building comfortable barracks than in fighting the foe. Brethren have been in the ranks for years who cannot find Galatians in the manual of arms. They become “duck soup” for the enemy. The devil is really not afraid of them. They could not hit him with a spiritual cream puff.

A boy who is ambitious to become an electronics engineer grows up in a congregation where the brethren have an obsession about the sin of supporting “Herald of Truth.” The congregation is given a steady diet of anti-institutionalism. When the young man gets to the university campus he is in a world that never heard of Herald of Truth and might not have heard of the “loyal Church of Christ.” He has a head full of arguments and a heart empty of real faith, the rugged faith which will not be eroded away by the materialism, humanism and scientism to which he is exposed. He will probably be washed down the stream in the first flood. His arguments do not fit the problems he faces.

In view of all this, may I make a few suggestions of a practical nature? If you cannot agree with them, or if you think I am mistaken about the whole mess, I’ll love you anyhow! It isn’t necessary for you to share my concerns for me to reverence and respect you as my brother or sister. If you think I am off the beam and will miss the runway, praise the Lord anyhow!

(1) If you are employed by a congregation to minister to them and you have the pastoral concept, change your thinking. Put your mind in reverse and back out. If your name is on the “official letterhead” or the “official signboard” with the title “pastor” following it, remove the title. Point out to the brethren who hired you that you are not their pastor. Tell the congregation that the elders are the pastors. It will surprise them both!

(2) If possible, change the emphasis from delivering “sermons” to teaching the word. Preaching the gospel is for the world. Its design is to call men out, to enroll them in the school of Christ. The apostolic doctrine is for the saints. They do not continue in hearing the gospel. They respond to it and continue steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine, although, if necessary, they may be reminded of the gospel which was proclaimed unto them. Preaching is proclamation of news, teaching is instruction in a course of discipline. Preaching the gospel summons men from death unto life. Expounding the doctrine shows them how to live that life.

It is a little bit absurd for men to lay aside the Bible as soon as they finish the Sunday-school class. Insist they bring their Bibles with them into the auditorium. Notice, I did not say “the sanctuary.” It would be well to forget the “sermonic” approach, for which there is no scriptural basis, and select an epistle for a series of thirteen lessons. Let us assume that you select the letter of James. You could not choose a better one. Read a paragraph while the whole audience looks on with open Bible. Draw out the message from the paragraph. Explain the words employed and make application of them to life. Suggest that the brethren underline certain key words. Tell them to write down notes on an envelope pulled from purse or pocket. Get them involved in the lesson.

On Sunday night arrange the meeting so the saints can share their views on the lesson and question your thinking as given in the morning. Let it be a “talk back” session. To kick it off, if they are frightened at the sound of their own voices in a “holy place,” ask leading questions. “What did the Spirit say to you in this lesson from James? What idea or thought did you get that could make any change in your life? What promises did you find which might give you hope? What warning was there which will teach you caution? Did I say anything with which you disagree?” Encourage the brethren to express any point of disagreement. Do not argue about it publicly. They did not jump up and start an argument with you in the morning. If you continue this for three months you will have a community of saints which will know more about James than ever before. You will also have some feedback from those who object to your disturbance of their sleep and rest period.

(3) Elton Trueblood is eminently correct, as he is about many things, when he points out that the preacher should be a coach. But you can never develop a football team by assembling the players once a week to sit on benches in the clubhouse and listen to a lecture on the history of football, and the art and science of playing the game. Nor can you train them by giving them a notebook full of arguments to use to show the superiority of football over baseball. You must get the ball into their hands. You must put them on the field. Certainly the coach can devise a strategy for meeting the opposition but it is the players who must carry it out. In the service of God the coach must stay off the field and on the sideline. It is the elders who should call the signals. They are the backfield men. A good coach trains the whole squad until it can function as a unit.

I confess I am not too hot on “eldership training sessions” where cram courses are provided for a small select and elite group. Of course I could be as wrong about that as I am about a lot of other things, but it seems to me we are making some errors which will eventually destroy us. We select some young man who is ambitious and articulate, perhaps a little too much, and send him away to train for four years “to take over a church.” He is taught homiletics, hermeneutics, pastoral psychology, public speaking, and a good deal of Bible and restoration history. If it is in a “Church of Christ” school he is given a good stiff dose of “pattern theology” and it all depends on which school he attends as to which “pattern” he will study.

All of this may be good, but what about the church he is to take over? It is composed of successful farmers, school administrators, attorneys, postal clerks, assembly-line workers, housewives, and others who are given the impression that when it comes to exercise of the faith they are “laymen,” that is unskilled, inept, bumbling, and without religious know-how. Their task on earth is to contribute part of their daily earnings to support a professional who is trained in the art of managing the religious enterprise, and maintaining “worship.” In the Catholic Church the professional is called a priest. In the Anglican community he is a canon or rector. In the Lutheran Church he is a pastor. In the Protestant world he is a clergyman. In the Church of Christ he is the minister. Much as it galls a lot of us who have “restored the Lord’s church” to have someone say it, the minister among us sustains the same functional relationship as do all of the others. As Lesslie Newbigin pointed out in his speech to the World Convention of Churches in New Delhi, the clergyman wants to be the prima donna, to hold the center of the stage and shine as the director of praise and worship.

Since “preaching the gospel” has become professionalized and the religious structure which supports it has become institutionalized we are constantly aware that the whole complex is made up of two kinds of seekers. Preachers are seeking churches, and churches are seeking preachers. A lot of those who are not in the market wish they were. A great many congregations endure the preacher they have. They regard him as a part of the cross they must bear because they cannot pay more. And a lot of preachers tolerate the congregation which pays their salary. They regard it as a kind of divine punishment for their youthful indiscretions and their lack of interest while “preparing for the ministry.” Secretly, a lot of them are wishing “the Lord would call them” to another field, and if their wives are pregnant they wish the Lord would get on the ball and do something before they have another mouth to feed.

When you put a young man with high hopes in a congregation with a cloud cover and low visibility, where the brethren have spiritual astigmatism and are blind and cannot see afar off, you have a sad condition. Many a young man has set forth gallantly, clutching his Bible in one hand and his diploma in the other, with the words of the commencement address ringing in his ears, and his attractive young bride carrying the suitcases, ready to restore the faith and reform the world. He soon learns that he is not going to change things a great deal. If he is an “associate minister” he is not going to change them at all. Subtly, and not so subtly, the message gets through to him that the congregation is satisfied as they are. The sign on the door reads “Sleeping! Do Not Disturb!”

Most young brethren make a noble effort. They remember the glowing reports of “a successful ministry” made by the chapel speakers in school. No chapel speaker ever gets up and confesses that he is a flat flop and a failure and he would be better off selling insurance or running a service station. The young man is saturated with the thought that “it will work if you work it!” But that is before he accepts his “first church.” He then learns that the brethren who are good folk, don’t want to change and they don’t want to be changed. They are like the Book says, “rich and increased with goods and have need of nothing.”

Since nothing is what they have need of, that is what they get! The preacher, like the fly, realizes he has become caught in the religious Tanglefoot. He soon ceases to kick against the pricks. The struggle ceases. He resolves that he will visit the sick, comfort the aged and frightened, talk to high school kids who are rebelling, and maybe he can get to heaven when he dies, even if his salary is not raised while he lives. I feel sorry for men whose dreams are shattered by people whom they love. I feel even more sorry for the wives who love these men whose dreams are shattered. Soul hurt is the worst kind!

What is the solution? It is the same as the solution to any problem involving human beings in a structure which denigrates the individual and destroys personal initiative. It makes no difference whether that structure is an inner city ghetto, a piney-woods turpentine colony, or a church. There is only one solution and it can be expressed in one word. Education! You can go into the inner city with all kinds of brilliant theories and you can put up a soapbox on every corner and lecture until you are blue in the face and white around the gills, but you are not going to change anything. Substitute a pulpit stand for the soapbox and the result will be the same. The most inefficient method of teaching on earth, whether in a big university, or in a “big church,” is by the lecture method. It was John Ruskin who wrote in Stones of Venice that education is “a painful, continual and difficult work to be done by kindness, by watching, by warning, by precept, by praise, but above all— by example.”

There are only three ways to train people! This is true whether you are developing workers in a shop or workers in a congregation. It is true whether you are training soldiers for the country or soldiers of the cross. Tell them how! Show them how! Let them do it! The best trainer, like the best parent, is the one who works himself out of a job. If your children are as helpless at the age of twenty as they were when born, you have failed as a parent. If you stay with a congregation twenty years and they cannot feed themselves at the end of that time you have slipped somewhere along the line.

I do not want you to get a wrong idea. When I talk about “working yourself out of a job,” I do not mean there will be nothing for you to do. Regardless of how active and efficient you are, there will still be sinners on earth who need to be reached when you die. But there will be fewer of them if you train every saint to be a soul-winner for Jesus. I think a lot of brethren would like to be but they think of themselves as second-class citizens in the kingdom of heaven. They have never gone to a Christian college. They have not had a course in “Techniques of Soul-Winning” or “How to Capture Sinners in Six Easy Lessons.” They are not invited to “preacher’s breakfasts.” They do not think of themselves as priests. They do not regard themselves as ministers. They blush when someone mistakes them for “the minister” and hasten to disclaim they are in that category. But they must be led to see themselves as both ministers and priests.

It is time for a revolution, a radical revolution in the church. The unfortunate thing is that the word revolution makes shivers run up our spines. And the word “radical” makes us have goose-bumps and causes a cold sweat to break out all over us. That is because we have a mistaken idea of the real meaning of both terms. We have allowed them to be ripped off by vandals and used to destroy. But the faith was the most revolutionary idea in the world. There has never been another revolution like Christianity, toppling the Caesars from their thrones, capturing strongholds and bringing thoughts into subjection.

We also misunderstand the word radical. It conjures up images of people with bushy beards, straggling hair and burning eyes carrying bombs or setting fires in the men's restroom of the Pentagon. But radical is from the word for root. A radish is a root vegetable. And we need to get to the root of our problem and quit snipping away at twigs. The greatest issue facing us today is the institutionalizing of the called-out ones, the creation of a human organization to replace the divine organism. It is in unsanctifying and de-personalizing brethren by making them "members of the church" instead of "members of the body."

Don't argue that these are the same thing. The called-out ones constitute the body, the church, as God looks at things. But there is a vast difference between the church as we have contrived and manipulated it and the body of God's dear Son. In some areas the difference is the same as that between a plastic dummy in a store window and a living person walking along the street. Regardless of how natural you think the first looks, it is dead, because it has no spirit in it.

It is the same difference as you will find between a Christmas tree and a fruit tree. You can decorate the first and hang all kinds of ornaments on it. You can make it glitter and glow. But it is dead, and because it is not living, it cannot sustain life. We must change our thinking if we are to survive the shock of a world which looks behind our mask. And that change must come from recapture of the primitive order of things, in which all of God's people were priests and all knew it.

We differ in talents. We do not all have the same ability. But we do sustain the same relationship to God through Christ and the Holy Spirit. The purpose of the fellowship of the saints is to give everyone the opportunity to develop to his fullest potential, to encourage and strengthen him for growth in grace as well as in knowledge of the truth.

As Kokichi Kurosaki wrote in One Body in Christ, “Our problem lies in the fact that we have come to doubt that the spiritual relationship God has given us to Himself and one another is sufficient as the basis for true fellowship. This doubt exists only because such free and simple fellowship has been so long hindered and hidden by the bonds of institutionalism.”

The Art of Nitpicking

Mission Messenger (May 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

I had never really thought of Anderson, Indiana as being a “lousy” city. I’ve preached there a great many times in days of yore and enjoyed the association with brethren whom I found it easy to love. That’s why I was surprised when I read in Time that the entire school system had to be closed down for three days to combat a city wide epidemic of infestation by Pediculus capitis, which, in case you did not know it, is the head louse.

When I was a little kid in school they didn’t shut up shop because of lice. If they had the schools would have stayed closed like they do now for a teacher strike. The teacher would send a note home, and if you had parents who could read, they would get you in by the big kitchen table which was covered with the red-checked oilcloth and go after the lice and nits with a fine tooth comb. Nits are the eggs, laid on hair follicles, and when the comb had scraped your scalp raw and dredged up a supply of them they were held over the lamp chimney where they would snap, crackle and pop like modern breakfast cereal.

I get a kick out of the story about the teacher who sent a note home by a tousle-headed little roughneck, “Will you please have Johnny examined for adenoids?” The next day Johnny brought a pencilled note from his indignant mother to the teacher, “I wish you’d pay attention to your own business. I’ve combed Johnny’s head three times with a fine tooth comb, and nary an adenoid did I find.”

I thought lice had gone out of style, if they ever were in it, like an asafoetida bag tied around your neck to ward off cold. It worked because no one could stand getting close enough to you that a germ could jump on you. But if lice are about a thing of the past, and they certainly must be rare to be reported in Time, the word derived from searching for their eggs is still with us. Everyone has heard of nitpickers.

In the religious realm I have been around some of them almost my whole life. They are good people but they major in minors, throw tantrums about trifles and fragment the saints over fly-specks. They get nits mixed up with the gospel and go out to proclaim the latter while they are actually conducting a neighborhood research in the former. While the world around is grappling with prodigious problems we tend to become unstrung and pursue gnats with a gun loaded for elephants. We are inclined to think that heaven is all agog about our issues with the angels suspending world operations to line up on the ramparts of glory and watch with fear and trembling for the outcome of one of our arguments in Texas. It could be that they do not glance at one of our little tempests in a Texas teapot. They are accustomed to them!

Jonathan Swift, who was one of the sharpest satirists ever to point his pen at the foibles of the foolish, writes in Gulliver's Travels about a country which was rent asunder by a terrific debate over the question of whether an egg should be broken at the big or little end. The “Big Enders” belabored the “Little Enders” and vice versa, until parties were formed that bred hate and hostility which endured long after most of the people forgot how the fracas started. We have Eggheads like that with us until this day.

Nitpicking will destroy a home or a congregation. I had an aunt who never saw anything good in her family and never missed seeing anything bad. She was a first-class, Grade-A nagger, and she never let up. She not only made mountains out of molehills, but she made mammoths out of the moles. My uncle took to drink and the kids took out for the city. Even my uncle's death did not cure her. She nagged at him posthumously and in absentia for leaving her alone. She thought he had died on purpose. I think she really missed him, but he would not have returned from wherever he was if they had given him a furlough.

In her later years she decided she wanted to arrange in advance for a funeral plan and pay for it while she was still here. She went to the mortician and he showed her twenty different caskets. She found something wrong with everyone of them and said she would not be caught dead in them. The one she liked most did not have the right kind of handles on it. I volunteered the opinion that this was of greater concern to the pallbearers than to the occupant, seeing they had to bear the burden of the day. But she did not buy my statement. She did not buy the casket either. When I was young I used to wonder if naggers lived longer than other people. I have reached the conclusion that they do not, although I have no statistics. It just seems longer.

I remember an old brother in North Missouri who objected to everything the brethren wanted to do. He thwarted every plan to advance the cause. Finally they got fed up, wrote out charges, and notified him they were going to withdraw from him on a certain night. He showed up for the event in his Sunday suit, big as life and twice as natural. He listened to all of the accusations with pride, and heard the grounds for the proposed action. But when one of the elders cited a scripture to justify their course, the accused arose to his feet and said, "I object! You've got the wrong scripture. I don't blame you for putting me out, but I want it to be scriptural. Now here's the scripture you should have used on me." He then proceeded to give them book, chapter and verse, as our radio preachers always say.

Nitpickers always pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin. They give the Lord one stalk of spearmint out of every ten. But they do not have enough time left to attend to such weighty matters as justice, mercy and faith. These are not nits. Those who engage in a search for minutiae have their eyes adjusted to see the little things. They can spot a speck of dust in a brother's eye a half mile away and miss a building beam sticking out of their own. They can fall over a cow on the way to pick up an acorn.

The Jews who were enroute to murder Jesus would not go into the Judgment Hall lest they become unclean and not be able to eat the Passover. You did not dare miss that even if you killed a man on the way to it. Most of you have heard of the man years ago who stole a horse on Saturday evening. Monday morning the sheriff went to pick him up just as he was getting ready to ride out of the country. The astonished officer of the law said, "Why didn't you leave before now?" The man was incensed. "You don't think I'd travel on Sunday and despise the Lord's Day, do you? What do you take me for?"

A few years ago one of the brethren who lived in Texas would not permit mixed bathing of young people from the congregation in his private swimming pool. Later he was indicted and did a stretch in a federal penitentiary for promoting a fraudulent scheme which was a pretty clever confidence game. I knew a brother who used to inveigh against movies every time he got in the pulpit, but all of the time it turned out he was going to burlesque and "girlie" shows. Such inconsistency never really seems inconsistent to nitpickers. The legalistic mind has ways of justifying neglect of justice and mercy while making a great hullabaloo about things which may or may not be nearly so important.

Perhaps it is a part of the human predicament that we look through the wrong end of the binoculars at our own actions and use a magnifying glass to inspect those of our brethren. No doubt nitpickers are like the poor and we shall always have them with us. But it seems a crying shame that those who know “the power of Jesus’ name” should get so embroiled in fighting over insignificant matters they will let the world go to hell while they clobber each other. It is a “lousy” way to spend the time which God has told us to redeem, seeing that the days are evil. I hope you don’t think this article is nitpicking!

The Common Error

Mission Messenger (May 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

Have you ever had one of those days when you go around humming a tune or singing over and over a brief snatch of a song which has burned itself into your consciousness until you cannot shake it? I must confess that I've become hooked like that until someone whose nerves became taut and frayed screamed out, "Is that all you know? You've sung that one phrase a hundred times. Why don't you wait until you learn the rest of the song or get lost in the woods where you can sing it to the squirrels? They spend their entire life looking for nuts."

I get that way about quotations also. I'll be reading a book, sailing through a page with the greatest of ease, when a statement will leap out from the print and zap me right smack in the brain cells until I keep riding it around mentally in my waking moments. One such statement which I recently read was made by Lord Salisbury, that member of the Cecil family who landed the office of Prime Minister in Great Britain. He said, "The commonest error in politics is sticking to the carcase of dead policies."

I happen to think that it is also the commonest error in the domain of religion. That may be due to the fact that in a lot of places you cannot separate the two, and a lot of folk who think they are worshipping God are actually just playing politics with the souls of their brethren. My good brethren seem as prone to this as anyone I know. Let me cite an example. The idea of attempting to secure or maintain purity of doctrine and uniformity of opinion by division and fragmentation of the body of saints has been proven wholly unsuccessful. It is a dead horse, but the brethren will not remove the saddle and are still trying to ride it to glory.

One good old brother of my acquaintance, who had a private corner on truth, and who was never wrong on anything, went through three divisions he had helped to promote to preserve sound doctrine. He told me he would stand for the right if he had to stand alone. He ended up doing just that, not standing for the truth, but standing alone, after finally withdrawing from his son and the son's family. The son told me, "Dad wasn't nearly as faithful to God as he was stubborn with people." The kingdom of heaven, foretold by all the holy prophets, is a mighty bedraggled looking spectacle when it is down to but one citizen, old enough to have one foot in the grave and the other one on a banana peel.

What happened to us, as a people, of course, was that when certain problems arose among the brethren a century and a half ago, they had no real spiritual approach to them. They could harangue the Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians about the sectarian divisions and drive them up a tree in debate, but they had no real dynamic to accept one another as God had accepted them all, in spite of their ignorance. The Enemy, who hates reformation and has never failed to smash a restoration movement to smithereens, was waiting in the wings. He came in on cue and splintered us like a quaking aspen struck by a bolt of lightning.

Our very first division among ourselves ended the effectiveness of our appeal for unity, and directed most of our time, talent and treasure toward fighting each other. The more we fought the more we divided, and the more we divided the more we fought. Great values went out the window and while it was open we jerked one-third of our favorite motto off and threw it out also. From that time on we were no longer inhibited by “in all things charity,” and it was dog-eat-dog and “the devil take the hindmost.”

By the grace of God we have been preserved until this day, perhaps as a showcase exhibit to the rest of the world of what happens when a unity movement is plowing along and hits a stump and comes unglued. And some vociferous individuals, still breathing the atmosphere of the nineteenth century and sucking the paps of “Mother Schism” are crying out in their sleep for more division despite the fact that such division among brethren is everywhere condemned and not once commended in the sacred scriptures.

As bad as things were in some of the seven congregations scattered over Asia Minor, not once was the recommendation given that “the faithful few” pull up stakes and go out and start a “loyal group.” The Holy Spirit, who craved to be heard by anyone who had ears, was speaking to some pretty rag-tag congregations, but he still recognized them and was still speaking to them. God knew that once he advocated cleavage of the saints in Christ over matters of understanding and interpretation, it would jerk the lid off a Pandora’s box of ills which would never again be corralled. All the king’s horses and all the king’s men could not put that Humpty-Dumpty together again!

But what the Holy Spirit would not do the party spirit has now done. It has lacerated and slashed us, mangled and gashed us, until in some areas the brethren spend more time in civil war and internecine strife than in battling the malign forces of hell. In a ripped-off world they contribute more to purchase time on the media to assail and assault their brethren than they do the pagan and heathen forces which threaten to engulf us all. It is no longer true that we wrestle not with flesh and blood. In many places the weapons of our warfare are carnal. The sword of the Spirit is dipped in fratricidal gore as if that was the very reason why God had placed it in our unworthy hands.

We have Paul to thank for telling us what is wrong. We have not grown up, and we are still carnal. We are walking as natural men and not as supernatural men. We are living like pagans rather than as children of a common and loving Father. The blatant voices calling for fragmentation are carnal voices. The journals seeking to promote strife are carnal journals. The hearts of those who edit them are not right with God. The hearts of those who hearken to them are the hearts of babes in Christ.

It is time for those who have grown up to demonstrate it by healing the breaches, repairing the rents, and proclaiming peace. It does not require much knowledge to bite and devour one another. A cannibal need not be educated. Indeed, people who are insane can engage in such activity. Men can destroy a mansion who cannot build a doghouse. There is no particular honor due to spiritual vandals who wreck the house of God and set the living stones to hurling themselves at one another.

We live in a different age than the raw frontier culture which helped to spawn our divisions over music, cups, colleges, classes, and all the rest of the motley horde of opinions and interpretations which grew into traditions and made void the law of God against strife and division among the saints. It is no honor to stick to the decaying carcass of dead policies. God's children are not flies. They are not vultures.

We must renounce division as having any power to promote peace with God or with our brethren. We do no honor to the unity of the Spirit when we cannot even maintain the bond of peace. It is time to receive one another as we are. God did not wait until we all agreed with him before he reached down from heaven to take us in his arms. Nor can we wait until all see everything alike before we receive his other children. There is only one unity available to brethren possessed of rational power, men and women who think, and that is unity in diversity. It is silly to look for any other. It is either such unity or none!

Schism in the body as a means of promoting purity is as dead as a Dodo, and as out-of-date as picking your teeth at the dinner table with a Bowie knife. It is time to get the first-century faith out of its nineteenth-century garb and introduce it to the twentieth century. It is time to grow up!

Queen of Epistles

Mission Messenger (June 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

The congregation of God is something quite different. It is the company of people whom it has pleased God to call into the fellowship of His Son. Its members are chosen by Him, not by us, and we have to accept them whether we like them or not. — The Household of God, by Lesslie Newbigin.

If you are the “gung ho” type of reader, this article which is the first of a short series, may turn you off like a faucet in the kitchen sink. I could jump off the journalistic diving-board and start paddling for the other shore but I prefer to take you behind the scenes, and let you see what happened to firm up my resolution to write about part of one chapter in the Ephesian letter. If I ramble around a little in this too lengthy introduction you can either take a nap or two along the way or climb the fence and cut across the lower forty and meet us three or four pages down the road.

Almost a year ago I spent a long evening talking in a dormitory room with three young brethren on a university campus. You couldn’t have picked a more unlikely looking foursome. I was approaching sixty-five, as evidenced by my thin gray hair, a non-intellectual wholly devoid of an educational degree, having barely gotten out of Topeka High School through the grace of God, with the added assistance of Miss Carmi Wolfe, an unclaimed female blessing who was a speech teacher like no other I have ever met. May she rest in peace!

In addition, I was the only one in the dorm room who gave evidence by his dress that he was part of “the straight world.” I had a tie on and was wearing an Arrow shirt which I had purchased on the bargain counter of “irregulars.” The other fellows were wearing jeans, and their heavy shoes which looked like combat boots sent a stray thought flickering through my mind that I was in an underground meeting with some of God’s paratroopers.

One of the men looked like my idea of the ship captain who pursued Moby Dick. He had a bushy beard which would have made the writing prophets green with envy in 500 B.C. The other two lads both had moustaches. One of them had trained his to make him look as fierce as any pirate who ever climbed up the deck of a ship with a knife held between his gleaming incisors. But we were absolutely at ease. They accepted me as being about their age and I accepted them as being about mine, and since “generation gaps” only exist inside of people, if there is no internal gap there can be no external one.

Our talk was serious, although punctuated by some of the sharp wit which is a part of the refreshingly open era in which our lot has been fortunately cast. I had spoken four times on campus that day, starting at a continental breakfast before daybreak. Three times I had made myself vulnerable by inviting questions from the audience, and I had gone the full round, discussing humanism, existentialism, the genuineness and authenticity of the sacred scriptures, the concept of life beyond, and the authority of the moral and ethical values as expressed by Jesus in word and deed.

At the morning meeting these three came to ask if they might meet with me after the last session of the day and “rap” awhile. I am not a philosopher and I haven’t got as much sense as Elton Trueblood who heads for the motel room to rest and meditate every evening at 10:00 o'clock. That is about the time when things start moving on the campus. So I allowed these three personable activists to "con" me into meeting with them in a session which finally broke up with a prayer about 2:00 o'clock in the morning.

They were all interesting, but then I have never met a person who isn't. They had been through some pretty hairy escapades which were calculated to curdle the blood of a staid old codger like myself, but I am resolved never to be surprised by anything which humans do, and if I am, never to let them know it. The boy with the buccaneer-type moustache had been "busted by the fuzz" about two years before, to employ the language which is the jargon of the one time Beats. He had been inhaling a joint when the long arm of the law reached out and plucked him from a park bench. When they searched him they found his little sack of expensive "Acapulco Gold" and they put him through the legal wringer, giving him a pretty rough way to go.

He now looked upon the occasion of his arrest and detention as an exhibition of God's providence, because one of the Jesus People who was working the jail, and who had formerly been on the real hard stuff, sought him out and told him "the Way was a Who" and also told him who the Way was. Now all three were members of the Church of Christ although it was touch and go as to whether they could stay with it and keep their sanity. It was a little like being back in the detention ward. They were not under grace but under law! That was one reason they wanted to talk with me. They knew I had not "flown the coop" or tried to set "the chicken house" on fire!

I had been brought on campus by a crew of young Christians who wanted to throw down the gauntlet of faith in the pagan arena and have a direct encounter with the forces of raw skepticism. The only group in the city that kicked up dust about my coming was the Church of Christ. The preacher came down to the college class on the Sunday before and warned the students not to attend my meetings. He fulminated at length and breathed out fire about my laxity on fellowship, telling the kids how I did not hesitate to speak where they used instrumental music. But he made the mistake of telling them I was probably one of the best thinkers around, and spoke and wrote so cleverly that I could make black look white and vice versa. So all of them came, every one of them, and quietly slipped up and told me they wanted to see my magic color trick. We had a great time in the Lord! They were terrific!

Before the talk fest was very far along I learned that the others were really serious about study of the revealed word. They were engaged in a weekly investigation of Ephesians in one of the dorms and were enthused about it. When they learned it was one of the books which really turned me on we discussed it at length and I told them that for years I had bandied about the idea of writing a whole book on Ephesians 4:1-16. They urged me to do it. I pointed out that I could never fulfill the dream because I had so much else going, but I might deal with it briefly in the paper.

I requested each one to write down how he classified the Ephesian letter. Here are some of the answers of these perceptive men with sharp minds. "Ephesians is the dessert served up with God's free smorgasbord." "It is the minimum daily requirement of all truth caught up in a single one-a-day capsule." "The jewel covered handle of the sword of the Spirit." They did not know it but they were expressing in contemporary vernacular what heavy minds of the past had said.

William Barclay calls Ephesians "the Queen of the epistles." He says it is "Paul's supreme letter." Hugh Grotius, who died in 1645, said, "It equals its sublimity of ideas with words more sublime than any human language ever possessed." Samuel Taylor Coleridge called it, "The divinest composition of man." Once, while teaching a class years ago I referred to it as

“the central diamond in the regal crown of divine disclosures.”
At the insistence of my young friends I want to share a few thoughts about it. What I say will neither be new nor unique. I only trust that it will be refreshing.

RANDOM COMMENTS

Although my purpose is not to give an exegesis of the Ephesian letter, but to discuss only a part of one chapter as it relates to the intent of God in creating special functionaries for the community of the reconciled ones, I believe certain preliminary statements are not out of line. The letter is one of “togetherness” and the key word is together. It appears in such statements as the following. “God hath quickened us together in Christ. . . . and hath raised us up together and made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus.” And again, “Ye are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit.”

All of this is in harmony with the divine purpose, pleasure and will, which is to “gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, even in him” (1:10). The letter is a great dissertation on unity. And unity is to be found only in Jesus. The expression “in Him” sounds like the staccato blows of a power hammer as the apostle beats out a rhythm of oneness. We are chosen in him, in him we have redemption, in him we have obtained an inheritance. He is the center of life. Whatever does not proceed from him has no authority. He is the circumference of life. Whatever does not lead to him has no validity. He is everything! He is all!

After we trusted in him we were sealed with the Holy Spirit who had been promised (1:13). We were quickened or made alive after being dead in sins and trespasses. We not only owe God our thanks for an inheritance but we are indebted to him for life. Really the inheritance is life! So this letter speaks of those who were apart from God being brought back into unity with him by reconciliation through his marvelous grace.

It also deals with those who were alienated from one another. The Gentiles were regarded as being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. They were foreigners according to the covenant upon which the promises were based. They had no hope. They were in the world without God. They were held in contempt by the Jews. It was a common saying that, "Gentiles were made as fuel to keep the fires of hell stoked." To touch a Gentile was to become unclean. To enter a Gentile home was to be defiled. So bitter was the hostility that if a Jewish boy married a Gentile girl, the parents of the boy held a funeral service for their son. Intimate relationship with a Gentile was the equivalent of death!

But Jesus swept away the hatred. He did not force the Jews to become Gentiles, nor the Gentiles to become like Jews. Those who were far off were brought nigh by the blood of Jesus. It was the blood that reached out and drew them in. He abolished in his flesh the enmity. He reconciled both Jew and Gentile unto God in one body by the cross, having slain the existing hostility by it. I am thrilled by this! I know now that the secret of unity is not to kill each other off in debate. It is not to vanquish opposers at all. It is to remove the hostility that exists between us. It is not to straighten up everything so we can start loving. It is to start loving so we can straighten up things. It is to love that we may live, for it is better not to live than not to love.

The Jews continued in their circumcision. The Gentiles continued in their uncircumcision. What the blood did was to render both of them unavailing in the divine-human relationship. The only thing really important to that relationship is a new creation in Christ Jesus. That is why I repeatedly affirm that I shall allow no opinion, idea or interpretation of sincere brethren in Christ to become of greater value than the blood of Jesus. I shall not sever the red cord with which God has bound us by the sharp blade of controversy.

We do not become one by attaining harmony. Peace is not a pact but a person. He is our peace. We are made one. Our unity is an act of God, not an attainment of man. Read it again! “He is our peace, who hath made both one.” I do not need to accept the views of another. All I do is accept Jesus, and that puts me in a position to accept everyone whom God accepts. I do not accept a man because I agree with him. I accept him because God accepts him. If he is circumcised I do not uncircumcise him. If he is uncircumcised I do not circumcise him. The only circumcision which counts is that made without hands. It is an operation of God and not an act of man. It is the faith he has in Jesus, and not his conformity with a theological position I hold, which brings a man into Jesus.

It is easy to talk about how the cross renders the entire hassle over circumcision invalid. We no longer have that problem. For one thing, not one community of saints in a thousand has a single Jew in it. It is no longer “to the Jew first and also to the Greek.” It is now to the Gentile first and last, and not at all to the Jew. Most brethren think the gospel cannot save the Jew now, so they do not bother taking it to the Jewish community.

Our contemporary problems are basically the same in nature. But they are over different issues. The Bible does not mention our issues, so we never think of applying the recommendation as to circumcision to them. We are just not bothered about eating meats or observing days, and we have no trauma over circumcision. The faith has now become a white Anglo-Saxon, middle-class American export. It is our bag! We even talk of sending “missionaries” to England and Canada. They are not a part of the United States of America so they are areas for foreign missionaries to try and reach “where the gospel has never been preached.”

I am no longer a party to the sectarian spirit. I have been delivered from the partisan treadmill. All of our “issues” avail nothing so far as I am concerned. Instrumental music avails nothing and non-instrumental music avails nothing in so far as our relationship with God through Christ Jesus is concerned. Bible classes avail nothing or lack of them avails nothing. The same is true of one cup or individual cups, orphan homes or no orphan homes— all of them are like circumcision. If a man wants to be circumcised but does not regard it as essential to my salvation and does not try to bind it as dogma upon my heart, it is his business. It is between himself and God. The same thing holds true for instrumental music, cups, classes or colleges. Just do not try to bind any position upon me as essential to life with the Father, for I do not believe it. He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life. That is where I stand, and there is where I intend to allow others to stand.

I intend to receive every person who has been immersed into Christ Jesus upon the basis of his faith, just as God received me. And I do not intend to be catechized, cashiered or calibrated by men. I no longer represent any splinter or segment created by men. I belong to Jesus. I intend to stand with Him. I will not be moved. I do not belong to Jesus because I belong to a special set of brethren, but I belong with all of His brethren because I belong to Him. If God could accept me into his fellowship when I was ignorant about so much I will have no trouble accepting others who are ignorant about so little. Fellowship is not conditioned upon one being right about all things, but upon being in the right one at all times.

I may disagree with a saint the rest of my natural life. I may discuss our differences every time I see him. I know that I will if he brings them up. But, if he has gained access by one Spirit unto the Father, I'll receive him as my brother, and I will not look upon him as an alien or foreigner. We are not begotten again by musing on music or by a position on praise, but by a loving Father. It is the blood of Christ which makes us one, not a correct understanding of every opinion. We are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works. It is not a good work to destroy or deny his workmanship. If you are good enough for God to receive, you are not bad enough for me to reject.

UNITY OF THE SPIRIT

I could write about the Ephesian letter from now on until the death angel flutters outside my window, and the gray specter knocks the pen from my nerveless fingers. Every statement in the book is like a cup of cold water to my parched and thirsty soul. Every sentence is sweeter than honey in the honeycomb, sweeter than a lollipop handed to a longing, wide-eyed child. But I must shoulder my expository pack and get going. If I never introduce the fourth chapter I will never arrive at the place where special functionaries are identified and placed in proper perspective. I hope that you are not too tired with what you have already read to trail along with me a little while longer.

Please remember that our real purpose is to learn God's secret for the edifying of the body, that marvelous synchronization, the glorious organism, composed of living parts. I have the honor of being one of them. I'm overjoyed that the teaching with which I am concerned is pitched on a field of unity. This is the soil in which service must grow if it is to grow at all. It is God's will that the disunity seen in every part of the fragmented universe be resolved in Christ Jesus. His design is that it shall be effected by the body. My task is to become an instrument for the sacred oneness, an earthen vessel bearing the message of unity, a channel through which grace may flow to produce singleness of heart.

"I therefore the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you that ye walk worthy of the vocation wherewith ye are called, with all lowliness and meekness, with long-suffering, forbearing one another in love, endeavoring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace" (4:1-3).

These words logically fall into three divisions— a plea from prison, a presentation to practice, and a position to protect. They define the responsibility of an organ in the spiritual body. They speak of a call, a walk and an endeavor. Unless we understand the meaning and implication of the terms we will probably mill around contributing to the confusion rather than promoting the peace.

It is not a mere dramatic gesture which prompted the apostle to remind us he was a prisoner. Certainly one who was shackled to a Roman guard, awaiting death, would not waste his time writing trivia. There is something impelling about words written in prison with the gray shadow of death moving stealthily closer. Witness the impact of the writings of John Bunyan and Dietrich Bonhoeffer. From the dungeon of the Mamertine prison in Rome these words come with a special passion. We dare not deny their urgency.

To walk is to progress in a given direction, and it is to progress with regular and consistent steps. Vocation is the word for calling, so that literally, the saints are urged to walk worthy of the calling to which they are called. This is universal rather than specific or limited. The religious world has long had an idea that God calls certain men to preach or to be missionaries. There is nothing in the Word upon which to base this. The fact is that all of us are called to the side of Jesus to share in subduing the world to him. This is our vocation. Paul's vocation was not tent-making. That was the means by which he supported himself while fulfilling his calling. Our call is to serve, and to walk worthy of it is to behave consistently and to act responsibly.

The worthy behavior is here described by five great terms. Barclay calls them jewels. He says they are basic to the Christian faith. With most of them he deals in his book Word Studies in the Bible. I believe they are absolutely essential to the maintenance of unity among fallible beings like ourselves.

Lowliness is a word which owes its existence to the Way. It describes a virtue which the pagan society looked at with disdain. It was regarded as ignoble and inferior. Our best current translation is humility, which the heathen social culture regarded as cringing and servile. It was never regarded as a worthy approach to behavior by those outside of Jesus.

Yet it is the person who stubbornly insists upon having his own way about everything, the one who regards the world as “his oyster,” and who will stoop to anything to gain his point, who is the real threat to unity. Almost every congregation has someone who acts like “a spoiled brat” in the divine family, throwing a tantrum or indulging in a spell of pouting if he does not get his way in a business meeting. Sometimes such individuals, in their egotistical spirit, try to bludgeon others into agreement by coercion and threat of leaving or withholding their money. Such unscrupulous persons always blame those who will not kow-tow to their dictatorial demands as causing the trouble when no group can continue to function while it is dominated by such high-handed tactics. They are “flies in the apothecary’s ointment” and they cause it to stink.

Lowliness is not feeling sorry for oneself. It is not a cringing, cowering attitude. Rather it results from an honest and fair evaluation of self. It is the result of taking off our mask and getting a good look at self in the mirror of real life. It is what happens to character when we start living and quit putting on an act. I doubt that anything else ever shook me quite as much as the startling realization that what I thought of as being “loyal” to Jesus by debating my brethren, was actually a tool for furthering division. And the tragedy of it was that I liked it. Incredible as it seems, it was almost as if I were glad that divisions had come so I could prove my valor.

Notice that the apostle enjoins “all lowliness and meekness.” These are not characteristics to be adopted in business meetings or when a public assembly is discussing a subject. They are not jackets to put on when the weather changes, or external wrappings to be donned to face crises. They are not just a way of life but the life of The Way. They are not to be partial but complete.

The original word for meekness was used for an animal which had been trained to obey and which could be guided by the bit and reins. Once when I was out west, I stayed with a man who trained horses. The first day I was in his home I made the error of referring to it as “breaking horses.” He quickly corrected me. He thought of a spirited horse as a noble creature. He refused to break it. He told me that what he did was simply discipline an animal to respond to a superior authority, the will of a master.

When the Spirit plucked this word out of the vocabulary bag and dropped it in here as Paul was writing, He had this same thing in mind. Meekness is not weakness. A horse is as strong while guided by reins as when it roamed the plains as a mustang. But his strength is now channeled for constructive use. The Anheuser-Busch Breweries with headquarters in our city, maintain a stable of huge Clydesdales which annually win prizes for the floats they draw in such spectacular pageants as the Rose Bowl parade. They are not weak, but they are disciplined, and they work together in harmony at the touch of a master’s hand. That is meekness as the word is here used.

God may break our hearts but he does not crush our spirits. A broken and a contrite heart he will not despise, because it is divested of false pride and that frightful bloated egotism which wants to do its own thing. But soldiers need vibrant spirits to endure hardship. Music cannot be made from strings that sag or hang loose. We must respond as one when the Master strikes the keyboard and the symphony of life is being played.

The next term essential to the fulfillment of the divine ideal is that of long-suffering. The Latins used it for the indomitable spirit. It described the man who would never give in. Beaten down, he would never surrender. I recall a boy like that when I went to a little rural school. Most of us fought everyday although it was strictly forbidden. That is probably the reason we did it. It doesn't take much to start a fight when you are eager for the fray and would "rather fight than switch,"— or study, either. We had a routine to follow when we got a victim down where we could pound on him and work him over. He had to say "calf rope" before we would let him up!

I have no idea where the term originated, nor what it meant. It was a country expression and I suspect was a term of surrender indicative of what happened when a running calf was roped and snubbed to a halt. But the lad to whom I referred would never say it. Even when a bigger roughneck sat on him and beat the daylight out of him he would not give in or give up. I talked to his mother about it and she told me that when he was small she undertook to make him say he was sorry for some misdeed. She wore out two peach tree switches and whipped him until she got out of breath and had to stop for fear of getting a heart attack and leaving a stubborn orphan. He did not flinch during the beating, and like a sheep dumb before his shearers he opened not his mouth.

That was long-suffering among the Romans. They cultivated it to such a degree they would never make peace under defeat. If a Roman legion was backed against a wall they would die to a man without giving in, and the final survivor would die swinging the sword while it grew slimy in his grip from his own gore pouring from his wounds.

But the new covenant scriptures were not written in Latin. They were written in Greek and here the word had a wholly different bearing. It referred to that spirit which rejects retaliation and puts up with men who are bitter, recriminating and malicious. Chrysostom called it the spirit which had power to take revenge, but which never does so. All of us have seen congregations of saints ruined by those who sought to “get back” at someone because of a slight, sometimes real, but often fancied. Peace will never dwell in a family or in a congregation where members allow wrath to be coddled and nurtured in sick minds.

Francis Bacon wrote, “In taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over, he is superior.” He said in the same essay, “A man that studieth revenge keeps his own wounds green, which otherwise would heal and do well.” I think there is a tremendous spiritual value to be gained from a knowledge that you could step into the arena with one who is flinging taunts and insults at you and slap him into the top tier of bleacher seats, but you refuse to do it and get your hands dirty. It is hard to fling tar without getting a little of it on yourself. No one with good sense should fight a skunk with a short stick, and it is unlikely you’ll accomplish much by poking at a rattlesnake with a ballpoint pen.

Preachers must really cultivate long-suffering if they love the cause. Many congregations have someone in them who was born in the objective case and the kickative mood. When such an attitude is coupled with a suspicious mind and a long tongue it not only kindles a fire but it keeps throwing brush on it so it will not be extinguished. A confirmed busybody is not only a big nuisance but a genuine source of difficulty. There must be a pretty intensive desire to use the shelter of the pulpit to tell such people off, but there is the possibility that they are a little off before you tell them. Restraint is better than revenge. There is a Spanish proverb which says, “No revenge is more honorable than the one not taken.” The poet Juvenal, who wrote about the time John was on Patmos, said that, “Revenge is always the joy of narrow, sick and petty minds.”

Probably religious editors are worse offenders than most. Every sect seems to rally around a journal. The field of journalism is not exempt from men who crave notoriety by snapping and snarling at every person who differs with them. If there are no issues they contrive one, as they have no other reason for existence than that of agitation. When brethren who are attacked are a little sensitive it is hard to keep from fetching an editorial kick at the tormentors but to do so does not contribute to peace. It involves one in an effort which demands time and energy and which forces truly important things to suffer from default. It does not seem like good judgment to let your car run off into the river while trying to swat a mosquito who thinks he is a hummingbird. The best way to deal with an attack upon you is to write a stinging rejoinder and throw it in the wastebasket without publishing it.

Forbearing is a good word, closely allied to the preceding expressions. To be forbearing is to be tolerant, and to make allowances for others. Unfortunately, the discussion about fellowship the last few years has made a lot of brethren as nervous and jumpy as a mother kangaroo in a room full of pickpockets. They are upset and edgy, and the cold sweat breaks out on them at the dire thought that they might mistakenly regard someone as a brother who did not trim his sails by the orthodox wind. No one is more jittery than those who have to sort out everyone who is going to heaven and save God the trouble.

To them tolerance is a dirty word. But it must be remembered that tolerance is not the endorsement of anything that is wrong. It is merely enduring one who thinks it is right. And we are positively told that we must make allowances for one another in love. If we make no allowances for others none will be made for us. And we are going to be in dire need of mercy. Not all ignorance is deliberate and one can be mistaken without being a rebel. There is something sadly askew in an imperfect heart which demands perfection in all others except itself. Fortunately, the final judgment must be left to God and not to the brethren. If it had not been so arranged there would have been no use for heaven and hell would have been bursting at the seams. It is obvious that anyone who thinks of himself as going to glory must realize that God will have to overlook a whole lot of ignorance and some pretty seamy behavior.

Our real problem is in the love department. As human beings we are not only inclined to be selfish and childish, but we are that way. We want to love only those who love us, and we want them to be first. We flatter our ego by feeling very close to those who are like us and who see things as we see them. We're afraid we'll waste a little love where it will not be appreciated, and as low as some love tanks are there is a chance they will run dry before we get around. What we do not realize is that love is of God. It is poured out in our hearts by the Holy Spirit who has been given unto us. Of course, He cannot pour it out or pour it in if we hold our hand over the spout. Some brethren are so jittery about the Spirit they do not want him to pour anything on them, in them or about them! They don't want to be "withdrawn from."

Our divisions did not come over "issues" at all. And they will not be settled by debating issues. If we argued every issue to a frazzle and then argued the frazzle off, new issues would spring up and factional souls would wave them as factional banners and there would be new divisions and new heartaches. No one is more divided or bitter than those who split off to keep the Lord's church pure. We did not divide when issues were introduced or for a long time afterward, but we divided when we quit loving one another. The way to overcome division is to resume loving each other.

I mean start loving one another where we are and as we are. It is downright silly to wait until people see everything as you do to show your love for them. Just about the time you get things patched up one of you may learn something new and if you do that will upset the unity apple cart again. It would help a lot of brethren, especially preachers, to start being honest about love. Every time you mention it as the unifying dynamic they interject, “I have always loved everyone.” If they love them like some of them do me, God help everyone! Who needs enemies as long as he has some brethren?

It hardly seems very loving to me to misrepresent your brethren, but I suspect a lot of folk have a warped idea of what love is all about. Love is from agape. It is the essence of God, the divine nature. It was difficult to capture this in a human word. Words are vehicles of thought and the concept of the divine essence was so magnificent there was no vehicle adequate to convey it. The Spirit adopted an unusual word, a strange one to the common Greek, and invested it with a sense it never had before. Even yet the spirit infused into it is so tremendous we are always whittling it down or deflating it to fit into our puny souls.

When some partisan defender derides or sneers at love as the only dynamic which can fulfill the very purpose of all law and bring peace to a fragmented world, he does not realize that he is belittling the very essence of God and asserting it is incapable of restoring order in a disorderly universe. Agape is unconquerable and indestructible benevolence. It is that active and benevolent good will which stops at nothing to achieve the good of the beloved object.

It is not a fluctuating emotion at all. It is an act of will, the admission of the divine essence or nature into the human personality and the projection of that nature— healing, restoring and recovering broken relationships. I have been accused of believing that love can solve every problem on earth. I gladly plead guilty to the charge. I not only believe it can do that, but I believe it is the only force in the universe that can. It is not love or something else. It is love or nothing else. Without love gifts are nothing. Without it sacrifices are nothing. Without it we are nothing.

It is one of the most difficult assignments of the Spirit to forbear one another in love, that is, to make allowances because of sheer love. This kind of love is not for frightened, pussyfooting, wire-walking members of an institution who are trusting to their mere membership to save them. To know this love one must die. He must count all of his past attainments as garbage. He must throw them on the refuse dump. It is impossible to have agape without a cross— your cross.

A lot of good people will never be able to see how love can conquer division while differences exist. That's the only time it can conquer it! It is no problem to me. I simply esteem my brethren as being of more value than my opinions or ideas. I will not allow something for which my Lord did not die to come between me and my brother for whom He did die. Nothing that Jesus has not purchased with his blood is as important to me as someone he has bought with it. Once I could not see some of my brethren for a piano, now I cannot see a piano for my brethren. That does not cure the difference but it does cure the division, and the Bible does not say that difference of opinion is a sin but it does say that division in the family of God is a sin. The way to unite is to unite, not to debate about it.

I am not commanded to love my brother's ideas. I am told to love my brother. The Bible does not say to let "idea love" continue but to let brotherly love continue. I intend to do that because one who does not love his brother is a murderer and you know that no murderer has eternal life. You cross the frontier from death unto life because you love the brethren. He that does not love his brother abides in death. That is not a pleasing prospect for me.

God does not limit my love of brethren to those in the restoration movement or any other movement. We do not become brothers by enrolling in a movement or by identification with a faction, but by being born again. And I am going to love all of God's children wherever they are. I do not want to love merely in word or speech but in deed and in truth. I do not intend to sham it, fake it, or make a pretense. I am going to love my brothers for real and I am going to show it!

I shall recognize them, share with them, go among them, labor with them as far as they will allow me in whatever enterprise appeals to my conscience as being scriptural. I shall make allowances for them in love. You do not have to be forbearing with someone who agrees with you on everything. My brethren need not love me for me to love them. Agape is love for the unloving and unlovely. It is unconquerable good will toward those who count themselves as our enemies. Jesus came from heaven to earth because he loved and I want to go from earth to heaven for the same reason.

THE BOND OF PEACE

We are to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Keep means to guard, protect, preserve or maintain. Unity is from the Spirit and of the Spirit. Peace is also a fruit of the Spirit. Unity is not seeing everything alike. The United States is composed of a number of states, but they do not all share the same philosophy. There is a great difference between Georgia and New York, or between North Dakota and North Carolina.

Unity in Christ is not something that we shape but something in which we share. We do not achieve it, we appropriate it. It is a creation of the Spirit and not a coalition of man. It is called the unity of the Spirit because it originates with the Spirit and is ministered by the Spirit. It is the Spirit dwelling within which binds us to God and to one another. If the Spirit dwells in me and the same Spirit dwells in you, we are together in Christ whether we admit it or not. I'm in unity with every person on this earth in whom the Spirit abides. I do not care where they are.

In the old covenant peace was associated with salvation and this meant to be made whole, to restore to the original state of wholeness. It meant more than cessation of hostilities or a time when war was not being actively waged. A man once told me that he knew the most peaceable couple in the community. They never exchanged a cross word. Neither ever interrupted the other. They were this way because they were not on speaking terms. Peace is not quietness based on hostility or contempt.

The word eirene, the word for peace can be best defined in terms of relationship. The bond of peace is the tie that binds me in proper relationship to my brethren because I am in a proper relationship with God. Peace grows out of an inner consciousness of acceptance with God, a sense of justification by faith or trust in the righteousness of Christ.

In a world of war I am called to wage peace. I will be blessed only if I am a peacemaker. I will also be called a child of God. So I must proclaim peace, plead for it and press it upon men. I must not be deterred by those who seek strife and ensue it. No task is nobler than to attempt to mediate peace in God's fragmented family. Frequently nothing else is more misunderstood.

Knowing this, Benjamin Franklin wrote a letter to John Adams, on October 12, 1781, in which he said, "I have never known a peace made, even the most advantageous, that was not censured as inadequate, and the makers condemned as injudicious or corrupt. 'Blessed are the peacemakers' is, I suppose, to be understood in the other world; for in this they are frequently cursed."

Peace will never be restored by universal conformity. The minds of men can no more all think alike than their faces all look alike. Peace was never ordained upon uniformity of opinion, ideas or interpretation, but upon faith. And faith rests upon facts and not upon deductions from the facts. That is why our walls will not be broken down by metaphysical debate but by love.

Recently I read a statement made in a speech by a French priest, Msgr. Chevrot, who could see that creeds and dogmata were losing their power over the minds of men. He said, “The ramparts behind which men protect themselves from each other seem able to defy the centuries: but they are not safe against erosion. A day comes when the mortar crumbles, the stones come apart, and the walls of the citadel collapse. My brothers, we are separated today; if we have not got ladders long enough to climb the walls which separate us, we have a force that can undermine them, the force of our love. Let us love one another as Jesus loved us, and he, our Christ, will throw down these impassable walls.”

Simple Trusting Faith

Mission Messenger (June 1974)

Volume 36

[Abstract]

Man is but a reed, the most feeble thing in nature; but he is a thinking reed. It is not necessary that the whole universe should arm itself to crush him— a vapor, a drop of water suffices to kill him. But though the universe should crush him, man would still be more noble than that which kills him, because he knows that he dies, and the advantage which the universe has over him. —Blaise Pascal.

A few years ago I wrote a book which I called Simple Trusting Faith, and which is now out of print. It grew out of what I felt was a necessity. As I went about holding “rap sessions” with college and university students, a lot of young people asked me where they could secure a book which would provide a fairly adequate expression of my views. Since I did not know of such a volume I sat down and wrote one of my own.

I dealt with the concept of the existence of God, as well as with the incarnation of the Word and the virgin birth. I also considered the problem of the supernatural as evidenced in miracles and concluded with a chapter upon eternal life as a new dimension of existence available now through a relationship to God by the Holy Spirit.

I wrote the book easily and the arguments appearing in it seemed to me to be valid. The terminology I employed was not forced. I did not adopt a vocabulary for the occasion. I am not a scientist and the professional scientific vernacular would have been as far out for me as it would have been for most of my readers.

It came, therefore, as a real surprise to me when I began to receive letters from all over saying that the book was helpful but was very far from being simple. Some folk wrote that if this was an expression of simple trusting faith they would be hard put to read a book on profound trusting faith. Of course, many of those who wrote were like myself, quite lacking in formal educational attainments. Real scholars no doubt thought of the book as quite superficial, and if they read it all, they did so as light literature before retiring at night.

But I learned something from my experience. A lot of folk who accept the Bible sincerely, as containing a revelation of the divine mind, could not build a logical case for it at all. Actually, such a structural foundation, piling up syllogisms like building blocks, would leave them cold. They would be dangling on the literary ropes before they had read six pages.

This has caused the faith to become a butt of ridicule by some who are sophisticated, and by a great many others who think they are. It is assumed that a majority of Christians are gullible, basing their hope on traditional views and childhood fantasies left over from Sunday school. This has sparked a reaction upon our part and driven us to think that we must validate the faith by carefully constructed argument which can be typed out in a format so convincing that it will knock unsuspecting skeptics and atheists for the proverbial loop when it is read in their presence.

I am all for a rational approach. I do not mean by that a view which is wholly outside the realm of experience and emotion. I have read books presenting the case for Christianity which were as cold as a frog on a dissecting table. I have also listened to learned lecturers who could deal with apologetics as masterfully, and about as concernedly, as an Irish bricklayer. If God is not real to me in my daily life, and if the Spirit is not my Comforter all of the time, what I produce in my study will probably be as dry as sawdust and about as palatable. There are not many of us who live in an intellectual penthouse. We have to get faith down on the street level. We cannot soar around over town like a glorified Batman. Jesus did not say "Feed my giraffes." He said, "Feed my sheep!" We have to get the fodder down out of the trees and in the trough.

Shall one wait for faith until he has examined, scrutinized, and evaluated the formal evidence and digested it? If so, a lot of folk will never be able to attain to faith. I doubt that very many are led to the faith once delivered by erudite argument. I once knew a very perceptive lawyer who thought he was safe by claiming to be an agnostic. I liked him and he liked me and because we could make mental sparks fly we were frequently together. He deliberately posed questions to probe the ability of faith to defend itself as in a court of law. This suited me! Socrates said, "The unexamined life is not worth living," and I have paraphrased that to read, "The unexamined faith is not worth having." It seems to me that faith must make itself vulnerable in the marketplace, or it may be merely prejudice.

After we had mentally sparred vigorously for more than a year, my friend asked me to baptize him one day. I did so, inwardly rejoicing (God forgive me!) that I had vanquished his precise arguments and won the battle of wits. He soon disabused my thinking when he said there were many points about the rational structure which were not yet clear and he even thought I was a little muddled in some of my arguments. The thing which had finally won him was patience coupled with genuine love. He had come to feel that Jesus was who He claimed to be because of the quality of His presence in the inner life of those who had accepted him.

The strange thing about this is that what I regarded as my strongest arguments did not get through to him, or, if they did, they did not appeal to his rational powers. But my life, which I regarded as my weakest proof, impressed him. It came to me that we will probably never be able to work out a systematic sequence of syllogistic proof which will overthrow skepticism. It is altogether possible that God never intended for us to try.

Cardinal Newman once wrote, “The heart is commonly reached, not through the reason, but through the imagination, by means of direct impressions, by the testimony of facts and events, by history, by description. Persons influence us, voices melt us, looks subdue us, deeds inflame us. Many a man will live and die upon a dogma; no man will be a martyr for a conclusion.”

I think there is beauty and utility in apologetic structures erected by word architects of rational premises. I stand amazed at the knowledge displayed by those who have covered the field of defense. But many admire great buildings who could not describe them, much less explain their construction. We look at cathedrals but we live in homes, and many of the faithful must remain in the suburban area of rationalization. They are so busy eking out an existence, and life is so short and the hours so crowded they cannot make an adequate study of evidences.

The ever-recurring seasons, the orderliness of the universe, the glory of the planetary system and the regimentation of the mysterious hosts of heaven— all of these speak to the soul in a quiet whisper which stifles doubt and stimulates faith. It is not so much an arrangement of a proper line of thought as it is the agreement of the whole. Reports of archaeological finds reported in the newspaper, discoveries such as those of the scrolls at Qumran, all of these bolster the inner sense of conviction in hearts which know nothing about the laws of evidence or of the scientific method.

Perhaps the faith has a built-in logic of its own. This in no sense declares that formal proofs are irrelevant and unimportant. Nothing that is true is without importance in a universe where all truth is harmonious and there is no discord with the Creator. But minds must believe which are without knowledge of logic and its classification of fallacies. If the voice of nature speaks to the remote forest dweller and confirms in his inner being what the missionary has told him in simple language, then let us praise God that this becomes his primary apologetic.

The incidental evidences which might even look foolish if set down in a book of formal logic, are eloquent to the unadorned hearts which find in them a confirmation of the deep yearning which strives for expression in life and deed. Faith has its difficulties, whether grounded in logic or in the universal voice of conscience, but the incredibilities of unbelief are so vast that their very existence constitutes an argument for the Christian faith. How thrilled I am that God has adapted the faith to all, whether it be a pin-headed pygmy in the jungle or a Princeton professor in the asphalt jungle and the intellectual tangle.

One Body in Christ

Mission Messenger (July 1974)

[Abstract]

To confess Jesus Christ is to affirm the abolition and end of division and hostility, the end of separation and segregation, the end of enmity and contempt, and the end of every sort of ghetto. Jesus Christ does not bring the victory to the man who is either on this side or that of the fence. — Markus Barth in The Broken Wall.

The fourth chapter of Ephesians starts with our calling. That calling is our vocation. It is not how we make a living, but it is our life. And it is every facet of our daily life. Elton Trueblood in Your Other Vocation says that the exciting idea behind the New Testament use of “calling” is that our world is God’s world. He adds “The way in which we grow potatoes is as much a matter of God’s will as the way in which we pray or sing.”

What has happened, and it staggers imagination, is that God has called us to his side to work with him. We have heard the call and responded to it. So the life of God, eternal life, is now ours. It is not something in the “sweet by and by” but it is here in the “sweet now and now.” The goal of God has become our goal. The purpose of God is now our purpose. We have been reconciled unto God, and now we are his reconciling community. We have made peace with God and now we are peacemakers. We are the children of God. This is our calling, living in Christ and with Christ, and we must walk worthy of it!

But we simply cannot labor together with God in uniting all things in Christ, that is, things which are in heaven and things which are on earth, unless we recognize the unity of the Spirit. Unity is not a human attainment at all. It is a divine attribute. It is bestowed upon us as love is bestowed upon us. We do not achieve it. We accept it. We do not accomplish it. We acknowledge it. Unity in Christ Jesus is a condition created by the Spirit. It is not a state we sponsor or a position we project. It is sharing in the divine oneness.

Unity is not subscription to a creed nor subservience to a concordat. It cannot be arranged or arrived at by an association nor created by a convention. Unity is life. It is the life of God, made available to us through our Lord, the Messiah Jesus. It is the life of the called ones, the new creation, the new humanity. Our task is to guard it and keep it in the bond of peace.

The unity involves seven items. It is these which define and describe our calling, and which give it reality. We are called into one body. We are called by one Spirit. We are called unto one hope. It is actually designated “the hope of our calling.” We are called to be slaves under one Lord. We are called by one faith, that which demands a supreme act of trust. We are called to obey in one baptism, the surrender of all that has been ours for all that is His in us. We are called to be children of one God and Father. He is superior to all, yet He shows His majesty through all and shares His glory in all!

The number seven is significant. It was the number for perfection in creation. It is the number for fullness or completeness in the new creation. The unity of the Spirit reaches its full complement in these seven. Not one can be slighted. Not one dare be left out. Any concept of unity which eliminates one of these is not the unity of the Spirit. Any concept which projects the idea of more than one in any of them is not the unity of the Spirit.

I am going to consider them separately but with a full sense of their relationship. They are not separate entities but parts of a whole. They are seven ingredients which make up one loaf of fellowship with the divine. They are seven plies which make up one cord, seven strands woven into one rope binding us to God and to one another. Each contributes strength to the whole and each derives strength from the others. We may consider them individually but only as parts of that wonderful unity— the unity of the Spirit!

THE ONE BODY

I shall say some things about the one body with which many of you will not agree. I will say them because I must be honest with myself and true to my own convictions. I must give account for my own thoughts and my own words before that great judgment seat. I must stand or fall to my own Master. If you cannot concur with my views I will love you just the same. I cannot claim the freedom to do my own thinking and deny that freedom to you. You are my brothers and sisters. I cherish you in Him. But I do not forget that while you are my brothers, you are not my judges! “But to me it is a very small thing that I should be judged by you, or by man’s day” (1 Corinthians 4:3). We sometimes forget that when we think we are judging what a brother says we are actually only judging ourselves. We are sitting in judgment upon our own hearts!

To save my critics, of whom there are many, a great deal of trouble, allow me to acknowledge that I have changed my thinking about the one body since I was “a boy preacher.” I no longer regard that body as a faction centering around a partisan point of emphasis, whether that point be right or wrong. I do not regard it as a denomination bearing a specific or official title and meeting behind recognized signs all stamped out with a metal “cookie cutter.” I do not think of the one body as a sect existing to exploit some theological deduction or religious philosophy.

I cannot be true to God and remain consistent with my own previous sectarian stance. I must choose between God and my own sectarian past. I have made the choice. I am going to be true to what I believe my Father would have me believe and write, just as I was true to what I thought when I was the leader of a factional school of thought that conditioned fellowship upon agreement with us.

There is one body! It isn't that there ought to be one body. It isn't that we are striving toward one body. There is one body! There is one body exactly as there is one Spirit, or one Lord. And if that body is the called-out community, there is only one such community. There has never been another and there never will be another. All of the called are in that body. It is composed of all the elect of all the earth. The one body is a divine creation, not a human contrivance. Man can no more create another body than he can create another Spirit or another Lord. There will never be another body to siphon off some of the called-out ones. The community of the reconciled is one.
